"I honestly believe that, but for patronage, fast becoming the bane of the Republic, not ten Democratic members from the free States would be found supporting the Lecompton constitution as it has been presented to us."

I hold that no member of this honorable body should make even a vague charge of this grave character against his associates, even from belief, unless founded upon some fact. If the integrity and honor of any gentleman has yielded to the seductions of patronage and power, it is proper and due to the dignity of this honorable body that it should be known, and the person or persons named. I therefore call upon my colleague [Mr. HASKIN] to give this information, and the facts upon which his belief is founded; my respect for this honorable body forbids that I should characterize this charge in such terms as it deserves. I await his response: I can make great allowance for excitement incident to debate. The remarks of my colleague, however, having been prepared in advance, and read from a printed copy, indicate premeditation and deliberation. While my colleague makes an assault on the one side, the honorable member from Illinois, [Mr. MORRIS,] in saying that the "northern men who vote for the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution are going to their political graves," (I do not quote the exact language, not having his remarks before me,) pays us a high compliment, for which, as one, I thank him. It shows his conviction that we have been guided by higher motives than selfish considerations.

Sir, I have heard it stated on this floor, and held in terrorem over the northern Lecompton members, that the Kansas-Nebraska act republicanized the last Congress. Without desiring to refer in detail, I desire to state a fact not generally understood. The whole country has been made aware long since of the division in the Democratic party of the State of New York from 1853 to 1856. It is to be deplored, but nevertheless true, that had the Hard and Soft vote been united upon single candidates in 1854, it would have secured eleven more members in the last Congress—seven by a majority vote, and four by a plurality—making a total of fifteen, and given to the Democratic party in Congress a decided majority. I may also say that the twelve Democratic members from that State in the present Congress were returned upon the principle contained in the Kansas-Nebraska act.

In times gone by, the parties in this country were divided into the Democratic and Whig party. Many glorious battles were fought between them, and many brilliant and gallant contests were had by the rival leaders upon this floor upon the great questions which, from time to time, have agitated the country. As participants in these intellectual encounters, the names of Calhoun, Clay, Webster, Benton, and a host of others, now occur to me. In all the giant efforts of these statesmen—amid all the heat, zeal, and bitterness of debate and party warfare—there was one common bond between them, and that was the love of the Union. The Whig party was national—it was glorious to battle with it—it was "a foe worthy of our steel." In its triumphs, however much we might differ from its policy, the country rested secure upon its nationality. The great issues between them were decided by the people in favor of the Democratic party, and the contentions ceased. The great leaders of the Whig party, Clay and Webster, having lived the period allotted to man, and devoted their whole lives, from their manhood to their graves, to the service of their country, full of honors, passed away to the silent tomb, amid grieved hearts, bearing to their eternal home the affection and veneration of their fellow-countrymen. The Whig party ceased to exist, and the Opposition party were without a leading principle. The slavery agitation, which had for a long time been seen but dimly in the distance, now culminated in the Republican party, and a bitter, sectional, and fanatical contest ensued. In this struggle the national Democratic party—lifting itself up to its giant proportions, reinforced by a part of the national portion of the Whig party, several of whom, I am proud to say, are now upon this floor coöperating with us, met the enemy and triumphed. Though defeated, they were not conquered; and the war is being waged.

No intelligent person can be so blind as not to see, in the success of a northern sectional party arrayed against the constitutional rights of the South, that a counter-geographical party must arise. When this occurs, it is easy to foretell the consequences. I shall not dwell upon it. In this crisis we can only look to the Democratic party in the future; it occupies a broad, national platform, and guards scrupulously the rights of all sections. I believe in its invincibility and in its great destiny; its nationality will preserve it; the people must see the consequences of its defeat; and I feel a deep conviction that when the hour of trial comes, all classes will rally to its support as the only means of preserving the Union, which they are taught to love and cherish from early childhood. I love my whole country; it is with regret that I see contrasts presented, attempting to show the greater prosperity of one section or class over another. We are one aggregated whole—what adds to one part strengthens the other. Our power and greatness as a nation result from combination, and from that alone must it increase and be carried on in the fulfillment of its great future.

This protracted struggle is drawing to a close; the President of the United States has taken his position firmly, and it is our grave and solemn duty to sustain him. I have taken mine, whatever may be the individual consequence, and can say, in the language of the lamented President Jackson, when standing over the rocks of the Rip Raps, looking upon the ocean, when friends were deserting him by legions in consequence of his firm course upon the public measures of his day: "Providence may change my determination; but man can no more do it than he can remove these Rip Raps, which have resisted the rolling ocean from the beginning of time."

ADMISSION OF KANSAS.

SPEECH OF HON. WM. S. GROESBECK, OF OHIO,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
March 31, 1858.

The House being in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. GROESBECK said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: In a very few hours the roll of our names will be called to take the vote on the admission of Kansas into this Union as a State under the Lecompton constitution. I shall vote "No;" and I have felt it to be my duty to express some of the reasons why I shall so vote. I have withheld the expression of my opinion in the hope, which I have entertained to the last hour, that there might be some modification, some arrangement of the measure by which I could coöperate with my party. It would give me great pleasure to sustain the President in this and all other measures; and far be it from me, Mr. Chairman, to say one hard word of him. All my inclinations are to the opposite direction. I decline to call in question his motives, or to throw the faintest shadow of suspicion on their purity. I condemn the practice, much too common here and elsewhere, of assailing the motives of our high public functionaries. It is unjust to them, and injurious to us all, and we should be careful how we undermine, for temporary, or party ends, the confidence of the people in the departments of their government.

It is now admitted on all sides that the known and expressed will of the people of Kansas is against the constitution we propose to vitalize. I will inquire hereafter whether this will of the people has been legally and fairly expressed. What I now claim is, that there is not a man in this House who doubts it. Therefore it is, Mr. Chairman, that from day to day, and constantly, our attention has been called to measures of relief for the people of Kansas against the imposition of this constitution upon them. It seems to strike many who will vote for it, that it would be wrong that the people should be compelled to live under it. And Representatives on this floor, from the North especially, have from day to day pressed upon us the proposition, that the people of Kansas will have the right without delay, and as soon as they are introduced into the Union as a State, to change this constitution, or make a new one in accordance with their will.

This has become a serious and important question; votes seem to be hanging upon it. Let us examine it. Before proceeding to its examination, allow me to refer to the clause, so often referred to, of the bill which has been passed in the Senate, in order that we may have no misapprehension in regard to its meaning. It is as follows:

"And nothing in this act shall be construed to abridge or infringe any right of the people asserted in the constitution of Kansas at all times to alter, reform, or abolish their form of government in such manner as they may think proper—Congress hereby disclaiming any authority to intervene or declare the construction of the constitution of any State, except to see that it be republican in form, and not in conflict with the Constitution of the United States."

I will not dwell upon the closing part of this extract, because it does not lie within the line of my argument, nor will I pause to construe its meaning. But I say this of the entire clause, and I challenge all dissent, that there is nothing in it that confers on the people of Kansas, should it be made a State, one particle of authority that they have not under the constitution itself. There is no gentleman on this floor, no Democrat, who intends to advocate the passage of this bill, who will rise in his seat and intimate that this bill confers on the people of Kansas the slightest additional power over their constitution. Is there any one here who will so claim? No one. I pass it, then, and come to the constitution itself, to ascertain whether, according to the fair construction of it, the people have any such power.

Mr. Chairman, where a constitution is silent upon the subject of alteration, I take it to be the law of such a constitution that the people can alter it whenever they see fit. That is so with your own. It is so in the case of any legal association. Take a partnership, for instance. If we who are here should embark in a partnership to carry on any particular enterprise, and say nothing in the articles of copartnership about the time during which it should continue, any one of us could legally terminate it whenever he saw fit. If, however, the articles provided a given time during which it should continue, or if they provided, in the very language of this constitution, that at any time after the year 1864 it might be terminated, those who were thus associated might put an end to the association whenever they saw fit after that time, but not before. We would be legally bound to hold together according to that limitation; and it could not without violence, without a breach of the law of the association, be terminated sooner.

Now, what says this constitution:

"Sec. 14. After the year 1864, whenever the Legislature shall think it necessary to amend, alter, or change this constitution, they shall recommend to the electors at the next general election, two thirds of the members of each House concurring, to vote for or against calling a convention, and if it shall appear that a majority of all citizens of the State have voted for a convention, the Legislature shall at its next regular session call a convention, to consist of as many members as there may be in the House of Representatives at the time, to be chosen in the same manner, at the same places, and by the same electors that choose the Representatives; said delegates so elected shall meet within three months after said election, for the purpose of revising, amending, or changing the constitution, but no alteration shall be made to affect the rights of property in the ownership of slaves."

Whenever, at whatever time, but after 1864, two thirds of the Legislature shall think it necessary to amend, &c., they shall recommend to the electors to vote for a convention, &c. No one doubts what was the meaning of the convention in framing this section; and is there any room to doubt the plain construction of the language? They may call a convention for the purpose of altering the constitution—when and how? Whenever, after 1864, two thirds of the Legislature shall pass a law for that purpose. This constitution is intended to keep Kansas as she is, in any event, until the time named, and to continue till that time, that the experiment may be fairly tested as to its fitness, as a constitution, for that people. It is intended to hold them according to its provisions, in order to give those provisions a fair test; and if, at the expiration of the time, (the year 1864,) the people shall find that it has not worked well, then, and not before, they may proceed to call a convention to alter or change it.

Why, Mr. Chairman, this section is copied almost word for word and line for line from a section of the first constitution of my own State, limiting my people in this respect, and providing that after the year 1806, (that is the way it begins,) whenever the Legislature, by a two-thirds vote, shall pass a law for that purpose, they may call a convention. I give the section from the constitution of Ohio adopted in 1802, and invite attention to it:

"Art. 7, Sec. 5. After the year 1806, whenever two thirds of the General Assembly shall think it necessary to amend or change this constitution, they shall recommend to the electors, at the next election for members of the General Assembly, to vote for or against a convention; and, if it shall appear that a majority of the citizens of the State, voting for Representatives, have voted for a convention, the General Assembly shall, at their next session, call a convention, to consist of as many members as there may be in the General Assembly, to be chosen in the same manner, at the same places, and by the same electors that choose the General Assembly, who shall meet within three months after the said election, for the purpose of revising, amending, or changing the constitution. But no alteration of this constitution shall ever take place, so as to introduce slavery or involuntary servitude into this State."

Many of the State constitutions have similar provisions. They are not uncommon. And I take it upon myself to say, without pausing to enter upon a nice criticism of this language, that there is no room to doubt the meaning of the convention, the plain meaning of the language, and the fair construction of the section quoted from the Lecompton constitution. The fitness and constitutionality of such provisions I will refer to hereafter.

But, say gentlemen, there is something more in this constitution upon this subject, and we are referred to a section which is to be found in the bill of rights in these words:

"All political power is inherent in the people, and all free governments are founded on their authority, and instituted for their benefit; and, therefore, they have at all times an indelible and inalienable right to alter, reform, or abolish their form of government in such manner as they may think proper."

Whence came this doctrine? We have been directed and carried to its proper source, by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. PHILLIPS,] though he greatly misapprehended its meaning. I will tell you where we will find it; and when we have found it, we will, at a glance, see its true meaning. I go to our Declaration of Independence and read as follows:

"That all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. That to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed; that whenever any form of government becomes destructive of these ends, it is the right of the people to alter or abolish it, and to institute a new government, laying its foundations on such principles, and organizing its powers in such form, as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness."

Here it is; the great declaration of the right of the people to alter, reform, or abolish their government. Made when? On the 4th of July, 1776. Made how? The sword of revolution leaped from its scabbard in the act of making it, and our fathers pledged to each other their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor, for its maintenance.

This is no mere legal or constitutional right to change or reform government. It is the sacred, inalienable, ultimate right of revolution. It is above and beyond constitutions; it scorns law; it does its work with armies and not in conventions. It speaks with cannon and not with the ballot; it writes its constitutions not with ink, but, if need be, with blood. It plunged our ancestors into a seven-years' war; it was a part of their very declaration of war, and under it they proceeded, not legally to change the Government then over them, but, as enemies, to overthrow and to crush it. Thus it is you alter, reform, or abolish governments under this right. And if you will examine the State constitutions from Maine to California, you will find this same doctrine, of the right of revolution, asserted in their bills of rights. It means in the State constitutions just what it means in the Declaration of Independence, whence it was taken.

Look into these State constitutions. In the early ones, you will find this doctrine asserted in almost the identical language of the Declaration of Independence; and they have modified it from year to year, and in convention after convention, not wishing to appear as mere copyists of each other, until we now find it in the language in which it is contained in the Lecompton constitution. Do you call this a mere legal right, a right under and by authority of the constitution? Why, Mr. Chairman, what says this constitution in reference to it? In its own language it declares that this great ultimate right of sovereignty is not confided to the government of the State of Kansas, in case it shall become a State under the Lecompton constitution. By express provision of the constitution itself, this power—this right of revolution—is excepted from the general powers of the government. It is not confided to the executive; it is not confided to the judiciary; it is not confided to the legislative department. I read from the Lecompton constitution:

"And to guard against any encroachment on the rights herein (that is, in the bill of rights) retained, &c., we declare that everything in this article is excepted out of the general powers of government and shall forever remain inviolate," &c.

How, then, can it be claimed that this right of change, thus "excepted," is a right held under and by authority of the constitution. It is above it and independent of it.

Mr. Chairman, it will be found upon an examination of the American State constitutions, that of the thirty-one, about twenty-eight of them contain just such a declaration as this. You will always find it carefully put away, not under the power of amendment, not in that part of the constitution which provides expressly for its alteration and reform in a constitutional way, but in a different place; not under the article for amendments but among those rights which are declared to be inalienable—that is, in the bill of rights itself.

What then can this Legislature do? They are sworn to administer the provisions of this constitution. They are sworn to exercise only those powers which have been confided to them, not those excepted. They can do nothing else. If they proceed contrary to this fourteenth section of the schedule, which is a part of the constitution and treats expressly of the power and mode of amendment, they proceed unconstitutionally. To proceed contrary to a constitution, is plainly unconstitutional. A constitution is the supreme law, which they must observe, and if they depart from it, they act illegally. The constitution is the supreme law for all.

It is said, Mr. Chairman, that the people cannot bind themselves in this way. We have heard that one generation cannot bind another. I do not care to discuss that proposition; I do not care to argue the proposition whether the living can legally bind the dead. I may grant that they cannot. That is not the question. The question is, can the living bind themselves. The question I have to consider in reference to this provision is, whether you, and I, and all of us, have the right to bind ourselves for the brief period of six years, from 1858 to 1864? What are we? Sovereigns—essential parts of the sovereignty of this Government, wearing sovereignty, as it were, upon our shoulders. There is no power above us, and no power to control us. Where is the power above me, which says I cannot bind myself? If there be, sovereignty is there, and not in me. Do you tell me, sir, I cannot bind myself for six years? I am no freeman if I cannot. You treat me as if I were an infant, as if I were a lunatic, as if I were an imbecile. You put me under guardianship. To whom? I can go into a partnership, and bind myself for six years to carry out some twopenny arrangement; but when I come to the great matters of government, where stability is most needed, and wherein my highest rights are cared for and deposited, then, according to the theory of these gentlemen, though a freeman, I have no power to bind myself for six years! That is a curious notion, in my judgment, of the rights of a freeman.

What mean the commentators upon this subject, in advising that constitutions be framed to secure some degree of stability and permanence in government? What meant Thomas Jefferson, when, in treating of this subject, he advised that constitutions should be made alterable every twenty years? With the tables of mortality in his hand, and with a close and careful reckoning, he ascertained how long the majority of any given generation would survive, and recommended that as the period for which constitutions should be made binding. What did he mean by this, if they can be changed at any time regardless of their provisions? Let me give his language. In speaking of the propriety of providing for periodical amendments of constitutions, he says:

"Let us, as our sister States have done, avail ourselves of our reason and experience, to correct the crude essays of our first and unexperienced, although wise, virtuous, and well-meaning councils. And lastly, let us provide in our constitution for its revision at stated periods. What these periods should be, nature itself indicates. By the European tables of mortality, of the adults living at any one moment of time, a majority will be dead in about nineteen years. At the end of that period, then, a new majority is come into place; or in other words, a new generation." * * *

"And it is for the peace and good of mankind, that a solemn opportunity of doing this every nineteen or twenty years should be provided by the constitution." &c.—Jefferson's Works, volume 7; pages 14, 15, and 16.

What meant the numerous conventions which have, from time to time, been held to frame and change constitutions? Why put the power of amendment into your constitutions and point out a particular mode of amendment, if this phrase in your bill of rights enables the people, at any time, in any way, constitutionally and legally, to tumble their governments to the ground? Why require two thirds of a Legislature to pass an act to assemble a convention? Why go into all this formality if the people have the right, at all times, and in any manner they see fit, legally, and not by revolution, to change the constitution?

Sir, they cannot do it. If they undertake to change their constitution in a manner not authorized by the constitution itself, it is the right, and it may become the duty of the existing government to resist such an attempt; and I tell you that if blood be spilt in such resistance, it is not always a penal act; if life be taken, it is not manslaughter; if property be taken, and houses entered and searched, it is not trespass. Look at the Rhode Island case. It furnishes an illustration. At the period of the American Revolution, Rhode Island did not, like the other States, adopt a constitution, but continued the form of government established by the charter of Charles the Second. In 1841, the people held meetings and formed associations, which resulted in the election of a convention to form a constitution, to be submitted to the people for their adoption or rejection. The convention framed a constitution, directed a vote to be taken upon it, and declared afterwards that it had been adopted and ratified by a majority of the people, and was the paramount law and constitution of Rhode Island. Under it elections were held for Governor, members of the Legislature, and other officers, who assembled together in May, 1842, and proceeded to organize the new government. But the old government, under the charter of Charles the Second, did not acquiesce. On the contrary, it passed stringent laws, and finally declared the State under martial law. I will not stop to give further particulars. The people tried to enforce the new government; the old charter government resisted. The people were put down. The legality of their movement was tested in the courts, and it was decided to be illegal, because done without the sanction of the old government. The effort of the people was treated as rebellious and insurrectionary. I give no opinion upon the determination of this case, as being right or wrong. I allude to it simply as an instance where, in an extreme case, the people were not allowed, on their own motion and without consent, to reform or alter their government in their own way.

An action arising out of this movement was taken to the Supreme Court of the United States, and, as it has been referred to in this debate, I will give a part of the language of the court on this alleged right of the people to change constitutions in any way they see fit, and without regard to the provisions for change in the constitution. "No one," we believe, says Chief Justice Taney, "has ever doubted the proposition that, according to the institutions [not constitutions, it should be noticed,] of this country, the sovereignty of every State resides in the people of the State, and that they may alter and change their form of government at their own pleasure." Woodbury, dissenting, but only on the point concerning martial law, explains at length the character of this right of change. In speaking of the hardships of the old Rhode Island government, and the controversies it gave rise to, he says:

"If it be asked what redress have the people if wronged in these matters, unless by resorting to the judiciary, the answer is, they have the same as in all other political matters. In those they go to the ballot-boxes, to the Legislature, or executive for the redress of such grievances as are within the jurisdiction of each; and, for such as are not, to conventions and amendments of constitutions. And when the former fail, and these last are forbidden by statutes, all that is left in extreme cases, where the suffering is intolerable, and the prospect is good of relief by action of the people without the forms of law, is to do as did Hampden and Washington, and venture action without these forms, and abide the consequences. Should strong majorities favor the change, it generally is completed without much violence, &c."

"Changes, thus demanded, and thus supported, will usually be allowed to go into peaceful consummation; but when not so allowed, or when they are attempted by small or doubtful majorities, it must be conceded that it will be at their peril, as they will usually be resisted by those in power, by means of prosecutions, and sometimes by violence, and, unless crowned by success, and thus subsequently ratified, they will often be punished as rebellious or treasonable."

Now it must be remembered that this language was used in reference to one of our own State governments, and in a case where the people had endeavored to throw off an oppressive, unequal, and offensive form of government. (7 Howard, Curtis 15, 23.)

Webster, in the same case, in argument, says:

"One principle [of American government] is, that the people often limit their government; another, that they often limit themselves. They secure themselves against sudden changes by mere majorities."

But we are told the Legislature will concur in this movement. I will consider this aspect of the question hereafter. I am now considering the constitutional right of the people to change this Lecompton constitution prior to 1864.

We are also referred to what has been done in other States. We are told that New York has changed her constitution in disregard of the mode pointed out in it. This is questionable. The constitution referred to provided for particular special amendments to be made by the Legislature exclusively, and had no provision for making a new constitution by a convention of the people. It is very proper to avoid the expense of a convention in making a single or slight amendments, and it does not always follow, because provision is made with that view, that a convention may not be called to make an entirely new constitution, when such a course is not forbidden. But in this New York case the justices of her supreme court, in giving an opinion to the Legislature of that State, on a collateral question growing out of that movement, say:

"In this discussion we have assumed, without intending to express any opinion on the subject, that the constitution can be amended in a different way from that which has been prescribed by the people in the instrument itself."

In Massachusetts, the opinion of her supreme court on a like question has been called for by the Legislature. I give the following extract from that opinion:

"The court do not understand it was the intention of the House of Representatives to request their opinion upon the natural right of the people, in cases of great emergency, or upon the obvious failure of their existing constitution to accomplish the objects for which it was designed, to provide for the amendment or alteration of their constitution; nor what would be the effect of any change or alteration of their constitution made under such circumstances, and sanctioned by the assent of the people. Such a view of the subject would involve the general question of natural rights, and the inherent and fundamental principles upon which civil society is founded, rather than any question upon the nature, construction, or operation of the existing constitution." * * *

* * * Considering that no mode previous to 1820 was provided by the constitution for its amendment, that no other power for that purpose than in the mode alluded to is anywhere given in the constitution, by implication or otherwise, and that the mode thereby provided appears manifestly to have been carefully considered, and the power of altering the constitution thereby conferred to have been cautiously retained and guarded, we think a strong implication arises against the existence of any other power, under the constitution, for the same purpose."—6 Cushing, pages 573-4.

It is proper to notice that this opinion was given upon a constitution which had a particular mode of amendment, and, also, in its bill of rights, just such a clause as we have in this Lecompton constitution, declaring that "the people alone have an inalienable, incontestable, and indefeasible right to institute government, and to reform, alter, or totally change the same, when their protection, safety, prosperity, and happiness require it." It would seem that the judges did not regard this as a constitutional way of amendment, but as a declaration of the right of revolution.

But, Mr. Chairman, I do not think it necessary to continue this inquiry. I can well understand how a constitution might be changed in an irregular and unauthorized manner, when the people had become tired of it; but where is the State in which this has occurred when slavery was the matter in issue? Where is the slave State which has been made a free State, in an unconstitutional manner; or the free State which has been made a slave State in such a way, and especially when the people are divided upon the question; when they stand in bitter hostility to each other; when they have been warring with each other about it for years? Remembering, as we must, the extraordinary struggle which has been made in Kansas, on one side to make it a slave State, and on the other to make it a free State, does any one suppose the Lecomptonites will tamely submit, and when you have crowned their effort with victory, by making Kansas a slave State, quietly yield all this to their opponents, and allow them to make it a free State in a manner not clearly sanctioned by the constitution?

What is to become of our State governments, under the operation of this doctrine of the unlimited right of the majority to change them, at any time and in any way? We have thirty-one States, each having political parties. To-day one party is in the ascendant, to-morrow another. What stability is secured for our institutions, if mere majorities, regardless of the rights of minorities vested in them by constitutions, and regardless of the provisions of the constitutions themselves, can at any time and in any way overthrow and change them? Not only so: what becomes of your Federal Constitution under this doctrine? Let us inquire.

In 1830, on the floor of the Senate, Daniel Webster, in speaking of our Federal Government and its Constitution, used this language:

"I hold it to be a popular Government, erected by the people, those who administer it responsible to the people. It is as popular, just as truly emanating from the people, as the State government." * * * "We are here to administer a Government emanating immediately from the people." &c. * * * "This Government is the independent offspring of the popular will. It is not the creature of State Legislatures. Nay, more, if the whole truth must be told, the people brought it into existence, established it, and have hitherto supported it, for the very purpose, amongst others, of imposing certain salutary restraints on State sovereignties."

Again:

"The people erected this Government. They gave it a constitution?"— a constitution, not a confederacy.

In 1833, he said again, in the same place:

"The Constitution of the United States is not a league, confederacy, or compact between the people of the sovereign States in their sovereign capacities, but a Government proper, founded on the adoption of the people," &c.

The preamble begins as follows:

"We the people of the United States," &c., "do ordain and establish this Constitution," &c.

I do not say that this is my view of the character of our Federal Government; but how easy would it be to popularize some such doctrine? How ingeniously could the argument be made that this is a Government of the people! Who will say it is an impossibility that such a doctrine could obtain a majority in Congress? Suppose it should, and you then tack to it this other theory now propounded in this debate, that constitutions have no more sanctity than village by-laws, and it may not be long before you will see these united doctrines ascending up into national party platforms; and what, then, becomes of the fifth article of the Federal Constitution? It will be no more a barrier against the right of change than the fourteenth section of the schedule of the Lecompton constitution.

Mr. Chairman, I am opposed, then, to vitalizing this Lecompton constitution, because it is not legally alterable before the year 1864. Why do I object to it on that account? I recur again to the arguments which have been made here from time to time; the appeals which have been addressed to members; the inducements which have been held out to them to make this Territory a State, because, it is said, they will have the constitutional right to alter it instantly. They will not. I oppose it because I claim, that, by the constitution, they cannot legally alter it until 1864; and I know, you know, we all admit, that it is not the will of the people. You remit them to revolution in order to effect a change, and you can give no assurance that such a movement will be allowed to go forward to a peaceful consummation.

But we are told that the Legislature of the State will concur in such a movement, and that it is now ascertained that the free-State men will have the Legislature. Let us look at this. The first announcement was, that the pro-slavery candidates throughout (Governor, judges, legislators, and all) were elected. Enormous frauds were brought to light, and it was then announced that the result of the election was uncertain. The disclosure of frauds thickened, and very recently the president of the convention has made a third announcement, that certificates will issue to the free-State candidates for the Legislature. This is all. Nothing is said as to the Governor and other State officers, notwithstanding the great anxiety to know the entire result.

Now, suppose, for the sake of the argument, that the free-State men will have the Legislature. How will they have it? They will have a majority, but not a two-thirds majority, in each branch; and by this Lecompton constitution a veto power is given to the Governor, so as to make it impossible to pass a law calling a convention over his veto, unless they have two thirds in both branches of the Legislature, which they have not. Who is Governor? I do not know. Nobody can tell me. It seems to be understood that the president of the convention is to declare, in the first instance, who he is.

I am told again, that if the wrong person should be declared Governor, the Legislature could eject him, and put in the man rightfully elected. Under what law? By what authority? There is no law or authority to begin that contest; none at all. If there be, will some one point me to it? The Governor takes his seat. If they should undertake to pass a law under which to contest his right to his seat, he could veto it. You cannot touch him after he takes his seat in the gubernatorial chair. It is not a case for impeachment. There is no law to disturb him. There is no law to meet the case. I might go on, if I had the time, showing other aspects of this case which seem to make it uncertain and very difficult for the people, even if they had the legal right, to go forward to change the constitution. I make this argument, I repeat it again, because that constitution does not express the will of the majority, and I can see no safe, legal, and easy way, in which they can alter it.

I am told again, make this people a State, and then they are free to do as they please. Sir, they are not half as free under the Lecompton constitution as they are under the Kansas-Nebraska act. That act makes them perfectly free. We have so boasted from the date of its passage. There is no comparison of the freedom on this subject which they enjoy under that act and the restraint—I would term it—imposed upon them by the Lecompton constitution.

But, sir, suppose I am wrong, I come to another aspect of this case. I affirm that this Congress, if it act at all, is bound—that is the word I use—to respect and act according to the known will of that people, as given to us on the 4th day of January. Suppose my argument on the other proposition is wrong; suppose the people have the legal right to alter this constitution whenever they see fit—the legal right, regardless of its provisions, to destroy a living and binding constitution: pray tell me, Mr. Chairman, how it is that this same people have no power over a constitution not yet binding. Explain to me the logic by which the people may throw aside a living, binding constitution, and yet are powerless to say a word upon what is as yet but a piece of paper entitled a constitution. What is this constitution? What rights does it vest? Will somebody tell me? What right can any man in Kansas assert under it? I should like to hear? Can you get into court under it? Can you do anything upon any alleged right it confers? No. Why, then, tell me that it is legally binding upon anybody? Can anybody in Kansas do anything under it now, before we put breath into its nostrils? Is it binding upon Congress?

Mr. Chairman, let me say a word on this subject of constitution-making. That territorial government of Kansas was established by the Government of the United States. It is our government. Every inhabitant there owes allegiance to that territorial government. I think that is a plain proposition. And if that be so, I deny the power of any part, small or large, of the inhabitants of that Territory to institute any proceeding that will legally bind the people of that Territory, without the previous consent of the Government of the United States. Let me illustrate this. You start, if you please, in the Territory of Kansas, a proceeding to make a constitution, and set up a new and different government. The people of the Territory of Kansas owe allegiance to the territorial government so long as the Government of the United States continues it there. Will any one explain to me how, then, you can institute a proceeding there, without the consent of the Government of the United States, that shall legally bind—that is the word used here in debate—bind the people to its consequences? An inhabitant of that Territory, as I said before, owes fealty to the territorial government, and to nothing else. He cannot become bound to any other governmental organization, complete or incomplete. Any such obligation would be inconsistent with, and might compromise, his obligations to the territorial government; and unless the Congress of the United States pass an enabling act, and thus legally authorize such a proceeding to be instituted—and unless, in accordance with the authority thus conferred by the Federal Government, to whom that territorial government belongs, the proceeding is carried on, it cannot be regarded as a legal proceeding, no matter what form it may have, and you cannot bind anybody by it. All are bound by the territorial organization, and this excludes the possibility of their becoming bound to any other, or by any proceeding to build up another. There can be no double allegiance or double obligation until Congress assent; and every movement, whether in conventions, primary meetings, or in any other form, stands, as to its legal character, on the same footing; and none of them can rise to a higher grade than a petitioning movement.

Mr. Chairman, constitutions have been made without enabling acts. That is admitted. Constitutions have been presented here that were not made in pursuance of enabling acts, and that were not submitted to the people, and Congress has received them, and has introduced the Territories presenting such constitutions into the Union as States. We can do just as we please about it. We have a right to receive all these applications as petitions; and when we are satisfied, by any kind of evidence we may have before us, that they express the will of the majority of the people, it is right that we should receive them.

But, sir, I take the position, and had I time I think I could make it plain, that it is impossible to institute a proceeding in a Territory without the consent of Congress, I care not how regular it may be, which shall be legally binding upon the people, so that, when it is brought here to Congress, we, too, are bound to entertain that proceeding, and admit that Territory into the Union as a State. As I said before, we may receive the constitutions presented, regarding them as petitions; and it is all well if they express the will of the majority. For what, at last, are all these forms; what are your enabling acts; what are all these proceedings which occur in a Territory, but the mere machinery to ascertain the will of the people? That is what we want, and all we want; and when we have it, satisfactorily and beyond doubt, it is our duty, if we act at all, to act in accordance with that will.

Sir, it is objected that the people of Kansas have not properly made known their will. How have they expressed it? They have expressed it through the territorial government. We have upon our table the protest of the Legislature, in which they strongly condemn the Lecompton constitution; and, "as the representatives of the people, in their name and on their behalf, solemnly protest against admission under it." We know this, that the people are not acting rebelliously, and that the territorial government we have there is in unison with them.

That is not all, nor the half. The territorial government, believing that the Lecompton constitution was a fraud, and obnoxious to the people, passed a law to ascertain, without a doubt, their will in regard to it; and that there might be no uncertainty, resorted to a method of ascertaining their will, which ought to be more satisfactory to Congress than any and all others which can be contrived.

Under the pains and penalties of an election law, and all the responsibilities it imposed, the people were called upon to say, not through agents or representatives, but directly, whether they would have this constitution or not to bind them. They spoke at the ballot-box; they spoke with that voice which makes and unmakes Presidents; with that voice which made us; with that voice which keeps the whole machinery of this Government, and the State governments, in motion; they spoke in their great, primary, and most satisfactory method, and by an overwhelming majority condemned and rejected this constitution.

Mr. Chairman, where is the authority, where the precedent, that tells us that this voice of the people shall not be listened to in acting upon this application? I have waited with watchful ear to hear it. What case can be cited, what doctrine shown—how will any gentleman argue to show this expression of the will of the people, fairly, properly, and decently made under the sanction of the Government, to be illegal, and such as should not be noticed here? I cannot find it; I do not think anybody can find it. Observe, sir, when we, in our States, undertake to alter constitutions, we do it under the restrictions of the old constitution. The old constitution is our chart, and we proceed in just the manner pointed out in it, or in a law passed under it for the purpose. When we have gone through the course so prescribed, the work is ended and complete. Nothing more can ordinarily be done, and the new constitution goes into operation; because, in such cases, the old constitution, and the act passed for the purpose, bind the people to the course pursued, and make it the legal and only course by which to arrive at the result.

Again: when we proceed in a Territory, under an enabling act, then the enabling act furnishes the chart by which we are to go, step by step, presenting the course we are to take, and we can take no other. Therefore, if we depart from it, our departure, being contrary to law, is a nullity. When Congress has thus passed an enabling law, if it has been followed, Congress, then, should admit the Territory into the Union as a State. The enabling act is not only an authority which justifies the proceeding in the Territory, but may be regarded somewhat as a proposition or conditional promise to make it a State, in case it proceeds and prepares itself for admission, in the manner pointed out in the act. It is very clear that Congress is not bound to admit, where it has not previously passed such an act, and has entire liberty to consider, and approve or reject the application for admission. But here there is no constitution behind the people holding them to a particular course, and no enabling law tracing the line on which they are to move. But, in the language of the Kansas-Nebraska act, they are left "perfectly free" to do it, "in their own way."

35TH CONG...1ST SESS.

Admission of Kansas—Mr. Trippe.

Ho. OF REPS.

Let me here dispose of the question whether the Kansas-Nebraska act is what is meant by an enabling act. Suppose it were. It marks out no particular course to pursue, but leaves the people "perfectly free;" and there is not a word or line in it which forbids such action as the people took on the 4th of January. On the contrary, its true meaning and spirit approve just such action.

But it is not an enabling act. An examination of it will clearly show it was not so intended. It merely declares the principle which shall be recognized in that Territory whenever, in the future, they should be authorized to begin and prepare to become a State. President Pierce, after its passage, recommended that an enabling act be passed for Kansas; and the entire Democratic party in the last Congress, after its passage, voted for one, commonly known as the Toombs bill. And it is proper to notice here that the effort of the last Congress to pass the act referred to, was made three or four months after the beginning of the proceedings which ended in making the Lecompton constitution; thus showing that the last Congress did not regard those proceedings up to that time, as legal and binding. If they had so regarded them, they would not have attempted to supersede them by an act of their own.

Let me say, further, we have not only the known and expressed will of the people of Kansas, but the last expression of their will. Now, is it right, Mr. Chairman, especially if the constitution is not legally alterable until 1864, and if it be not the will of the people; if they are in earnest about it, and not indifferent; if it is a matter in which they take a deep interest—is it right to put this constitution upon them? Let us remember we are under no legal obligation, under no obligation of an enabling act, under no obligation whatever to do so. I here affirm, in my place, that if it be done now, it will be done for the first time in the history of this country. Never before has the Congress of the United States forced a people into the Union under a constitution which they had expressly, and by an overwhelming majority, rejected. I can understand how we might entertain a proposition of this kind, when we were not, beyond all question, advised that it was, in fact, withdrawn, if ever made. I could agree, in certain cases, to take their silence for consent. I could resolve all doubts in favor of admission; but here there is no silence, and we are not allowed to doubt. We know—we do not conjecture—we know that the people have condemned this constitution. We know that they condemned the constitution, and the proposition for admission under it, before the proposition was made to us. They condemned it on the 4th of January last, and it was not presented here until the 2d of February. I repeat it, the act now sought to be done has no parallel or precedent in our history. Where is the authority to do it? Where is the precedents? I call for them. We are told that we cannot do an i or cross a t of a constitution, because the people alone must make constitutions; and yet we now undertake to put upon them an entire constitution, which we know they have rejected and do not want.

There are many things which have occurred in that ill-fated Territory which I should be pleased to present and lay before the sober judgment and moral sense of this House. I will not attempt, in this stage of the debate to go into the history of Lecomptonism; it has been often discussed. This may be said of it: It is characterized by unfairness, bad faith, and a total absence of integrity, as a movement, properly and honestly, to make a constitution for the whole people. Nor will I refer to the acknowledged frauds which have been committed by it, offensive to the South and offensive to the North. But this I will say: there is nothing in its history which entitles it, in this tribunal, to a judgment as by default, against the people. It has no equitable claim to our consideration.

Mr. Chairman, if there be a spot of land in all our vast domain, in reference to which the South should be especially careful to ask nothing which does not seem fair, and where she should be anxious to demand the utmost good faith and fairness in the proceedings by which it was sought to introduce it into the Union, that spot is the Territory of Kansas. The line of the Missouri compromise lay on that Territory for about the third of a century, all the while an offense to the South. It really did offend that section of the country. It was effaced. The South said that it was a stain upon their honor. They complained of it as an odious distinction that had been made against them. It was removed, on that account, I suppose. Northern Democracy aided in the movement, and defended it. That is not all. We had, last session, an application from this Territory to enter into this Union as a State, under a different constitution. It was rejected with the aid of the Representatives of the North. It provided for making Kansas a free State; and was quite as good a constitution as this. It was submitted to a vote of the people and approved, but it was not rightly prepared. Although it would have made that Territory a free State, the northern Democracy assisted the South and rejected it. Topekaism was condemned by the North. In the name of the northern Democracy I demand that Lecomptonism shall not be forced upon us by the South. Courtesy for courtesy. Good deed for good deed. Kindness for kindness. Gentlemen say, that we object to the admission of Kansas because it comes as a slave State. Would its admission be so pressed by the South, if it did not come as a slave State? Sir, such an argument is unfair; and for one, let me say, that were a Territory to come here with a free-State constitution, under just these circumstances, with all this unfairness and fraud, with all this reasonable opposition from the South, with all this history about it which belongs to Kansas—and, more than all, with this emphatic condemnation by its people, I, too, would condemn it. It seems to me I would not hesitate an hour in opposing it. Topekaism was rebellious; it has suffered the death penalty. Lecomptonism is fraudulent, and judgment has been pronounced against it by the people. Let it be executed.

I have heard in this Hall the declaration that this would be an empty victory—that Kansas would be a free State very soon, and that the South wanted a mere empty victory. Mr. Chairman, that is not what I want. This House is no proper arena for victories for the South or victories for the North. I want neither. I want a victory for the people; a victory for the principle of the Kansas-Nebraska act; a victory for popular sovereignty.

I would deplore the passage of this Senate bill in its present form, disregarding as it does the rights of the people of Kansas. I would deplore it, because of its possible effects upon that people. You can give no assurance that there will be no trouble, no future wrong in Kansas, with this constitution set up and such knowledge as we yet have of the persons, who are to fill the offices of the three great departments of the government. Let us hope, however, that there may be peace; that there may be no resistance to the people, no struggle, and that all may be well. But I would deplore it, also, quite as much, because of its probable effects upon the more remote future and upon the country. Lecomptonism, I fear, will be remembered by the North quite as long as the Missouri compromise was remembered by the South. Be assured, it will make difficulties in the future, and may embarrass the South when she should not be embarrassed. I would pursue a course that should make peace and create mutual good will. We have other Territories besides Kansas, and, it may be, we shall acquire yet more, and those in which the South will have a deeper interest than in this. How shall we manage them? Again and again, and often, Territory after Territory will come before us for organization and finally for admission into the Union, as States. What shall we do with them? Hark! and we may hear the bounding footsteps of one, even now, hastening to this Hall. Arizona is at the door. How shall we organize her? Shall we shackle her with provisions, or shall we crown her with popular sovereignty? Shall we place it kindly and becomingly on her brows, or shall we crush it upon them, as a crown of thorns, a mockery, and the prelude to another crucifixion? Let us not approve this most unfortunate and miserable illustration of popular sovereignty. It is unjust, unwise, and inexpedient.

ADMISSION OF KANSAS.

SPEECH OF HON. R. P. TRIPPE, OF GEORGIA, IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, March 31, 1858.

The House being in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. TRIPPE said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: If we have grateful hearts, we ought all to be willing to render our thanks to the Giver of all good for the promise before us, that this "harp of a thousand strings," which has so long given out such discordant music, may at last be broken forever. It has been tuned so long by demagogues and fanatics to harsh and factious strains, as to almost cause us to forget those nobler anthems, which in former times swelled the national heart and gladdened the patriot's bosom. And would, sir, it were vouchsafed to us, before this vile instrument is cast away forever, to be used, if possible, for viler purposes than those to which it has hitherto been appropriated, that some mighty hand, nerved by truth and virtue, might sweep across its strings and perchance strike from its snapping cords some melody which they have not hitherto known, though it should serve no other end than to revive the memory of the harmonies of the past, and to remind us that we were once brethren, and could politically worship together, acknowledging "one Lord, one faith, and one baptism." But, sir, I fear that the hand of that minstrel lies cold forever; and, in looking over this broad land, wherever I cast my eyes, I see nothing but his tomb.

Mr. Chairman, this Kansas question, this slavery question, has been the foot-ball of party and faction long enough—used by Cordelier and Jacobin until our country has been erected into one vast revolutionary tribunal, before which every demagogue and fanatic is dragging, as a prosecuting Fouquier Tinville, every conservative; and, with his "moral proofs of guilt," is dismissing him thence to the conciergerie and the guillotine, to be counted as another in the great holocaust of victims that have already fallen under its murderous ax. It is time for peace. It is time that the voice of patriotism was once more heeded in the land; and it is time, sir, that the fanatics and demagogues upon this great question should die, and die the death that knows no resurrection. Would that I possessed the power of acting the executioner upon the great culprits!

Mr. Chairman, my colleague [Mr. HILL] upon the floor of the House the other day, expressed a sentiment which I have privately and publicly expressed on all occasions; I have done it before my own constituency at home; I have done it in private conversation to those with whom I know I differ as far as from pole to pole; and it is this: that slavery is not a question for discussion here. If it is right, then one portion of the country has the right; if it is wrong, then one portion suffers that wrong; and he who stands upon this floor, in the face of his countrymen and the world, and abuses and slanders the people of one section because they have an institution which he does not approve, and to which they have a clear constitutional right, is unworthy his seat here, unworthy of his constituency, and unworthy of the country that protects him. The question of slavery, I repeat, Mr. Chairman, is not a debatable question proper for these Halls, and I will not enter upon it. When the effort is made, I plead to the jurisdiction, and will come up to all the requisites of such a plea by showing where the true jurisdiction is, to wit: in the people to be affected by it; and if you would still claim to pronounce judgment, I, for one, would pronounce that judgment as coram non iudice and void, and a tyrannous assumption of power over the rights of those who have both the right and the power to determine for themselves.

Mr. Chairman, in dismissing this point, and coming to the great one now absorbing all others, I beg leave to say, that when any man declares that one portion of this Confederacy could, would, or ought to be subjugated by another portion, and held as a subject province or colony, and that, too, because it refuses to be deprived of its most sacred rights, he utters a sentiment which involves

Admission of Kansas—Mr. Trippé.

Ho. OF REPS.

a libel upon American history and Anglo-Saxon blood, and is as credulous as he who is spoken of in Holy Writ, who "believed a lie that he might be damned."

Mr. Chairman, I shall vote for the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution. The question is put with a great deal of ingenuity and force: will you vote for the admission of a State with a constitution when a majority of the people of that State are opposed to that constitution? Sir, if that were the sole point in this question, or if it constituted the real gist of the matter, I answer emphatically that I would not, and I would condemn the man, as much as any one, who would avow the naked principle that he would be willing to force any constitution or any government upon an unwilling people. But I repudiate that as being the test of my action or my vote, and think I can plainly demonstrate that there are controlling circumstances surrounding this question, which materially modify the aspect in which the opponents present it, and comes as near as the point can be reached of stopping this great cry, that the will of the majority is about being violated, and that a constitution odious to that majority is about being forced upon them.

Sir, I am willing to meet this matter and argue it on the basis on which the opponents of the admission of Kansas put it, to wit: that there is a majority of the people of Kansas opposed to this constitution. There may be some difference of opinion on that point, but I believe that the general current is, that there is, in all probability, such a majority. I will go yet further, and concede, for the sake of argument, the very largest majority that has ever been claimed. Some gentlemen on this floor have said that majority was ten thousand. That, sir, was the full vote against the constitution on the 4th of January, without deducting any that were cast in its favor on the 21st of December. I see, sir, by the dissent indicated by several gentlemen on that side, that they do not claim this majority. Very well; how, then, stand the numbers, according to their estimates? Six thousand on the 21st of December in favor of the constitution; of this they allege, as fraudulent, twenty seven hundred—leaving thirty-three hundred legitimate friends. For the sake of the argument which I make, grant it. On the 4th of January the opponents of this constitution they say polled ten thousand votes, making six thousand seven hundred majority against it. Yes, sir, these are the figures according to their own showing—that out of an aggregate vote of the two elections together, of thirteen thousand three hundred, they have a majority of six thousand seven hundred, or more than three to one. And it has been pretty strongly asserted that the proportion is still greater. But certainly, sir, the above is sufficient to satisfy the most inordinate ambition on the other side in the way of figures.

Here, then, Mr. Chairman, according to the claim of gentlemen of the other side, is a question which not only presents a state of matters that on its face would be totally inexplicable, but which, in reality, presents strange and suggestive portents, the true solution of which would not be favorable to this great majority in this distant Territory; and which, if fully explained, might reduce their loud cry about fraud and violated rights, into a puny whine, and that, too, affected, because they did not get what, in reality, they did not want—a final settlement of this vexed question.

What, sir, is this case? A history may be written upon it to give its full details, but I will state it briefly. Four years ago by the legislation of Congress, by the construction given to that legislation, and by the excitement produced by it, the peace of the country, if not the existence of the Union itself, seemed to rest upon the result of a struggle that was gotten up, whether slavery should or should not be established in a certain Territory of this Union, when it formed a State constitution. It was a matter that should have been determined peaceably and quietly, had patriotism governed, but the fanatic and factionist did not so intend. Every means was resorted to, and the very policy adopted that produced furor and excitement amongst the people. Parties were overthrown; a new and great one, great in its strength and numbers has sprung up, which has about taken possession of one half the country.

The armies of Gog and Magog seemed to be turned loose. The world stood on tiptoe to watch the contest whether Kansas should be a free or a slave State. So high and furious waxed the struggle that it threatened civil war, and caused the patriot to ask the question, where will all this end? and made the stoutest to fear that his own loved Union might be involved in the result.

Mr. Chairman, in the midst of this confusion and danger, the very identical question that had gotten it all up, was in June last to be determined by the people of that Territory. An election was then to be held for delegates to a convention, which body could frame the organic law of a new and sovereign State, and which had sole jurisdiction over the matter and could forever settle it. A judgment that should have been final, at least until that very people would have wished to open it as they might have done when a State, was sought to be pronounced. All parties were summoned to the trial. Ample security and fairness were guaranteed, and the prayers of all true patriots were rendered, that a settlement might be secured which would give peace to a distracted country.

But what is the result? After the trial has gone through, and the verdict pronounced, one party is loudly protesting, and claims that an overwhelming majority, a majority of more than six thousand is against that verdict. As a judge who is to determine on this impeachment of this verdict, I demand to know, how it is, if there is the great majority you claim, that such a verdict was rendered?

The answer, Mr. Chairman, to this question is twofold. First, they say an unfair registry was made; that a large number of legal voters in several counties were refused a registry, and hence could not vote. I will not stop here to go fully into the merits of this reply as to the facts, but will say that the evidence is clear and satisfactory that a large number of those who were not registered refused to be registered, and that some of the disfranchised counties expelled the officers who were sent to make a registry. But take the fact as claimed, and you cannot make out, by the greatest count that you can in reason reach, more than some thousand votes in those disfranchised counties. Granting, then, that these thousand voters were illegally deprived of a hearing, and there would still have been five thousand seven hundred majority, according to the Opposition. Why did these not vote? Why did they not, when power was in their reach legally, stretch forth their hands and grasp it? Why did they not at once determine this vexed question according to the will of such a huge majority, and give peace to the country?

Sir, upon my view of the answer to this I rest my action, and am content that it should determine the character of that action, whether it is just or unjust to those who make the plea. It is said by that people, and by their strongest advocates here, that they knew they could not get justice, and therefore would not come to trial; that they knew fraud would be practiced, and right denied.

Mr. Chairman, it is but a poor plea that the suitor for justice would set up as a reason against a trial, that he knows wrong will be done him and justice denied. It would not avail in any court in Christendom. He would be told to defend his rights and trust to the law and the revisory power of the court or other tribunals to set aside fraud, or to vacate a corrupt verdict. Is the apprehension of fraud or violence sufficient to vitiate any election, from a constable's to the President's? It is not pretended that this belief or fear was founded on any threats or concerted arrangements, or that there were any signs thereof; and the only pretense set up was, that at the first election for a Territorial Legislature, there were fraud and violence. It is simply contemptible to say that that was sufficient in advance to vitiate any and all future elections.

But, sir, there was a corrective power; there was a power to have prevented the consummation of any fraud or any violence. That power was the Congress of the United States, which have full authority to determine the final question of admission. Had there been an honest effort on the part of all the legal voters to have been heard, and by any means that were unjust and unfair the rights of the majority were denied, no man will pretend that Congress could not have intervened, and even if it could not give at once full force and effect to the will of that majority, it at least could prevent the consummation of the wrong. It would have been within the clear, legal, and constitutional competency of Congress to have listened to such an appeal, and to have determined such a question; and it would have been its duty to have decided according to the facts.

Sir, that was the course that should have been pursued. It was the only course, to wit: to have tried to "form their domestic institutions" according to their own will; and, if unjustly prevented, to have then appealed to Congress to set aside a fraudulent verdict—to grant a new trial.

Mr. Chairman, will it be replied in answer to this, that Congress was not to be trusted—that faith was not to be placed in the Senate and House of Representatives, and the President of the United States? Who would set up this answer? Who alone is entitled to make it? Counsel cannot do it without the authority and in the name of the client. Gentlemen cannot do it here except in the name of, and speaking for that part of the people of Kansas who protest against the judgment. If they make it, what spectacle do they present? First, they impeach the authorities of the Territory, as intending to be guilty of fraud, and then impeach Congress as being willing to become parties in that fraud. They outlaw the territorial authorities as unworthy of faith, and then pass a general judgment of outlawry against the constituted authorities of the whole country, and challenge one and all as unfit to preside in the case. Sir, I will not listen to such a plea. I would strike it from the record as insulting and scandalous. I would not formally pronounce upon that which distinctly charges infamy on myself, on my associates, on the Senate, and the President, and on the whole legislative and executive departments of my country. And yet, sir, that people to meet the point made, to wit: that they should at least have struck for their rights when the chance was afforded them, are compelled to assume this strange, insulting, and slanderous position.

I repeat, sir, that the course for that people to have taken, and for not doing which they cannot complain of their self-imposed disability, was, when this question was before them in the election of delegates last June—had they been patriots, and desired the peace of their country; had they been true to the cause they proclaimed; had they wished the whole matter settled "in their own way," and just as they wanted it—to have made at least the effort, as freemen, to proclaim their will; and, had they fallen by wrong and injustice, to have entered their caveat, and appealed to the proper tribunal against the fraud. There would have been nothing unmanly in this; and such should have been the course of patriots, who, knowing their rights, will dare to try to secure them.

Mr. Chairman, some time before this election in June, Governor Walker and Secretary Stanton were in Kansas, pledging and guaranteeing the people a fair and honest election, and begging—ay, sir, imploring—them to vote, and let their voice be heard in determining the controversy. In my opinion, sir, in attempting this, he even went so far as to commit a great outrage against their rights, and to make threats that called for condign punishment; yet they would not vote. Deaf to entreaty, to promises, to the true interest of their own cause, to the calls of duty, they took refuge in mere stubbornness; and, conceding their great strength, they, like the giant, either went to sleep, or took the "sulks," until he was bound with cords, and then aroused with a loud cry that his rights were about being violated. Let that giant break those cords as best he may; I do not think he has any strong claim on me to help unbind him.

But, sir, in three months after the election in June—within three months after that election at which was chosen the body who had power to decide this exciting question—a change came over the spirits of this recalcitrant people, and without any additional legislation, they went to the polls and voted, and that, too, at an election of by no means the importance of the first. They not only voted, but succeeded, elected their Delegate to Congress, and the Territorial Legislature. That

Admission of Kansas—Mr. Trippe.

HO. OF REPS.

Delegate is now occupying his seat, and that Legislature has been more than once in session.

Mr. Chairman what does all this mean? How would the calm and unprejudiced observer be compelled to read this history? Take it altogether, and I confess I see no other solution than this: that that people, either from some outside influence, or from some unhallowed motives of their own, did not desire an adjustment of this question; that they did not desire peace; and that the whole matter must be kept open for the benefit of those whose capital was excitement, and whose aim was to build up party by the aid of that excitement. Sir, I would not unjustly charge any person or people; but, fearing this, I will say, that Kansas has been a disturber of the public peace long enough; and if it can be done, good bonds to keep that peace ought to be put upon her. At least, I would so act that when she feels disposed to get up any further difficulty, she may not only have the right to settle "her own domestic institutions in her own way," but that that "difficulty" may become, if she will have it, one of those "domestic institutions" which she shall have the same "organic" right to settle in the same way.

Mr. Chairman, if Kansas is admitted under this constitution, and there be this great overwhelming majority of three to one, what great harm can practically ensue? More especially is this question pertinent when that majority has the whole machinery of the State government. I know the reply is made to this that the Lecompton constitution does not provide for any change until 1864; and that it is only a revolutionary right which the people have to change that constitution before that time. I will not, Mr. Chairman, assume any formal position now on that question, as the brief time I have does not allow me either fully to state it or to fortify it. I cannot concur in what the President has said on this point; but practically as applicable to this case, I will say that there is nothing in the Lecompton constitution that in terms prohibits any change before 1864. And if the majority in Kansas in favor of a change is so great, being ten thousand out of thirteen thousand three hundred, and that majority has now the whole government, no one can doubt what the result will be. With all official power, and that power willing; with such numerical power, and that power anxious; no government on earth ever did or could stand six, or five, or four years against it. If it be revolutionary it would of course be a peaceable revolution, for one government would simply abdicate in favor of the other; and that other sustained by three to one of the people. What I mean is, that it would, all this being true, obey the great law of human nature, and change itself. I speak of what, in all probability, would be the practical end of this whole matter, and not of constitutional right; nor do I believe it to be competent for Congress in this bill to pass upon that question.

An amendment has been put on the bill for the admission of Kansas, in relation to this point, about which I desire to submit a few remarks. It is in these words:

"And that nothing in this act shall be construed to abridge or infringe any right of the people asserted in the constitution of Kansas at all times to alter, reform, or abolish their form of government, in such manner as they may think proper, Congress hereby disclaiming any authority to intervene or declare the construction of the constitution of any State, except to see that it is republican in form and not in conflict with the Constitution of the United States."

These words, sir, seem fair and plausible; but I do not like them. They say "nothing in this act shall be construed to abridge or infringe any right of the people," &c. Does this special repudiation of such a construction being put upon this act imply that Congress could pass any act upon which such a construction could be legally put? Or that Congress could have put anything in this act which should legally admit of such a construction? If that be their meaning, I repudiate them altogether. Do they mean to set up, as a special congressional declaration, the wild radical doctrine of Dorrism? If so, I repudiate them. Why put all that in this bill at all? Is it a bait for gudgeons or a tub for the whale? Into whose brain did the faintest idea ever enter, that the act admitting a State into the Union could, by possibility, have any control over the meaning of its constitution as to the right of the people to change that constitution? Where are there any words in that bill that, by any construction or distortion, can have any possible connection, directly or indirectly with the matter of the right of a people to alter or change their constitution? Unless, then, this declaration is utterly impotent and meaningless, I fear that there is a "cat under the meal." If they are intended to have any practical efficiency, I here enter my protest. I trust they will be stricken out, and that we will not again run the risk of a double construction of fair-seeming and high-sounding speeches introduced into the body of this bill, as we did in the celebrated declaration in the old Kansas-Nebraska bill.

There is another fact in this Kansas history, Mr. Chairman, to which I wish to refer, as in my opinion it has tended no little to complicate the question, and has furnished almost the whole capital to the opponents of the admission of Kansas. The organic act declared, "the people perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way, subject to the Constitution of the United States." Governor Walker, in last May, went to Kansas, and as the agent of the Administration in his very first act, to wit, his inaugural address demanded that the people of Kansas should "form their domestic institutions," or frame their constitution after a certain mode specified by him. This he repeated in his Topeka and other speeches, and backed them up by threats of preventing their admission into the Union unless they complied; and further declared, that in this he represented the President of the United States. One of those modes specified by him, was that any constitution that might be made should be submitted back to a vote for ratification or rejection. Did the Constitution of the United States require this as a prerequisite for admission? It would have been perfectly right and proper for the people so to have done had they seen fit; but the attempt to coerce them was an outrage that has never been redressed.

I have stated that in this, Governor Walker said he was representing the President of the United States. And how turns out the case? The only difference between the President and Governor Walker is, that the President says he meant that the slavery question was the question that the people of Kansas, in framing their constitution, must submit back to a vote. Walker was for the whole being submitted, and so was the President, and says so in his message; and further takes the position again and again that would have compelled him to resist the admission of Kansas had not the slavery question been so submitted. He says:

"In the Kansas-Nebraska act, however, this requirement as applicable to the whole constitution, had not been inserted, and the convention were not bound by its terms to submit any other portion of the instrument to an election except that which relates to the 'domestic institution of slavery.'"

Here the President broadly asserts that the Kansas-Nebraska act, "by its terms" bound the convention to submit the question of slavery back to an "election." Of course the inference is not only legitimate, but irresistible, that if the convention had not thus submitted the question of slavery, he would have redeemed the pledge of Walker, and opposed the admission.

Sir, with all due respect to the President, I beg leave to say, that no man, woman, or child in all this broad land ever heard of such a construction to the Kansas-Nebraska act, until they read it in the message. That act had been read by everybody, discussed and scrutinized and canvassed as no act of Congress had ever been before. The very words the President quotes to sustain his construction, had become as familiar as household words to everybody. All had them by heart, and countless inquirers were asking and quarreling about their meaning—but no one hinted or suggested, the idea never found a lodgment in print, or was whispered on the air, that that act meant what the President says it means, and yet, as to its meaning this, he says he "had never entertained a serious doubt." Very well, sir, I will not dispute what the President's convictions were, but I will say, that he was not only the first who ever promulgated the idea, but that down to the present day I have never heard that he has found a single indorse.

If the President is right in saying that the Kansas-Nebraska act required the constitutional convention to submit the question of slavery back to an "election," then are Walker, Douglas, and Stanton right in holding that the whole constitution was required to be submitted. But either the one holding or the other is a forced construction; and when any Federal agent or authority raised such a question on that people, a great wrong was done; and when the demand was made, an outrage was attempted.

I have said that this demand, or this position on the part of the President and Governor Walker, tended no little to complicate the whole Kansas imbroglio, and has furnished in its results the groundwork for the most of the arguments of the enemies of admission. How? The convention, overawed by these threats, or seduced by the powerful influences brought to bear upon them, did submit back to an "election" the question as to the future importation of slaves. From the history of the preceding election no reasonable man could believe that but one side would vote, and we had the spectacle of another "election," with very few voting but the friends of the measure. It was not to be expected that when there was no opposition the full strength of the friends of that measure would be exhibited. Moreover, with the wild construction that had been claimed for this great doctrine of "popular sovereignty," the free-State Legislature, which had just come into power, concluded they would take the strength of their side, when they knew they would have no opposition. They appointed another, and a subsequent day, to take the vote again. They had seen the hands of their opponents, and they knew precisely what they had to overcome. The calf had been taught exactly how high he had to jump, and he jumped it. There were no obstacles in the way, and clear over everything the leap was made by thousands, and now comes up the hue and cry that the plan of the President has been adopted, and upon the high principle of "popular sovereignty" the Lecompton constitution must be rejected. I here put the question: if this demand of a submission back to an "election" had not been made and enforced, and the convention had framed the constitution and applied for admission, where would have been the inch of ground upon which the opponents of admission could stand? None whatever, except that voters were not registered, who refused to be registered, and that certain counties were disfranchised, which refused to comply with the law that would have secured their rights.

Let then, sir, the responsibility for this distracting state of the question rest upon all who have aided in bringing it upon us.

Mr. Chairman, I have remarked that this Kansas question has been the instrument with which parties and factions have worked long enough. For years it has absorbed everything else but the Democratic party; and it really does seem as if, at last, it was about making its final bait of that powerful organization. Under the excitement it has produced, the Republican party had its birth, and has grown up to colossal proportions, more terrible than an "army with banners." It has given that party its war-cry, and is the life-blood of its existence. By a sort of converso principle, produced by the same cause, the Democratic party had pretty nigh taken captive another portion of the country. Between these two great parties, thus strengthened, the American party, with its noble aims, and with its great leading principle, to-day deeply rooted in the hearts of three fourths of the American people, has almost fallen, like the good man overcome by a multitude of sinners.

Where then, sir, is the patriot who does not wish to relieve his country from this pressure, and to enable the people to come up to the consideration of other great principles intimately connected with their present interests and future prosperity? Happy would be the lot of that man who could remove the Achan's wedge, and bring back once more the blessings of Heaven upon our political Israel.

I may be mistaken, Mr. Chairman, in one great object I hope to aid in securing by my vote. I am for peace—an honorable and lasting peace—heart and soul; and short of a sacrifice of principle, I dare not sacrifice; short of a surrender of rights, which would be degradation—I would be willing to adopt any honorable course to give and secure that peace to a distracted country. I shall take this step, and give this vote, hoping, if it succeed, that peace may come. As it is, I know full well we have it not. The old vessel is cabled fast to the shore, as if to a "body of death," striking heavily on the rocks that surround her. She cannot part that cable, and go out to seek deeper and safer waters. There she is, bound by this Gordian knot. As a pilot or mariner on board, it is on me to join in deciding what shall be done. It may be a dangerous attempt, for serious threats are made; but, risking all, I would cut that Gordian knot, turn loose the ship, hoist sail and strike out for more quiet waters, where the winds of heaven may fill her sails, and send her on her way rejoicing.

Let the deed be done; and give the patriot's prayer—God speed her, and send her safe deliverance!

AFFAIRS OF KANSAS.

SPEECH OF HON. F. H. MORSE,
OF MAINE,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

March 31, 1855.

The House being in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. MORSE, of Maine, said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: During the discussion which has been going on here for so many weeks on the question of admitting Kansas into the Union under the Lecompton constitution, much has been said by both sides on the general question of slavery and its influence over the prosperity of the country. I shall not enter upon a discussion of these topics now, but hope, on some future occasion, to have an opportunity of being heard in defense of free labor, and in an attempt to illustrate its elevating influence on modern civilization. But in this debate I do not think it wise too far to divert attention from the real issue tendered, and lose sight for a moment of the wrongs of Kansas and the crimes of her enemies. In what I propose to say, therefore, I shall confine myself strictly to the question before us, and attempt to show that this instrument, called the Lecompton constitution, did not originate with the people of Kansas, or come from any legalized body of men elected by, or recognized by them.

The admission of a new State, to our still young and growing family of stalwart States, ought always to be an occasion of much interest. It is not a union of one old country to another, venerable from age and made weak by worn-out institutions, but it is the birth of a new State, nursed and grown up in the wilderness, where the lights of civilization have never before shone. And when, in the formation of a new State, our form of fresh and vigorous civilization, with its free industry, free institutions, and self-government, spreads and expands to the waste places of the earth, it ought to be a cause of joy to the whole land, and to all lands where civil and religious liberty is known and tolerated. We have now pending before us a proposal to admit a new State, where, but a few years ago, the Indian and the buffalo were lords of the forest, and the only disputants of empire; where the music of machinery and the hum of civilized industry have silenced the Indian war-whoop and the tramp of the buffalo. It is true, sir, her star has not risen on an unclouded sky; storm and tempest have hung around her pathway, and her young heart grown strong and bold midst the fire and blood of oppression. But her courage and devotion to liberty will conquer all. The dark clouds that hang over her will soon disperse, and leave a bright and glorious future before her.

In considering this question I shall indulge in no fine-spun theories as to the obligation of a constitutional convention of a Territory to submit its work to a ratifying vote of the people, in all cases, or the independence of such convention of the people, as some have argued, or whether the Nebraska and Kansas bill was an enabling act; nor shall I calculate the number of States which have been admitted without the ratifying vote of the people. All such, in my judgment, are outside questions, and can only mystify and lead astray, or, at best, form a poor and pitiful apology for disregarding the wish of Kansas, and depriving her people of their rights.

The real and substantial question is, where did this Lecompton constitution come from? and do the people of Kansas unite on it, and ask to be admitted into the Union under it? If they do not, and a clearly ascertained majority of them oppose it, and decline to make it the constitution of Kansas, and live under it, then we are setting aside and overturning the whole theory and practice of American governments. You are uprooting the foundations upon which the whole fabric of American liberty rests—the principle of self-government; and forcing a constitution and institutions upon the people of a State under which they are determined not to live. There never yet has been a new State forced into the Union contrary to the wish of her people, and with a constitution they detest. In every case of the admission of a new State, up to this time, the people of the new State have been allowed, not as a privilege, but as a right, to form their own constitution. When the Congress of the United States departs from this great American principle, and permits the national Executive to encourage, and, with military power, protect a wicked faction in imposing an obnoxious constitution on a free and intelligent people, there is an end to self-government, and the beginning of despotism.

Now, sir, what has been the desire, the action, the control of the party in power, mainly through its Executive and its instruments in Kansas, in molding the affairs of that oppressed Territory, in controlling her people, in preparing her laws and this constitution, and in forcing them on a continually protesting people? Did this instrument come, through any of its stages, from any legally organized body, or association of men, in which the people of Kansas were fairly and legally represented? It is to a consideration of these points that I wish mainly to address myself during the brief hour allotted me under your rules.

I declare fearlessly, and with a full knowledge of what I say, that the first and last, and almost every intermediate act of the Central Government and its agents in Kansas, in controlling her people and molding her political and civil institutions, was a violation of her legal rights, and of justice and humanity. That usurpation and tyranny have reigned there, under the protection of this Government from the beginning to this very hour. And now, sir, go with me over the leading official acts in that Territory during the last four years, and see what proof we can discover to sustain these allegations.

You started with the clear, unmistakable purpose of making Kansas a slave State, otherwise there was no definite object in the repeal of the Missouri compromise. Such was the oft-repeated declaration of your partisans in Kansas, such is the testimony of Governor Geary, and the entire territorial history of Kansas. The first election held in the Territory under the law establishing the Territory, was on the 29th of November, 1854, for a Delegate to Congress. The law of Congress required voters to be "actual residents" of the Territory. The whole vote thrown, legal and illegal, was two thousand eight hundred and thirty-three; of these Mr. Whitfield received two thousand two hundred and sixty-eight, about one thousand seven hundred of which were illegal, and only one thousand one hundred and fourteen legal. But this has no other bearing on the case under consideration than to show that the government of the Territory was begun in fraud, and that the first election held there was controlled by non-residents and strangers.

Preparatory to the first election to the Territorial Legislature, a census of the inhabitants and a registry of the voters were taken. This was done without excitement, was full and fair, and included about all the inhabitants at that time residing within the Territory. The return of this census was made on the 25th day of March, 1855, and gave eight thousand five hundred and one inhabitants, two thousand nine hundred and five of whom were voters. The election for members of the Territorial Legislature was held on the 30th of March, 1855, one month after the census was taken. This was an important election to the citizens of Kansas, by far the most so of any to be held there during their territorial condition, as it would establish a code of laws for their government, and shape and guide, for a time, if not settle permanently, her future policy and institutions. If the legal voters, the actual residents, had not been interfered with from without, but been left to manage their own affairs in a peaceful and legal manner, all would have gone on harmoniously, and peace and prosperity walked hand in hand. But, unfortunately for Kansas and the credit of the country, this was not the case. An armed invasion was organized in a neighboring State to control that election. Preparation for this most extraordinary event had been going on in Missouri for many months, and many of the leading citizens and presses of western Missouri were vigorously urging on these preparations. Let me give an extract from one of these papers, as a sample of the border editorials of that day. The Weston Reporter, of March 29, 1855, one day before the election, says:

"Our minds are already made up as to the result of the election in Kansas to-morrow. The pro-slavery party will be triumphant, we presume, in nearly every precinct. Should the pro-slavery party fail in this contest, it will not be because Missouri has failed to do her duty to assist friends. It is a safe calculation that two thousand squatters have passed over into the promised land from this part of the State within four days."

This is true, sir. They did march across the State line into the Territory at this and other points by thousands, and were distributed over the Territory to the several ballot-boxes in such numbers as were required to control the vote of each. And these foreigners and enemies of free Kansas did control every ballot-box in the Territory save one. But little more than one third of the free-State men in the Territory voted. The right was denied them by the usurpers, and they could not exercise it without bloodshed, and the fear that their comparatively small band, unprepared for conflict, and beyond the reach of friendly aid, would be borne down by the armed hosts of invaders. It will be remembered the census and registry of voters were taken to prepare for this election, and showed a population of eight thousand five hundred and one, and two thousand nine hundred and five legal voters; and yet, at this election, six thousand three hundred and seven votes were polled. The Administration vote was five thousand four hundred and twenty-seven; and the free-State vote, seven hundred and ninety-one. A committee of this House, sent to Kansas to investigate the election frauds, conclusively showed, by an examination of witnesses, the poll-books where each voter's name was recorded, and the register where each legal voter's name was recorded before election, that only one thousand four hundred and ten of these six thousand three hundred and seven votes were legal; and that seven hundred and ninety-one of these one thousand four hundred and ten legal votes were cast by free-State men, and eighty-nine were scattering, leaving only five hundred and thirty legal votes for the Administration or pro-slavery party. Although the free-State men, hunted down as they were, really threw a majority of the legal votes, and no doubt elected a majority of their members to each branch of the Legislature, they were not allowed a solitary seat in either. Does it need argument, Mr. Chairman, to prove that a Legislature thus elected by non-residents, strangers, and invaders, was an illegal body? A bare statement of the case is an irresistible argument; and I should as soon think of presenting an argument to convince you that the waters of the Potomac have not dried up, when you see its current before you flowing on to the ocean. It is important to remember that one branch of this Territorial Legislature, the Senate or Council, was elected for two years.

It was a Legislature thus placed in authority by a foreign power, that passed the bloody code, and tried to seal the lips of freedom; which enacted that every territorial officer, not appointed by the President, should be but an emanation of itself and a creature of its will. For fear the Governor might occasionally forget his duty to his masters at Washington, and lean towards justice and the people, they made his legitimate duties as Governor as light as possible. They elected all county officers for a term of years, and then provided that census takers and judges of elections should be appointed by certain county officers. In this way that usurping Legislature, the illegal creature of violence and fraud, accumulated all the active powers of the government in its own hands, and upheld by the President and the Federal Army, was the imperious master of Kansas. Without the support of Presidents and Cabinets, and the United States Army, they could not have maintained their power a single day.

The next election having any bearing on the formation of the Lecompton constitution was held October 1, 1856. At this election a delegate to Congress, and members of the Territorial House of Representatives were to be elected, and the Missourians were asked to express an opinion on the question of forming a constitution for their colony of Kansas. This election was held under laws passed by the bogus Legislature, and were not the laws of the people of Kansas, but of their oppressors. The people did not regard the doings of that creature of the great invasion as constitutional and legal, and would not, and never did, demean themselves so much as to respect or obey them. At this election the great body of the people of Kansas did not vote, and why?

In the first place, no free-State man could vote without paying a tax under the territorial laws, and apparently indorsing the usurpation, and paying the usurpers for the crimes committed against them.

In the second place, no free-State man could vote without being liable to have first administered to him, at the polls, a test oath, a thing heretofore unheard of in a free country, and ought never to be tolerated by a free people.

In the third place all the machinery of the elections was in the hands of their worst enemies, selected for their peculiar qualifications for the duties imposed on them. They were not responsible to either people or law. Their duty was always to see that votes enough were returned to elect the pro-slavery candidates, and if they were responsible to any power, it was to a Legislature forced on the Territory by foreign votes and the Federal Army. These men could administer oaths, demand the payment of taxes, and then make up the returns to suit the wants of the tyrants who controlled the Territory. Could you expect men who knew their rights, and when there was no hope of success, to vote under such humiliating circumstances? Serfs may consent, but free men never.

But again, sir, had they humiliated themselves before their oppressors, taken the repulsive oaths, rewarded their masters, in the form of taxes, for their scourges, and attempted to set up a rivalry of honest votes against fraudulent returns, they could have accomplished but little, even if success was possible against such obstacles, for only one branch of the Legislature was to be elected; and if there was any hope of carrying that, they could right no wrongs. The Council, or Senate, was elected for two years, and held over. If they could have carried the lower House at that time, against the insurmountable obstructions placed in their way, it would have been a barren victory. For with the Senate, the executive, the judiciary, all the machinery for conducting elections in full operation, and all county and State officers against them, they could have accomplished nothing. Under such a state of things, the free-State men showed their wisdom and manhood by withholding their votes.

You will remember, Mr. Chairman, that a Delegate to Congress and representatives to the Territorial Legislature, were to be chosen, and the sense of the people taken on calling a constitutional convention. At this election Mr. Whitfield, the Administration candidate, received four thousand two hundred and seventy-six votes, more than twice as many as the pro-slavery party ever had in the Territory; and by a peculiar genius they have for making up returns, they could easily have doubled this number, had as many been necessary for their success. The vote polled, or returned, for Whitfield, showed the extent of their preparations, and that they had determined to overcome all opposition, even had the free-State men appeared at the polls in full force. The readiness of the "Blue Lodges" of Missouri, and their own expertness at bringing up any arrear of votes by long returns, would have proved equal to any emergency. At the same time, and at the same polls from which Whitfield had these four thousand two hundred and seventy-six votes returned, the constitutional convention was approved by only two thousand five hundred and ninety-two returned votes. This falling off, of nearly one half, showed great negligence, or indifference, in some branch of the vote-manufacturing department. Whether the fault is to be attributed to the carelessness of their Missouri friends, and their hurry to get home, or to laziness or negligence in the directory-copying office, the result is certainly not very favorable to a popular expression for a State organization.

But the rulers of Kansas, in and out of her territory, determined that she should become a State, and a slave State, too, while they could control her institutions; and therefore the census and convention law was passed. This law was apparently fair; and, in the hands of honest men, would have worked well enough. Yet it was cunningly contrived, and a capital law for the dishonest to commit frauds under. Those who were charged with its execution could, and did, so execute it in the several districts as to control the elections in the districts. The execution of the law was under the direction of county officers selected by the Legislature, and of course were selected with direct reference to the nature of the delicate duties to be required of them.

As, under the new policy adopted by the Administration party for the government of the Territories, there was to be no "intervention" by the Federal Government in them, the curious may feel some interest to learn the origin of this law. I will give them what light Governor Geary throws upon the subject. His private secretary says, in a book written under the sanction and direction of the Governor:

"This was the most infamous scheme to rob thousands of freemen of their right of the elective franchise that has ever been devised in this or any other country. The bill was created with much care and cunning by certain United States Senators at Washington, and sent to Lecompton, with orders for its adoption without alteration or amendment."

"Upon ascertaining the nature of this act, Governor Geary, before its passage, sent for the chairmen of the committees of the two branches of the Legislature, General Coffey of the Council, and Colonel Anderson of the House, and informed them that, if they would consent to a clause referring the constitution that might be formed by the convention to the citizens of the Territory for their sanction or rejection, before its being submitted to Congress, he would waive all other objections and give it his approval."

The reply of these men was most remarkable. It comes from your own witnesses, told by your own witness, and truthfully illustrates the whole page of Kansas history. Governor Geary continues:

"The reply was that that suggestion had already been fully considered and discussed, and could not be adopted, as it would defeat the only object of the act, which was to secure, beyond any possibility of failure, the Territory of Kansas to the South as a slave State. Any alteration in the bill would be fatal to their projects. Even should they allow the spring immigration to take part in the election, their plans would be frustrated. This, they said, was their last hope, and they could not let the opportunity pass unimproved. They had already, in anticipation of the passage of the bill, so apportioned the Territory, and made such other preliminary arrangements, that the success of this grand project was placed beyond the reach of any contingency that might now occur."

Comment on such a scheme of villainy, to cheat and plunder a people of their rights, is unnecessary. My leading object is to examine and record the manner in which that census law was executed, and show how the people of Kansas were plundered of their legal and constitutional rights under it. They refused to submit the constitution to be formed to the people, because they knew the people would reject it, and confessed such submission "would defeat the only object of the act." The law provided for taking a census of the population, and for registering the voters of the whole Territory, under the direction of the sheriffs of the counties. It formed nineteen districts out of thirty-three counties, and provided that sixty delegates to the constitutional convention should be apportioned on the census, to be returned by the census-takers. These census-takers were appointed in each county by the sheriff of the county, and no doubt suitable care was taken to select men fit for the work to be done. All the counties were not included within the districts. Those excluded were disfranchised by the census law itself, and were Washington, Marion, Arapahoe, Dickerson, and perhaps one more. Now, sir, let me examine with some care these notorious census returns, and the manner in which they were taken; for out of them grew the Lecompton convention and constitution.

The leading fact to be noticed is, that returns of the census were made from only fourteen of the thirty-three counties in which the law imperatively required the census to be taken; leaving nineteen counties of the thirty-three from which no census returns were made. These nineteen counties, with the four not districted, makes twenty-three from which no return of population was made. Feeling that some excuse for such an outrage against the rights of a free people would be demanded by the country, it was first said that the people refused to come forward and be registered. But finding they could not stand on such an impotent apology—that it was the duty of the officers to go among the people, from house to house, and take the number of the whole population, and post up the names of the voters that each might see that his name was registered, the ground of defense was changed.

It is now said that the people of the disfranchised counties would not permit the census to be taken in them. On what proof, sir, does a charge so unnatural and groundless rest? If the officers had been prevented from performing their duty, witnesses would have multiplied upon you in scores. Only one witness in all the disfranchised counties has been hunted up, and his testimony does not sustain the charge. This man was a judge of probate under the usurpers, and only swears that any attempt to take the census would be dangerous. It does not appear that any attempt was made to take it until after the time in which it was legal to take it had expired. If the sheriff and his deputies were prevented from performing their duty, why do they not speak? They are your own witnesses; produce them. But the census was taken in that county, though not within the time required by law; and when this bogus judge undertook to manipulate the returns, he says the people objected. The objection then was not to having the census taken, but to having him correct the returns after the Oxford and McGee fashion. He was an old offender, and the people knew with whom they were dealing. Does any one believe that if the sheriffs had been expelled and driven out of these nineteen counties, or in any way prevented from complying with the law, some one of these exiled gentlemen could not be found to testify to the fact? If the sheriffs had reason to apprehend obstructions anywhere, it was in the strong free-State county of Douglas, more especially in the city of Lawrence, the council-ground of the free-State party. But they were not obstructed there, nor do I believe they were anywhere. The whole story is an afterthought, invented as an excuse for a designed neglect of duty. The people wanted to be registered that they might vote against the Lecompton constitution, and in some cases, where no census-taker had been near them, requested the Governor to have the law executed.

It has been said there are no people in some of these disfranchised counties, because no vote was returned from them on the 4th of January, when the free State men voted down the Lecompton constitution by over ten thousand majority. True, there was a vote in only a portion of those counties, but it was owing entirely to the short time between the passage of the law, and the day the notices for meetings were required to be up, and not to a want of population. The counties were distant; no mails running, the expense of sending out messengers from one to two hundred miles, with notices, was not incurred. The notices were sent by private hands as opportunity offered, and many of them were not received in time to be posted according to law, and no meetings were held. The fact that these counties were organized, county seats designated, and county officers appointed, is proof that they had a population, and county business to be done. The vote against the Lecompton constitution in thirteen of these disfranchised counties, where no census was taken under the pro-slavery census act, was, on the 4th of January last, three thousand three hundred and sixty-one votes; and, for the reasons I have stated, no vote was polled in the distant counties.

But, Mr. Chairman, another significant fact in this disreputable history is, that a list of voters was returned from five counties where no census of population was taken or returned. Now, how were these names procured? If the census-takers went through these counties and hunted up and recorded the name of each voter, how easy it would have been for them to have taken a census of the population, as the law required; or are we to infer that after registering the names of all the men they were driven out by the women and children? But, sir, these five counties were not perambulated by the sheriffs or their deputies, to register the names of voters only. The object in taking the census was to ascertain the population of Kansas, preparatory to admission into the Union; and they would not, without a tangible object, set aside a portion of their own law in these five counties, and execute a portion. The truth is, they disregarded the law entirely, and executed no portion of it in these counties. They took the old poll-books or check-lists, that had been through the border-ruffian wars, and copied such names as suited their purpose, and none others. No decent excuse has been attempted for this clear neglect of duty, and open violation of their own law. These nineteen counties were unquestionably disfranchised by design. It was a part of the plan of the plotters to get control of the convention. As none could vote except those whose names were registered under this census law, they took care that a majority of the names registered were of their own party. When Kansas fell short of making out the number, the old poll-books showed them who were to be called in from Missouri. They were very choice in their selection, declining to register thousands of free-State men, and adding a great multitude of non-residents and strangers to the lists of their own friends, to place their success beyond a peradventure.

But, sir, this is not all. The capacity of the oppressors of Kansas for crime seems to be inexhaustible. The election districts were formed by the census law, and each was to be represented in the convention in proportion to the number of votes returned, so that the usurpers knew precisely how many voters of their own stripe to throw into the districts to give them the convention. An example of their skill at this kind of calculation is shown by the fact that the voters were so registered as to give six counties, all stretching along the Missouri boundary line, thirty-three, a majority of six, out of the sixty delegates. These counties are Doniphan, Atchison, Leavenworth, Johnson, Lykins, and Linn, and have only about one quarter of the population of the Territory, and yet had six majority in the convention that adopted this constitution. This was done that the aid of Missouri could be easily called in, and in any event make sure of the convention. These census-takers did not pay the slightest attention to either law or justice, but rambled over the country, picking out men here and there, or sat in some border shanty, manufacturing returns just as the wants of their party required. Else why were the nineteen counties purposely and deliberately disfranchised, and allowed no voice or vote in the convention that was to form the constitution under which they were to live? Why were more than half the actual inhabitants of Kansas turned out of the convention, and treated as strangers and aliens? Why, in the counties where they pretend to have gone, was "one taken and another left?" Why did they, sitting in some Colonel Boon's store, across the border, manufacture voters for five counties from the old poll-books of the ruffian invasion? Why did they so contrive the registry and census as to give six border counties, laying along the Missouri State line, a majority of six in the convention based on about one quarter of the population? There is, there can be, but one answer to these questions. It was done to give a small minority of not one fifth of the actual population, the molding of the institutions of Kansas. These extraordinary proceedings have not even the forms of law to stand upon, and taken as a whole hardly have a parallel for crime in American history.

The free-State men perfectly understood the design of their oppressors; they knew that but few of their names were allowed to go upon the registers, and that they could not be entered there in sufficient numbers to be of the least service to the cause of freedom. They could not, therefore, with any manliness and self-respect, participate in a contest already determined against them. What could those steadfast, but cheated and oppressed, men do but stand silent and sad spectators at the grave of freedom, while their oppressors went through the forms and mockery of an election? This mock election for delegates was held, at which about two thousand two hundred votes were polled, about one thousand seven hundred of which, legal and illegal, were for the successful candidates, being about one half the number thrown in thirteen of the disfranchised counties against the Lecompton constitution, on the 4th of January last. With only these one thousand seven hundred votes to stand upon, these representatives of faction within, and power without the Territory, met in convention to form a constitution for a new State, against the known wish and the determined opposition of the great body of the people of Kansas. These delegates, the mere instruments of a relentless power that stood behind them, met in convention and adopted, with slight modifications, the constitution prepared for them in this city, and submitted to the people the single question of taking it with the external slave trade open to them, or with the slave trade confined within the limits of the State. The people could not vote against the constitution as a whole. The question of slavery even, was not submitted. It was only the introduction of slaves from other States that they were allowed to prohibit, while each voter, by an odious test oath, administered at the polls before voting, could be made to swear that he would forever protect slavery as it existed within the limits of that State.

The free-State men, aside from the fact that the great body of them were disfranchised and expelled from the polls, declined to take the oath of tyranny, and vote for the Lecompton constitution. They well knew that if they sanctioned slavery as it existed, and bound themselves by oath to support it, the natural increase would be enormous, and extend to all the slave-breeding States in the Union; and that all who desired it would find a way to get slaves into Kansas, in spite of the prohibition on the external slave trade. Such of them as the usurpers had condescended to admit to the registers, could not vote under the hateful conditions imposed on them, without disgrace to themselves—without divesting themselves of the rights and character of American freemen, and sinking their manhood into the basest servility. You ought to know them better by this time than to expect they would have voted under the scourge of such a hateful tyranny. You ought to honor them for their strong, manly character, and their steadfastness to the great principles of American liberty. Yet, confronted by this long catalogue of wrongs, you continue to ask: why did not they? why did not they vote? and because they would not become your tools, obey orders, and march up with bowed heads and tardy step, to place the yoke upon their own necks, you denounce them as rebels. Rebels, indeed! Whatever may be their fate, or the fate of the Republic—whether it is preserved, as I trust it will be, as a guiding star to the nations of all time—whether, like all its predecessors, it shall go down in blood, or sink into servility, its manhood lost beneath the tramp of despotism, or a slave-expanding oligarchy, the "rebels of Kansas" will have a bright and luminous page in the history of liberty. Their four long years of patient suffering, of hardy endurance in the cause of freedom, will be remembered and cherished by patriots, while the authors of their wrongs, in and out of Kansas, will be known only as the oppressors of man and the enemies of liberty.

Many of the friends of the Lecompton constitution, in and out of Kansas, had a gathering there on the 21st of December last, to go through the form of adoption. Many non-residents were there in person, but more by proxy. They did their best to poll a large vote, because it was necessary to show by some means that their pet had some friends in Kansas as well as in Washington; for they could not expect to establish a State government without people to support it. The entire pro-slavery force in Kansas was, therefore, got to the polls, and the powerful aid of their Missouri friends again invoked to come to their rescue, in their last great blow at the liberty of Kansas. The judges of elections at the several voting places returned six thousand two hundred and twenty-six votes for the constitution as formed, and a few hundred against the external slave trade. A portion of this vote was conclusively proved to be fraudulent. On the 13th of January last, the Territorial Legislature of Kansas, now for the first time free-State, appointed a board of commissioners to investigate these election frauds. These commissioners had not time to make investigations at all the precincts or places of voting, because they wished to lay the facts brought to light before Congress, to show, as far as practicable, the real vote for the Lecompton constitution, before the vote on the admission of Kansas was here taken. For this reason they had time to pursue their investigations at only four precincts, and the number of illegal votes, shown to have been returned at these places, is as follows:

At Kickapoo.....	700
At Delaware City.....	145
At Oxford.....	1,200
At Shawnee.....	675
	2,720

They had the original returns before them; the judges of elections, the clerks, and other actors in these fraudulent transactions as witnesses, and the proof is strong and overwhelming. By deducting the illegal votes, proved to have been returned from these four places, the vote for the constitution is reduced to less than three thousand five hundred. Had the commission found time to pursue its investigations at other places, I have no manner of doubt but that the real vote for this constitution would have been reduced to less than two thousand. Now, sir, does the small vote by which the delegates who formed this constitution were elected, and the almost equally small vote by which any portion of it was sanctioned by the people, form a decent excuse for the attempt here making to force this obnoxious constitution on the people of that Territory? No, sir; no apology can be found in this small vote, the condition of the Territory, or her insignificant population. The reason is purely political, and has no connection with the wants or prosperity of Kansas.

I have thus attempted—and I think successfully—to answer the question, "why did not the people vote?" so often put with an air of triumph on this floor, and elsewhere; and to show that in no case connected with this Lecompton constitution have the people of Kansas been allowed the rights of suffrage, or the privileges belonging to American citizens; that, in every case of an election connected with it, they have been either driven from the polls by multitudes of armed ruffians from without the Territory, and outvoted by illegal and foreign votes, or completely disfranchised by having their names excluded from the check-lists; sometimes cheated by long rolls of false returns, made up to order, and at other times kept away by such hateful test oaths as no American can submit to without a sense of degradation. Throughout all these persecutions the General Government was sovereign in the Territory, and sanctioned and upheld, with the military power of the Union, the lawless freebooters who seemed to be congregated there for the work of oppression and plunder. I have also attempted to trace down the history of this Lecompton constitution, and show that it did not originate with the people of Kansas, or grow out of the action of any legally-organized body of men there. The Legislature that passed the law to take the sense of the people on the question of forming a State government was brought into being by invasion, fraud, and violence; and did not receive a majority of the legal votes polled. One branch of this same Legislature (the Senate) was in power, having been chosen for two years, when the census and convention law was passed; and it will hardly be contended that an illegally-constituted body can make valid laws: besides, the people were prevented from electing the lower branch by the facts and circumstances I have before described. The election of the delegates that formed this constitution I have shown to be a most pitiful farce and mockery, and the convention itself a band of vile conspirators, brought together at the bidding of their masters, to go through the ceremony of adopting a constitution they had received orders from headquarters to indorse.

But, Mr. Chairman, the ruffians collected from South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Missouri, and other States, were not the most powerful enemies of Kansas. They could burn, rob, murder, and leave desolation and mourning along their Vandal march. But these alone patience and bravery would soon conquer, time restore their desolate fields, and industry build anew what the torch of the incendiary had destroyed. The strong and relentless enemy of freedom in Kansas has been the executive department of this Government, pushed on by the ever-watchful and never-yielding power that stands behind and controls it. From the very hour of the inauguration of the territorial government there, she has been the victim of oppression by this Government; its power and influence have been exercised to sustain the oppressors and violators of her rights. Instead of protecting her weakness, and encouraging her to build cities and make fertile fields in the wilderness, you have let loose upon her bands of highwaymen to rob, destroy, and lay waste. You have held her citizens in chains and loathsome dungeons by scores, guarded by your troops, for imaginary offenses. You sent your Governors, judges, and secretaries there, not to administer wise and impartial laws justly, but, like Persian satraps, to rule a conquered province. If a Governor, a judge, a secretary, or a marshal, faltered in the work marked out for him; if he would not disregard law, cover up fraud, permit murderers, incendiaries, thieves, and robbers to walk abroad undisturbed, or perhaps take them into favor and confidence, they were immediately discarded at the White House, and dismissed from office. Such was the fate of Reeder, Geary, Walker, and Stanton. These noble men scorned to be your instruments of evil. When they saw the infamy of the work required at their hands, they shrank back in disgust, and preferred your frowns and vengeance, with honor unstained, to your smiles and patronage, with troubled consciences and tarnished reputations. These four Democratic Governors are now living and terrible witnesses against the oppressors of Kansas.

Of the five judges appointed there, Lecompte, who has so justly acquired the title of the American Jeffries, and Cato, his worthy compeer, are alone considered worthy of the smiles and confidence of the appointing power. Many agents of the General Government, employed in the land department, were active leaders in the bandit war on Kansas, and made themselves special favorites, it would seem, by their active partisanship and cruelties. Some of these men have been promoted to offices of more responsibility in the Territory, more than one of whom has the stain of blood upon his soul. The people of Kansas have had the constant and persistent "intervention" of the General Government to contend against from the start. It has sent cold-hearted and unjust men, who had no sympathy with them or their institutions, to rule them. It has sanctioned invasions, disfranchisements, destruction of their property and lives, and almost every species of crime that bad men can commit against society. It has kept up a worse than Austrian espionage on the correspondence not only of the people, but of all Governors not of the blue lodge school. Governor Geary made formal complaint to the President that his own correspondence, as well as the citizens, generally, was usually inspected by the agents of the Government before leaving the post office, and declared it unsafe to send anything of value, or information of importance, through the mails. But the complaint was unheeded, and the spy system continued. It rudely stripped Governor Geary of all control and influence over the army in Kansas, because he would not use it against "free-State men" alone. And when plots were formed against him, and assassination threatened, he was not allowed a guard to secure his own safety or to quell open riot. It has sent secret spies among them to dog their footsteps, and report their words of confidence, and the Army of the Republic to force obedience to Draconian laws; and is now exercising all its imperial power to fasten upon them, against their earnest protest, a constitution, charged by the public press, and as yet uncontradicted, to have been carefully prepared in this city under the very eye of the national Executive. And yet, with this black catalogue of aggressions against the liberties of Kansas, and many more that time will not permit me to enumerate, standing out boldly upon every page of her painful history, the authors of her wrongs have the hardened audacity to talk about "non-intervention," and letting the people "form their own institutions in their own way."

And now, sir, we are told that we must hurry through this measure that her troubles may be ended and forgotten. This system of final subjugation, then, is your only offer of conciliation—the olive branch you hold out for her acceptance. It is an offer to atone for a long catalogue of injuries and crimes by another so much more monstrous than all its predecessors that it throws them into partial shadow. Does any one here seriously expect peace in Kansas as the result of an outrage like this? The cause of all the troubles there was the oppression and cruelties done and permitted to be done by this Government, to enforce upon her laws and institutions against the will of her people; and you propose to cure these troubles by doubling the oppression. Your warriors have looked calmly on and permitted brigands, with naked swords and flaming torches, to run riot over that most unfortunate Territory, and protected them in their fiendish work. And now, sir, when she implores you to take your steel-clad hand from her aching brow, that she may enjoy a season of repose, you call for more steel and more war-horses, that you may tame her spirit, bend her to your will, and force upon her institutions and laws she detests. Humane and just master, surely! Do your four years of experience in trying to conquer that brave people teach you that you will find them such base suppliants, such willing slaves, as to come quietly beneath your yoke and lash? No, sir, no! There will be no peace in Kansas as long as a fragment of this Lecompton constitution is sustained there against the popular will. It will be a living and ever-present memorial of the intolerable oppressions through which they have passed—a symbol of the victory of their oppressors; and they will never endure its presence while the power of resistance lasts. You hope not only for peace but for forgetfulness—an equally fallacious hope, for the memory of monstrous wrongs will never fade away. They will live in the oral tale and on the historic page. The sad but heroic story of the war for liberty in Kansas will become household narratives for its people and their descendants to the latest generations. That story has become historical; it is a part of our history—a foul blot upon its records, and there it will stand as long as the memory of the Republic itself shall endure.

ADMISSION OF KANSAS.

SPEECH OF HON. I. T. HATCH,
OF NEW YORK,IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
March 31, 1858.

The House being in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. HATCH said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I come into this discussion late, because I had intended to avoid it. I was willing to rest the vindication of the vote I intended to give upon the two messages of the President; but I find my silence is misconstrued. The various expositions in relation to the question now under consideration on this side of the House, to which I cannot subscribe, and the misrepresentations on the other, which I feel bound to repel, must furnish my apology.

In the first place, sir, I have a word to say to that portion of the northern Democracy who so flatteringly notice us who are steadfast in support of this Administration. I regret to find that they are so much disturbed at being read out of the Democratic party, as they say they are, although as yet, I believe, they have not named one Democratic obituary reader. None knew so well as they did that the only way they had to prevent their being read out was to remain in the party.

Again, sir, whilst we are willing to accord to their motives all the conscientiousness and patriotism that their modest pretensions claim, they certainly have no right to be offended if we deny that, when they leave the party, they do not carry out with them all the public virtue and patriotism of the Democracy of this Union. And we, sir, think we have a right further to say to them, when they form new political associations—enter into new partnerships—their first duty is to pull down the old Democratic Tammany sign. They are mistaken if they suppose they can carry Democracy into the camp of its enemies; it would be as fatal to the Republicans as the ark of God's covenant was to the Philistines in their camp.

The question now before Congress is the reception or rejection of Kansas, as a State, with the Lecompton constitution. I shall only briefly refer to the circumstances preceding the application of Kansas to be admitted as a State, the policy and constitutional right of that admission, and the wisdom of the act at this time.

I believe, sir, through all the territorial stages of this Kansas application the forms of law have been complied with, and abundant evidence has been given of successive recognitions of the authoritative action of the territorial governments by the free-State party. But few dispute the regularity of the convention that formed the constitution, and none can dispute the recognition of the constitution by the free-State men in their action on the 4th of January in voting for State officers. None doubt but that the constitution is republican in form, and that, in the main, it is a good constitution. None allege but that the slavery clause was submitted. None charge that the free-State party were intimidated from the polls. None charge that the alleged frauds in the ballots on the 21st December could have changed the result.

All, then, there is of this question is, that the free-State party, being in the numerical ascendancy, did not vote, and the slavery clause was inserted in the constitution. Who, then, is responsible for the slavery clause in the constitution? Governor Walker said those who did not vote were responsible for those who did vote. The free-State party, to-day, is responsible for the Lecompton constitution.

Let us see what the Senator from Illinois said:

"Kansas is about to speak for herself, through her delegates assembled in convention to form a constitution preparatory to her admission into the Union on an equal footing with the original States. Peace and prosperity now prevail throughout her borders. The law under which her delegates are about to be elected is believed to be just and fair in all its objects and provisions. There is every reason to hope and believe that the law will be fairly interpreted and impartially executed, so as to insure to every bona fide inhabitant the free and quiet exercise of the elective franchise. If any portion of the inhabitants, acting under the advice of political leaders in distant States, shall choose to absent themselves from the polls, and withhold their votes with a view of leaving the free-State Democrats in a minority, and thus securing a pro-slavery constitution in opposition to the wishes of a majority of the people living under it, let the responsibility rest upon those who, for partisan purposes, will sacrifice the principles they profess to cherish and promote. Upon them, and upon the political party for whose benefit, and under the direction of whose leaders they act, let the blame be visited of fastening upon the people of a new State institutions repugnant to their feelings and in violation of their wishes. The organic act secures to the people of Kansas the sole and exclusive right of forming and regulating their domestic institutions to suit themselves, subject to no other limitation than that which the Constitution of the United States imposes. The Democratic party is determined to see the great fundamental principle of the organic act carried out in good faith. The present election law in Kansas is acknowledged to be fair and just. The rights of the voters are clearly defined, and the exercise of those rights will be efficiently and scrupulously protected. Hence, if the majority of the people of Kansas desire to have it a free State, (and we are told by the Republican party that nine tenths of the people of that Territory are free-State men,) there is no obstacle in the way of bringing Kansas into the Union as a free State by the votes and voice of her own people, and in conformity to the great principles of the Kansas-Nebraska act, provided all the free-State men will go to the polls and vote their principles in accordance with their professions. If such is not the result, let the consequences be visited upon the heads of those whose policy it is to produce strife, anarchy, and bloodshed in Kansas, that their party may profit by slavery agitation in the northern States of the Union."

The free-State party, being in a large majority, did not vote. Why did they not vote? Why have they not voted, when successive opportunities for voting have been presented to them, where they could at once and forever have settled this slavery agitation? Look at their course briefly. When the vexed question of slavery between the northern and southern Democracy was settled at Cincinnati, and they united in favor of the right of the people to settle it in the Territories, the Republican Opposition united in favor of congressional prohibition of slavery, and against popular sovereignty. In all the territorial steps for the formation of Kansas into a State, and its early admission into the Union as a State, they have resisted. Even after a registry of voters was made, in order to remove all cause of complaint, and Federal troops were stationed there to secure an "unobstructed passage to the ballot-box," these men still resisted, and criminally refused to participate in the election. When the constitution was formed, which all concede to be a good one, and the only clause about which men had differed (the slavery clause) was submitted, they still refuse, all the time claiming a numerical majority of at least five to one. Now, when Kansas makes application with this constitution, which they had the power to make or alter, and asks us to admit her as a State, they, with impudent audacity, claim it should be rejected, because there was a numerical, rebellious majority against it, who stayed at home, and criminally refused to discharge their duties as American freemen. This is the kind of popular sovereignty they now advocate! When compelled to admit they had the power to reject slavery in the constitution, they say that is no longer an issue there. The issue now with them is, the popular sovereignty of a numerical majority in rebellion against the legal majority of the ballot-box. When President Calhoun admits "frauds" in the election on the 4th of January, in which they all participated and thus recognized the validity of the Lecompton constitution, and gives the certificates of election to a majority of the free-State party in the Legislature, in face of those repeated charges that these certificates were withheld by him to give to the pro-slavery party after Kansas should be admitted as a State, they very coolly turn around and argue that he had no authority. Their inconsistencies and fallacies are palpable. None can mistake the logical deductions from them. They oppose law, order, peace; and are always jubilant over the prospect of "anarchy, strife, and bloodshed." No sophistry can conceal the motive; it is plain; it is undeniable. They were bound to continue this strife; "that their party might profit by slavery agitation in the northern States." Why talk about "frauds" or disfranchisement of precincts, in dealing with this erring and rebellious people? To reject this Lecompton constitution is to protect this slavery agitation. It is more: it is to yield to the threats and arms of rebels. Machiavelli said to the prince, "it is better to have the hatred of your people than their contempt."

There is only one way to settle this slavery agitation, and that is to admit Kansas as a State any way, then withdraw the Federal troops, and throw upon the people there the responsibility of "regulating their domestic institutions in their own way."

But, sir, in spite of all the efforts of this free-State party in Kansas and their allies to keep up this agitation, there is a solution of those Kansas difficulties, and the President has presented it—and I will here add that it comes from one who has been selected by the instinctive wisdom of the Democratic masses as the representative head of this Republic, clothed with executive powers by their sovereign will, and one to whom earthly ambition can have no further temptation, and human obligation no tie remaining so strong as fidelity to his God and the Republic.

What does he say in his second message?

"Slavery can, therefore, never be prohibited in Kansas, except by means of a constitutional provision, and in no other manner can this be obtained so promptly, if a majority of the people desire it, as by admitting it into the Union under its present constitution."

"On the other hand, should Congress reject the constitution, under the idea of affording the disaffected in Kansas a third opportunity of prohibiting slavery in the State—which they might have done twice before if in the majority—no man can foretell the consequences. If Congress, for the sake of these men who refused to vote for delegates to the convention, when they might have excluded slavery from the constitution, and who afterwards refused to vote on the 21st December last, when they might, as they claim, have stricken slavery from the constitution, should now reject the State, because slavery remains in the constitution, it is manifest that the agitation upon this dangerous subject will be renewed in a more alarming form than it has ever yet assumed."

"Every patriot in the country had indulged the hope that the Kansas and Nebraska act would put a final end to the slavery agitation, at least in Congress, which had for more than twenty years convulsed the country and endangered the Union. This act involved great and fundamental principles, and, if fairly carried into effect, will settle the question. Should the agitation be again revived—should the people of the sister States be again estranged from each other with more than their former bitterness—this will arise from a cause, so far as the interests of Kansas are concerned, more trifling and insignificant than has ever stirred the elements of a great people into commotion. To the people of Kansas the only practical difference between admission or rejection depends simply upon the fact, whether they can themselves more speedily change the present constitution, if it does not accord with the will of the majority, or frame a second constitution to be submitted to Congress hereafter. Even if this were a question of mere expediency, and not of right, the small difference of time, one way or the other, is of not the least importance, when contrasted with the evils which must necessarily result to the whole country from a revival of the slavery agitation."

"In considering this question, it should never be forgotten that, in proportion to its insignificance, let the decision be what it may, so far as it may affect the few thousand inhabitants of Kansas who have, from the beginning, resisted the constitution and the laws, for this very reason, the rejection of the constitution will be so much the more keenly felt by the people of fourteen of the States of this Union where slavery is recognized under the Constitution of the United States."

"Again: the speedy admission of Kansas into the Union would restore peace and quiet to the whole country. Already the affairs of the Territory have engrossed an undue proportion of public attention. They have sadly affected the friendly relations of the people of the States with each other, and alarmed the fears of patriots for the safety of the Union. Kansas once admitted into the Union, the excitement becomes localized, and will soon die away for want of outside aliment. Then every difficulty will be settled at the ballot-box."

Now, sir, I will refer to some of the popular fallacies which are put forth by our opponents against this admission.

One allegation is, that the whole constitution was not submitted, and therefore it should be rejected. This I understand to be the position of the Senator from Illinois. This is certainly a modern test he has inaugurated. I admit it is a taking and plausible one; yet all know that a majority of the constitutions of the old States forming this Union were adopted by conventions, and never submitted to the people. A majority of new States have been admitted without submission of constitutions to the people. No instance can be found where Congress has required constitutions to be submitted to the people except Minnesota. A majority have been admitted without enabling acts; indeed, it is charged that in the very Toombs bill for organizing Kansas, the Senator consented to strike out the clause of submission. All agree that it is the wisest policy to submit constitutions to popular vote, but I contend it is only a question of expediency; it is either weakness, madness, or wickedness, in this case, to make it a test. We want no more new tests for northern Democracy; that Senator inaugurated one in 1854, and the seat of every Democratic member of this House who sanctioned it was vacated in the fall election, and the northern Democracy, though they supported it as a party measure, had no reason to thank its author for imposing on them the task of its support. The northern Democracy have had enough tests upon the repeal of the Missouri line and the Kansas-Nebraska bill; they want repose; at any rate, we want no new phase given to it by its author, and no new tests administered by him to us. Northern Democracy grew sick under them; Republicanism, perhaps, may thrive under them.

In the view I take of this question, no right of the people has been impaired or lost by the non-submission of the whole Lecompton constitution to the people of Kansas. Congress has the power "to admit new States," section three, article four. The only obligation incurred by the admission is the guarantee to every State of a republican form of government.

So, sir, Congress can even admit a State before it has formed a constitution, leaving the people in their own time and in their own way to make a constitution.

SOVEREIGNTY OF THE PEOPLE CANNOT BE LIMITED BY LEGISLATURES OR CONSTITUTIONS.

One of the main objections urged against the Lecompton constitution by those opposed to its reception by Congress is, that it contains the following provision:

"Sec. 14. After the year 1864, whenever the Legislature shall think it necessary to amend, alter, and change this constitution, they shall recommend to the electors, at the next general election, two thirds of the members of each House concurring, to vote for or against calling a convention."

The Lecompton constitution specifically directs that the same may be amended, in a certain manner, after the year 1864. There is no prohibition against action before that time.

I add to this the clause from the bill of rights, which I consider forms part of the constitution; but whether it does or not, it embraces the theory of our free institutions, and is almost in the precise language of our Declaration of Independence:

"All political power is inherent in the people, and all free Governments are founded on their authority, and instituted for their benefit, and therefore they have at all times an inalienable and indefeasible right to alter, reform, or abolish their form of government in such manner as they may think proper."

No man doubts but that, on the separation of these colonies from the British sovereign, the people of the colonies seized the crown and scepter on this continent; the people became the sovereign. If the people possess the sovereignty, then they can have no superior. Sovereignty must exist somewhere. State constitutions are limitations upon Legislatures—upon public agents. The power of the people is unlimited; the power of government is limited; it is the creature of the sovereignty of the people—always subject to their will. To admit any power of limitation above and upon the people, is to admit a usurpation of the sovereignty of the people, and there would then be no point where this usurpation would stop, except in despotism. Sovereignty in the Government is usurpation; in the people it is liberty; in the former it ends in tyranny; in the latter creates equality. The late Emperor of Russia said there could not be in time any intermediate governments between the government of one man and the government of the people. The "Holy Allies," at Laybach, in 1821, avowed that there ought not to be "any changes of government except they emanate from those whom God has rendered responsible for power."

I will now, sir, refer to authorities bearing upon these questions. They will be found sustained by the fathers of the Republic, from Washington to Buchanan.

All the writers on free government, preceding the American Revolution, avowed the right of the people to self-government in its fullest extent. Our American Constitution was only the application of these principles. Its authors applied them to free governments, as Fulton and Morse applied well-known principles in science to the uses of mankind.

Sydney said, chapter one, section six:

"God leaves to man the choice of forms of Governments, and those who constitute one form may abrogate it."

Chapter three, section thirty-three:

"Liberty being only the exemption from the dominion of another, the question ought not to be how a nation came to be free, but how man comes to have dominion over it; for till the right of dominion be proved and justified, liberty subsists as arising from the nature and being of man."

Locke maintained the theory of the social compact by express or implied assent, and placed the former in the majority of the people, without distinction of property or qualification. He further held that the legislative power derived from this compact reverted to the people when it became necessary to resume it, and that they might erect a new form as they think good. (Chapter thirteen, section one hundred and forty-nine.)

The early Presidents of the Republic, who studied government in the school of the Revolution, recognized the fundamental principle of the right of the people to make and unmake constitutions.

Washington, in his first inaugural address, (April 30, 1789), began with his "fervent supplication to that Almighty Being who rules over the universe, that His benedictions may consecrate, to the liberties and happiness of the people of the United States, a government instituted by themselves." (Hickey's Constitution of the United States, page 212.) In his Farewell Address, he said, "the basis of our political systems is the right of the people to make and to alter their constitutions or government."

Jefferson, in his first inaugural address, March 4, 1801, declares, that "the will of the majority is in all cases to prevail;" and he thus pointedly refutes, in a single sentence, all the false theories of grants to and guardianships over the people:

"Sometimes it is said that man cannot be trusted with the government of himself. Can he, then, be trusted with the government of others, or have we found angels in the form of kings to govern him? Let history answer this question."—Hickey's Collection, page 276.

You will find in Rayner's Life of Jefferson, page 377:

"It is now forty years since the constitution of Virginia was formed. Within that period two thirds of the adults then living are now dead. Have these, the remaining third, even if they had the wish, the right to hold, in obedience to their will, and to laws heretofore made by them, the other two thirds, who, with themselves, compose the present mass of adults? If they have not, who has? The dead? But the dead have no rights. They are nothing; and nothing cannot own something. Where there is no substance there can be no accident. This corporeal globe and everything on it belongs to its present corporeal inhabitants during their generation. They alone have a right to direct what is the concern of themselves alone, and to declare the law of that direction; and this declaration can only be made by their majority. That majority, then, has a right to depute representatives to a convention, and to make the constitution what they think will be best for themselves. If this avenue be shut to the call of suffrage, it will make itself heard through that of force, and we shall go on, as other nations are doing, in the endless circle of oppression, rebellion, and reformation; and oppression, rebellion, and reformation again; and so on, forever."

Mr. Madison (page 150, Federalist) used this denunciatory language of monopolists:

"It is essential to a republican Government that it be derived from the great body of the society, not from an inconsiderable proportion, or a favored class of it; otherwise a handful of tyrannical nobles, exercising their oppressions by a delegation of their powers, might aspire to the rank of republicans, and claim for their Government the honorable title of Republic."

I might add, from cotemporaneous writers, repeated authorities sustaining these positions. But, it is said, this doctrine is revolution. Be it so. It is the revolution of the ballot-box. It is the peaceful remedy of American freemen to change their Government. Such a revolution as this takes place every four years in the history of this country. Such a revolution as, in any other country, could only be achieved by violence and blood.

It is the easy working of our popular system—it is the exchange of the sword for the ballot. The swords of patriots achieved our liberties; the ballots of freemen must preserve them.

The supreme court of New York, in 1846, decided that the power to change existing constitutions "was above and beyond the Constitution." They said:

"A change in the fundamental law, when not made in the form that law has prescribed, must always be a work of utmost delicacy. Under any other form of government than our own, it could amount to nothing less than revolution."

Justice Wilson, a signer of the Declaration of Independence, and one of the earliest judges, said:

"This revolution principle—that the sovereign power residing in the people, they may change their constitution and government whenever they please—is not a principle of discord, rancor, or war; it is a principle of melioration, contentment, and peace."

The distinction between revolution and the right of the people to change their government is fully explained in the great debate in the United States Senate, in 1837, on the admission of Michigan. Mr. Calhoun there said "he had never denied the right of revolution. All our institutions rest on that right. A convention of the people has a right to put up and throw down every form of government; but that is, par excellence, revolution." (Debates, 1837, p. 313.) But Mr. Buchanan asked:

"Is it the position that, if in one of the States of this Union the government be so organized as utterly to destroy the right of equal representation, there is no mode of redress but by an act of the Legislature authorizing a convention, or by open rebellion? Is there no middle course? This is found only in the principle, established by the whole history of American government, that the people are sovereign, and that a majority of them can alter or change their fundamental laws at pleasure. This is neither rebellion nor revolution. It is an essential recognized principle in all forms of government."

In the case of the admission of Michigan, 1836, Congress had prescribed the boundaries with which Michigan was to be admitted, and had authorized the Territorial Legislature to call a convention. That convention rejected the terms, and dissolved, and the Legislature refused to act. The people took it up, and, in convention, adopted the constitution with the boundary prescribed by Congress through the message of President Jackson, December 27, 1836, approving this action of the people independent of the Legislature. He there says:

"This latter convention was not held or elected by virtue of any act of the Territorial or State Legislature; it originated with the people themselves, and was chosen by them in pursuance of resolutions adopted in primary assemblies, held in the respective counties."—Gales & Seaton's Debates in Congress, vol. 13, part 1, p. 1164.

Mr. Buchanan:

"But what is the proposition which lies at the very root of the Senator's whole argument against the bill? I understand it to be, that when any Commonwealth exists under an organic law, and has by it created a Legislature, without the previous assent of the Legislature, no convention can be rightfully held within its limits; and that if such a convention should be held, the movement would be revolutionary, and its edicts, in their very nature, would be unauthorized and tyrannical."

"If this proposition be universally true, then it follows, as a necessary consequence, that, no matter to what extent the regularly organized government of a State or nation may be guilty of tyranny and oppression, this very Government must first give its assent before the people can hold a convention for the redress of grievances, or, in a word, can exercise the unalienable rights of man. The fate of the people, it seems, must forever depend upon the will of the very Legislature which oppresses them, and their liberties can only be restored when that Legislature may be pleased to grant them permission to assemble in convention. I had not supposed that any such proposition would ever be seriously contended for in this Chamber. It is directly at war with the Declaration of American Independence, which declares that 'we hold these truths to be self-evident; that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.' That, to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed; that, whenever any form of government becomes destructive of these ends, it is the right of the people to alter or to abolish it, and to institute a new government, laying its foundations on such principles, and organizing its powers in such form, as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness."

"Mr. Calhoun, interposing, said: Certainly; it is a revolutionary right!"

"Here (re-umed Mr. B.) is a right plainly recognized in this immortal State paper which we all regard as the charter of our common liberties. Is it not, then, manifest that the Senator has taken a position where he stands in direct and open opposition to every principle of the American Revolution? Why, sir, had we not established governments at the moment our conventions were held? Was not the character of these governments, in the main, just and equitable? We went to war for a principle, for the just and glorious principle that there shall be no taxation without representation; and in support of this principle, the people of the old thirteen, without any previous legislative act, did hold conventions and Congresses at their pleasure. Our very rights to seats upon this floor rest upon what he calls revolutionary principles."

"Mr. Calhoun. Certainly; I never denied the right of revolution; I contended for it. All our institutions rest on that right; they are the fruits of revolution. That was the very proposition which led to the revolutionary war. I said that a convention of the people had power to put up and to throw down any and every form of government; but that is, per se, a revolution."

"The gentleman (resumed Mr. B.) did say that he gloried in the right of rebellion. Does he contend, then, that if, in one of the States of this Union, the government be so organized as utterly to destroy the right of equal representation, there is no mode of obtaining redress but by an act of the Legislature authorizing a convention, or by open rebellion? Must the people step at once from oppression to open war? Must it be either absolute submission or absolute revolution? Is there no middle course? I cannot agree with the Senator. I say that the whole history of our Government establishes the principle that the people are sovereign, and that a majority of them can alter or change their fundamental laws at pleasure. I deny that this is either rebellion or revolution. It is an essential and recognized principle in all our forms of government."

"To be sure, I would be one of the last men in the United States who would desire to see such a right often exerted. I admit that there is great propriety and convenience in having the Legislature to fix the time and place and mode of calling a convention, because it is difficult for the people to effect their purpose without some such provision. Such has been the general practice; but I insist upon the right of the people to proceed without any legislative interference or agency whatever."

"During the debate upon the admission of Michigan, in the Senate of the United States, Mr. Benton remarked that conventions were original acts of the people. They depended upon inherent and inalienable rights. The people of any State may, at any time, meet in convention without a law of their Legislature, and without any provision in their constitution, and may alter or abolish the whole frame of government, as they please. The sovereign power to govern themselves was in the majority, and they could not be divested of it."—Gales & Seaton's Debates, vol. 12, part 1, p. 1036.

Mr. Madison, in his celebrated report, said:

"The authority of constitutions over governments, and of the sovereignty of the people over constitutions, are truths at all times necessary to be kept in mind."

I cannot so well give a summary of conclusions from these authorities as to add the language of Patrick Henry, in the Virginia convention of 1788, in 2 Elliot's Debates, page 63:

"This, sir, is the language of Democracy: that a majority of the community have a right to alter their government when found oppressive."

Again, speaking of free government:

"One of the leading features of that government is, that a majority can alter it."

"Rulers are the servants and agents of the people—the people are their masters."—Page 248.

I believe, sir, that no one can doubt, if they recognize these authorities, (and who dare dispute them?) that the people of Kansas have the right, upon their admission, whether recommended by the Legislature or not, or prohibited by their constitution, to meet in convention and make a constitution to conform to the will of the majority. It certainly is not becoming in the advocates of the Topeka constitution, which the Republican party passed through this House last session, to urge that any limitation in the constitution, or anywhere else, could prevent the people from making constitutions when they desired. The call for the convention at Topeka was signed by "many citizens," and "in mass meeting assembled," and acted, and a constitution so formed they accepted. Its only pretension to decent appearance was the mock solemnity of its opening by the Rev. Mr. Lovejoy. But, sir, now they cannot accept the Leecompton constitution because it cannot be changed until 1864. It has not been sanctioned by popular sovereignty, say these new disciples to that doctrine. They have made rapid progress in this doctrine lately; they surpass their master. If they have not already swallowed the Cincinnati platform, they certainly have the author of popular sovereignty in the Kansas bill. Yes, sir, they have swallowed the "Little Giant" as easy as the whale swallowed Jonah. But if the external evidences of mutual disgust can be relied upon, they will not remain together as long as Jonah remained in the whale's belly. In one aspect this modern adoption of popular sovereignty for the white race by our opponents is to be commended as an improvement in the color and odor of their humanity.

OUR TERRITORIES CAN ONLY BE OCCUPIED BY FREE LABORERS—CLIMATE, EMIGRATION, AND SOIL CONTROL.

Sir, Kansas can never become a slave State. Climate and soil will mark the boundaries of slavery. The laws of political economy have already determined this. Popular assent has been given to this doctrine. It is not in the power of this Government to make Kansas a slave State. The executive, legislative, and the judicial power, all combined and acting in concert, could not make and keep Kansas a slave State, or make one inch of free, slave territory. The laws of climate, production, and emigration, are supreme. These views are believed and generally acquiesced in, and I will now add the proofs. I quote from northern and southern Senators upon these points.

Senator CRITTENDEN, of Kentucky, said:

"I think there is not a gentleman here who believes that Kansas will be a slave State. Before this territorial government was made, many of the leading men of the South here argued that Kansas and Nebraska never could be slave States. By the law of climate and geography, it was said, they could not."

Mr. HUNTER, of Virginia, said:

"Does any man believe that you will have a slaveholding State in Kansas or Nebraska?"

Governor BROWN, of Mississippi, said:

"That slavery would never find a resting place in those Territories."

Mr. DOUGLAS said:

"I do not believe there is a man in Congress who thinks it could be permanently a slaveholding country."

Mr. BADGER, of North Carolina, said:

"I have no more idea of seeing a slave population in either of them than I have of seeing it in Massachusetts."

Mr. MILLSON, of Virginia, said:

"No one expects it. No one dreams that slavery will be established there."

Mr. Frederick P. Stanton, of Tennessee, said:

"The fears of northern gentlemen are wholly unfounded. Slavery will not be established in Kansas or Nebraska."

35TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Admission of Kansas—Mr. Marshall.

Ho. of Reps.

The late Mr. Brooks, of South Carolina, said, in his speech of the 15th March, 1854:

"If the natural laws of climate and of soil exclude us from a Territory of which we are the joint owners, we shall not and we will not complain."

Mr. Butler, of South Carolina, said, on the 2d of March, 1854:

"If two States should ever come into the Union from them, [the Territories,] it is very certain that not more than one of them could, in any possible event, be a slaveholding State; and I have not the least idea that even one would be."

Mr. KEITT, of South Carolina, in his speech of 30th March, 1854, quoted Mr. Pinckney, of his own State, that

"Practically, he thought slavery would not go above the line of 36° 30' by the laws of physical geography, and, therefore, that the South lost no territory fit for slavery."

Senator DAVIS, of Mississippi, and Senator MASON and Senator HUNTER, of Virginia, confirmed the above.

Senator KENNEDY, American, of Maryland, said:

"Mr. President, this agitation of slavery, upon which so much has been said—this harp of a thousand strings, which has been vibrated from one extreme of the country to the other—has no practical political bearing on the institution of slavery in the South to-day. It is a matter of political economy simply; and if gentlemen will turn to the tables with which your departments are filled, they will find that with your three million two hundred thousand slaves, taking the very strongest view you can possibly admit, you cannot get more than half that number—some one million six hundred thousand slaves—as laborers and producers in this country. Gentlemen talk to me about creating a vast excitement over this land as to whether or not slavery is to go into Kansas and Nebraska; but permit me to say that, by the immutable laws of political economy alone, if this body declared to-day that no more emigrants should go into one of these Territories north of thirty-five degrees, I do not honestly believe that you could retain slavery there five years."

Mr. SEWARD replied by stating his course was influenced by a regard to the interests of the whole country. He knew nothing nor cared nothing for party. He thought the mistake of Mr. HALE and others was in thinking the battle was not yet over when it was. It was a struggle for numerical ascendancy between free and slave States. There were now sixteen free and fifteen slave; and whatever Administrations, or anybody else might do, there would be before another year NINETEEN to FIFTEEN.

Mr. THAYER, Republican, from Massachusetts, said:

"We of the North have too high an idea of the power of the General Government and of law, either for freedom or against freedom. Sir, this General Government has but little power over this question. It is not a motive power. It is only a registry—an exponent of power. It is the log-book of the ship of State, and not the steam-engine that propels the ship, nor the wind that fills the canvas. We would like to have the log-book kept right, to show our true position; but we do not now consider the Government as the motive power. The motive power of this nation, and of all nations, is the people in their homes; and as the people in their homes are, so is your progress. If the people in their homes in Kansas had been pro-slavery, what could the North have opposed to it? It was emigration, and emigration only, that could have made Kansas a State, either slave or free."

Here, then, sir, is the combined testimony of northern and southern Senators, Republicans, Americans, and Democrats, all concurring that Kansas will be a free State, and that climate, soil, and population, will determine that species of labor which will occupy our Territories. Why will gentlemen, in the face of this accumulated testimony, argue that Kansas can be made a slave State? Why will they persist that there is danger that the slave power will overrun our Territories, and that the southern slave dealers are even conspiring to carry slavery into free States? I know no way so conclusively to reply to these clamors as to add, from the debate the other day in the Senate, the reply of Senator TOOMBS to Senator DOUGLAS, which I beg to read. Senator TOOMBS, having stated why he had not previously participated in the debate, said:

"But that Senator having arraigned, in my judgment, and unjustly arraigned, the section of this Union from which I come, for the purpose of his own defense, I desire to be heard for a short time upon his course, and in vindication of theirs."

"The last two hours of the Senator's speech have been devoted to two single points. The first was an article in the Washington Union of the 17th of November. I should have let the Senator settle his difficulty with that newspaper in his own way, either here or elsewhere—and I think it would have been more consistent with the dignity of the Senate and of the subject to settle it elsewhere than here; still, it would have brought no comment from me; I should have stood the infliction—if the Senator had not connected my own section of the country with that article in the Washington Union."

"Mr. President, no man in this body knows better than the Senator from Illinois that no such principle as he attacked has ever been asserted by a single slaveholding State in this Union, or a single representative of the slaveholding States. If they have, I demand of that Senator now to say so. Sir, they have not. He cannot show that one of those States, through any of its authorized organs, not even through its newspapers, through none of its Senators, and through none of its Representatives, has ever asserted the right to carry slaves into a sovereign State against its constitution. This being so, he has spent one hour of his speech in order to make capital in Illinois, and that is all. That is the beginning and the end of it. That Senator has no right to arraign my constituents, or the men of the South, for an article in the Washington Union. None, sir, none. He has not a right to make it the occasion for making capital for himself, by seeming to be the defender of the principles of the constitutions of the free States, when no man at the South has ever assailed them. He defends what nobody assails, and he assails what nobody defends."

Sir, the appeal is constantly made from both wings of this Capitol, to the free laborers of the North to rally and meet the aggressive slave power upon our Territories. These appeals come from either weak, distempered, or dishonest minds. It is imbecility or ignorance that trembles at these false alarms. None know better than our opponents that there is not an inch of territory on this continent that free labor will not occupy where our free laborers can live and thrive; their countless throngs are already pressing through the gorges of the Rocky Mountains. If they would elevate and dignify the free laborers of the North, let them pass the bill giving them homesteads from the public domain, instead of giving millions of its acres to colossal corporations to be their future landlords and masters, and perhaps in the end to be reclaimed from them through violence and blood, as the plebeians rescued the public domain, won by their blood from the grasp of the patricians in the days of imperial Rome. But, sir, this kind of practical philanthropy towards the free laborers of the North would cost something; they believe in a cheap philanthropy; long prayers of their political priests, and New England psalmody, are more to their taste and habits of economy. Underground railroads they believe in, because they can run cheap, as their employes can always be paid with checks, certified by their political priests, payable in the other world.

Slavery, sir, has constantly been receding south since the formation of the Union—not from the pressure of a popular fanaticism or increase of vital piety in the North—not from congressional interference—but because slave labor was more profitable southward, from the enhanced value of tropical productions, and their increased demand throughout the world. The gentleman from Missouri, the other day, quoted approvingly from Mr. Randolph's speech:

"The moment the labor of the slave ceases to be profitable to the master, or very soon after it has reached that stage, if the slave will not run away from the master, the master will run away from the slave."

The gentleman from Massachusetts planted his abolition on profit. He thought Yankees might own slaves South, if it would improve their social condition, especially if they found it necessary in order to marry a wife. Now, sir, those who know the Yankees well would not doubt his proposition. They, I think, would concede more to the liberality of the Yankee. They would even believe the Yankee would not object to the wife, even if she happened to own a few negroes.

So far as the issue of the rejection or admission of Kansas as a State is of any practical importance to the South, it has passed away, and they so regard it. So far as the North is concerned, I could not so well express the conclusion as to quote from the gentleman from Virginia, when, on this floor, turning to the North, he said:

"For you, there is the full fruition and the triumphant result. For us, there only lingers a naked principle:

"A barren scepter in our gripe,
Thence to be wrenched with an unlioned hand,
No son of ours succeeding!"

Mr. Chairman, my time will only permit me to add, in conclusion, that in the view I take of all these momentous issues, there is one that transcends all others in the magnitude of fearful consequences. It is not whether Kansas shall be admitted as a slave State or a free State, for the latter is conceded a fixed fact; but it is whether the Democracy of this Union shall be overthrown or survive the coming conflict. To-day it is the only surviving party in the history of our Government; all others have disappeared. To-day it is the only party that carries the flag of our Union; the only party whose ranks, filled with the toiling millions, keep step to the "music of the Union." In its past struggles for ascendancy many have deserted, many have fallen; but, thank God, their places have been filled in its advancing columns. None know so well as our oft-beaten enemies on the other side that their only path to victory is over the prostrate Democracy of this Union.

* The doctrine attributed to the Union's article by Senator DOUGLAS, was subsequently disavowed by the Union itself.

We are now warned by the other side that a crisis has arrived in our political history, and that the fate of this great party is sealed. It may be so. If it be true, God knows I desire not to lift the veil which hangs over the future of my country. I am no alarmist, but I will utter the honest sentiment of my heart, that I as solemnly believe as I believe in my God, that if the Democracy of this Union goes down, the flag of the Union will go down to be trampled in fraternal blood under the feet of northern and southern hosts contending for the empire of this continent. Yes, sir, go down to rise no more—never again to float from the dome of this Capitol.

But, sir, it will not go down. The Democracy of this Union has a higher, it has a divine destiny. Its mission must and will be fulfilled. Its mission in this Republic is to maintain this Union—equality to all its sections, equality to all its citizens in their constitutional, religious, civil, and personal rights. Its mission on this earth is universal emancipation. Wirt, in his eulogy on the immortal Jefferson, the father of Democracy, said:

"From the working of the strong energies within him, there arose an early vision which cheered his youth, and accompanied him through life—the vision of emancipated man throughout the world."

In the war of the crusades, among the gorgeous ensigns which Christian knights bore on the fields of Palestine, there was one banner, plain and unadorned, containing one inscription. Wherever that banner was borne the Saracen ranks gave way, and the shouts of victory from the Christian hosts went up. That banner contained this simple inscription:

"God wills it."

ADMISSION OF KANSAS.

SPEECH OF HON. S. S. MARSHALL, OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

March 31, 1858.

The House being in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. MARSHALL, of Illinois, said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I had not intended, till within the last few days, to submit any remarks of my own on the subject of this much vexed Kansas question. It is entirely exhausted. It is impossible to present anything in the way of novelty or argument, or even of declamation, on a subject which has been so long discussed before the House and before the country.

I do not propose this evening to go into anything like a general discussion of the various points that have been mooted and discussed on this floor; and were it not that this question has assumed an importance in the public mind far beyond what it is entitled to, in my estimation; were it not for the fact that the people of one section of the Confederacy are agitated, and seem to think their peculiar institutions and their constitutional rights are involved in this issue; were it not for the fact that a large portion of the people of the country seem to think that on the result of this question now before the House, depends the perpetuity of the Union; and as serious results may, in fact, follow the action of Congress, it becomes important not only that we should record our votes, but that the country should be informed what were our views and motives for so doing; were it not for these facts, I would have been content to cast a silent vote.

But, sir, as the record in reference to the conduct of the members of this House will be looked to hereafter, and as the Representatives from one section of the Confederacy are charging that those who oppose the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution, are doing it on sectional grounds, and for sectional motives, and that our conduct is governed by anti-slavery sentiments, I wish to place myself right on the record before the House and before the country.

Before coming, however, to any question which legitimately bears on the subject now before the committee, I wish to allude to one or two points, rather incidental than directly, bearing on the questions that have been brought up in the course of this debate.

And, first, I will notice very briefly the fact that it has been, time and again, insinuated by gentlemen coming from one section or another of this Confederation that the opposition, and the sole opposition, to the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution arises from the pressure of anti-slavery sentiments. Now, sir, if gentlemen who make this charge know it to be false, their conduct in making it is scandalously unjust to those who have been, during their whole lifetime, warring against the greatest obstacles in favor of the constitutional rights of the South; and if they do not know it to be false, their ignorance is inexcusable.

I know, Mr. Chairman, that a large portion of those who are opposing the admission of Kansas under this Lecompton constitution are opposed to the admission of any more slave States, and consequently are not willing, as a general rule, to let the people interested settle this question of slavery for themselves. This is the position, as I understand it, of most of the members of the Republican party. It is well known here and elsewhere that I dissent from this view entirely. I am for the perfect equality of the people of all sections, whether they are in the States or Territories.

I think this doctrine of congressional prohibition is sectional, unjust, and dangerous in its tendency, and that if ever a party takes possession of all the branches of this Government acting on that basis, and attempts to carry out that principle, it will lead inevitably to a dissolution of the Union, and a breaking up of this great Confederacy. That is my view about it. But it by no means follows, as is charged by those who are in favor of the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution, that those of us who are opposed to that measure are influenced by any intention or desire to exclude a bona fide slave State. I am opposing it because I will not sanction what I believe to be a gross outrage upon the very principles on which the American Revolution was fought; because I will not sanction frauds which I believe are as deep and black as ever were perpetrated in this or any other country, and because I believe that I would be sanctioning, if I were to vote for it, the miserable spawn which has come from the machinations of the Lecompton conspirators, for I look upon the authors of that constitution as nothing else but conspirators against the liberties of those whose will they ought to have regarded.

Mr. Chairman, that the Lecompton constitution tolerates slavery is not only not my main objection to it, but it constitutes no part of my objection. I state here before the House and the country, that so far as I am concerned, I hold that the people of Kansas have the same right to adopt a pro-slavery constitution, if they are in favor of it, as they have to adopt a free-State constitution. I have no right, in my opinion, and certainly I have no disposition, as a member of this Congress, to dictate or even attempt to influence the action of the people of Kansas on this or any other subject. Upon this question of the right of the people of Kansas to adopt a pro-slavery constitution, if they desire it, I have not a shadow of a doubt. If I could influence their action one way or the other I certainly should not do so. I have not a particle of feeling on the subject, one way or another.

Upon some other occasion I might have thought proper to go into this question at greater length, but I will not do it at this time. I propose hastening through the few points which I intend to present. I will remark, in justification of myself, that I have made no preparation whatever for this discussion. I have had my mind directed to other subjects entirely, and the remarks which I shall make will necessarily be very desultory. The only proper doctrine in regard to this question of slavery is that which I supposed had been adopted and was thoroughly understood by the Democratic party of this country: the doctrine of non-intervention which was embodied in the Kansas-Nebraska bill and in the Cincinnati platform. Upon that idea the contest and canvass for President was made which carried Mr. Buchanan into the presidential chair. I think that at the time of the canvass of 1856 the doctrine of non-intervention was understood by the American people and by the Democratic party. But we are again all at sea. Since this Congress convened, for the purpose of forcing through a favorite project of gentlemen here, we are every day hearing new ideas in regard to the doctrine of intervention and non-intervention which were never dreamed of until now.

Now, sir, what is the doctrine of non-intervention? It is plain and simple, and when you present it to the mind it can be distinctly comprehended and understood. There is no difficulty about it. It is simply this: that the Federal Government shall, in no manner whatever, attempt to dictate or control the local laws or domestic institutions of any State or Territory; that "the people thereof shall be left perfectly free" to determine these matters for themselves; and if they get into a squabble or quarrel among themselves, as they have done in Kansas, that we shall keep our hands off, and have nothing to do with them until they peacefully and quietly, fairly and honestly, settled the form of their government for themselves. Congress has no power, in regard to the Territories, to legislate upon the subject of slavery. Of this, at least, I have no doubt. It is not within the legitimate province of the General Government. But it does not follow that Congress, or any member of Congress, is under any obligation to vote for the admission of new States, either with slavery or without slavery in their constitutions, when there is any other proper and legitimate objection to such admission; want of population, want of presentation by the people themselves for admission, want of fairness, or any other honest and legitimate objection. Sir, if it should appear to my satisfaction that the great body of the population constituting the people of the Territory were felons or outlaws or rebels—as the President calls the people of Kansas—that would be sufficient, in my judgment, not only to lead me, but to force me, acting as the Representative of a free people, and looking to the interests of this great country, to give my vote against the admission of any such State or any such people into this Confederacy. If the people of Kansas were felons or outlaws, or belonged to a degraded race, such as free negroes, who had conferred upon themselves, by their own action, the rights of citizenship; a population which I did not think worthy to be placed on an equality with myself and those I represent, in administering and taking part in the affairs of the Government, I should not hesitate to oppose the admission of such a State into this Confederacy.

But, sir, I will not dwell upon this. There is another point to which I wish to call attention, and that is to what I call the indecent attempt to ostracize, whip in, or read out of the party Democrats whose consciences and judgments will not sanction these frauds. I do not intend to dwell upon this, although it is a subject worthy of the gravest consideration.

There has been an attempt to brand, as rebels and as traitors—notwithstanding what might be the judgment of gentlemen, notwithstanding what their consciences and their constituents might dictate—those who will not bow down to power and lick the hand that attempts to lash them into the traces. For myself, I will say, that I have as strong an attachment for the Democratic party and the Democratic Executive as any man upon this floor or in the country, but I am not a spaniel to be whipped into the service of any man or set of men. I will think and act as the Representative of a great and free people who owe nothing to Presidents or Cabinets. In acting with the Democratic party I do so from my conviction of right and duty, and from no other motive whatever. I will permit no man on earth to think for me, or dictate my course of action. I have the honor of representing the strongest Democratic district in this Union; a district which, with the sectional issue presented in the last presidential contest, increased its Democratic majority more than any other in the country, which swelled the majority for Mr. Buchanan ten thousand over any former vote.

Mr. HUGHES. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. MARSHALL, of Illinois. I will yield to the gentleman with pleasure, if he will ask a direct question, and waive his usual preamble.

Mr. HUGHES. I will try to ask a question without a preamble. It is this: who is it that has attempted to establish this test, and to read men out of the party?

Mr. MARSHALL, of Illinois. That is a very direct question for the gentleman. It is done notoriously by the present Administration. It is done by the organ of the Administration in this city. It is done by the Administration throughout the country; and it is well known that the tenure of office depends upon whether the incumbent will bow down his conscience and his judgment to this Lecompton scheme.

Mr. HUGHES. Has the gentleman been excluded from a Democratic caucus of the whole Democratic party because of his opinion on this question?

Mr. MARSHALL, of Illinois. Not at all; I do not pretend that there has been any direct action, because it so happens that a congressional caucus has no such power conferred upon it, either by the people, the Constitution, or even the Cincinnati platform.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Does the gentleman from Illinois know how soon he may be excluded from a Democratic caucus after to-morrow?

Mr. MARSHALL, of Illinois. I do not know, and I do not care. The matter does not disturb my equanimity for a moment.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Nor mine either.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Illinois. I know that a congressional caucus has no such power. This is a matter of fidelity to the party, to be settled by the conventions of the party in the States, and by the national convention. For myself, I think a man is a good Democrat who always votes the Democratic ticket without scratching, and manfully battles for the principles of his party, the rights of the people, and the Constitution of his country.

Mr. CLARK, of New York. I think if the gentleman refers to the proceedings of last evening, that he will see that this conclusion is not fairly deducible from those proceedings.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Illinois. I do not refer to that; but is it not known to gentlemen on this floor that a paper in this city, recognized as the organ of this Administration, has forgotten the Know Nothing party, the Abolition party, and Black Republican party, and has gone down into the sewers of filth and defamation for the purpose of fishing up epithets to hurl at Democrats upon this floor, denouncing them as traitors and rebels, with other similar choice epithets.

Mr. HUGHES. One more question without a preamble.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Illinois. Yes, sir; if it is without a preamble. [Laughter.]

Mr. HUGHES. Before any party tests were established, did not the gentleman from Illinois meet in caucus repeatedly with gentlemen who were opposed to the Lecompton constitution?

Mr. MARSHALL, of Illinois. The gentleman has been propounding that question a great many times, and I do not know whether he has got a satisfactory answer or not; but permit me to say that those who are in favor of the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution, I do not care what they call themselves, whether Democrats or Know Nothings, have the right to adopt whatever means, after consultation, they may deem proper, which may harmonize them and best subserve the end they have in view. But that is not establishing a party test. Those who are opposed to it, and think it is fraudulent, who think it is a violation of the principles of our Government, if they really want to defeat it, may get together and agree upon such a course as will secure their object. For myself, I have never gone into caucus or consultation with anybody except Democrats, in regard to this or any other political question.

Admission of Kansas—Mr. Marshall.

Ho. of Reps.

Mr. HUGHES. I want to say this: If I can get the floor after the gentleman has concluded his speech, I will give my views on this subject.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Illinois. I have no objection to that, and I have no doubt that the gentleman will throw much additional light on the subject.

I will resume my remarks: Who are the men against whom this crusade is made? Who are the men that are denounced as Free-Soilers, as Abolitionists, as traitors, and rebels? Of what material are they made? It so happens that the anti-Lecompton Democrats who oppose this odious measure (I speak of the measure, and not of those who support it) have to a man got a clean Democratic record. You will find none of your broken-down Free-Soilers among us. It is not in the ranks of the anti-Lecompton Democrats, but in your own that you will find your authors and advocates of the Buffalo platform. Your Hon. JOHN COCHRANES, (now, by the grace of God and special favor of Lecomptonites, chairman of the "Democratic caucus" that is to establish the test of orthodoxy,) your Van Burens, and your Dixes, and your James Gordon Bennetts, and men of that character. There is not a man among us, who, from his first vote down to the present time, has not a clear Democratic record, without spot or blemish, and beyond all suspicion. I invite any gentleman who may desire it to enter into the investigation.

Mr. HUGHES. I will do that.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Illinois. I would like to take up the record of my friend, and a few other of such immaculate Democrats, but I cannot do it to night. I cannot confer that favor upon them.

But, sir, it affords me no pleasure to pursue this line of remark. I would much rather avoid all crimination of every kind, and see our Democratic friends all move on harmoniously together. But one thing is worthy of remark. It so happens that those gentlemen who are so rampant to read us out of the Democratic party are mostly men who have, until very recently, warred against Democracy their whole lives.

It is a good illustration of the old doctrine that new converts are always more zealous than old members of the church, [laughter;] they take a far greater interest in the church than those who have been in it all their lives. I repeat—what you all know to be the fact—that a great portion of these very men, who are now so eager to read out of the Democratic party men who have been in it all their lives, are men who have gone down with other parties, and who have jumped upon the Democratic platform to keep from going to the bottom. I make these remarks in no spirit of crimination. I have no lectures to read these gentlemen for their past sins and transgressions. I was one of those, sir, who received gladly and welcomed cordially the returning prodigals into the bosom of the Democratic party. But I would advise a little more modesty in their deportment for the future. Let their conduct not lead us to suspect that they entered the party only to distract and divide. Let us not be forced to the conclusion that, Judas like, they kissed only that they might more easily betray.

Mr. Chairman, while on this subject of party fidelity, there is one other matter to which I suppose I had as well allude here. It is, I know, not a matter of much importance, and certainly not a thing which disturbs my equanimity a particle; but it has become a subject of remark, and probably deserves some notice. I refer to it the more readily because I know that my sincere regard for my southern friends will not be questioned. There is in the South a certain class of politicians—far from constituting a majority, I am happy to say—who arrogate to themselves a superior wisdom, plume themselves upon their superior Democracy, and claim the right, as if they had a patent from God Almighty for the purpose, to declare what is and what is not Democracy. These men, often as destitute of brains as of modesty, assert by their deportment, and sometimes by their language, a superiority for southern gentlemen and southern Democrats over those who happen to hail from northern States.

Now, sir, for one, I am tired of these peacock gosterings and baseless assumptions. I wish to make no comparisons; I wish to impeach no man's motives or fidelity to his party. But truth and justice to myself and those with whom I act require that I should say, that in all the issues on the slavery question which the Democratic party have made for the maintenance of the constitutional rights of the South, you gentlemen from that section deserve no particular credit for the position you have assumed; you are floating with the current of popular opinion in your own section; you are fighting for your own interests, for your altars and your firesides, your "domestic institutions;" you dare not take any other position; you could not do so and stand before your constituents for a moment.

But how is it with northern Democrats? A more unselfish, devoted, self-sacrificing band of men have never existed in any political organization. In the face of the natural anti-slavery sentiments of our own section—in the face of the Abolition and Free-Soil waves, mountain high, which threatened to engulf us, and which were too often raised and strengthened by the rashness and folly of southern men—we have, year by year, breasted this Free-Soil deluge, and beaten back its fierce waves. We have battled for your rights, not because they were yours, but because we intend always to defend the right, without regard to section, and regardless of consequences. We have done this without a murmur, unaided and alone; for we have been more often crippled by the rashness and assumptions of southern men than strengthened by any aid from them. We have freely, without hesitation, united with you in these issues, by which our ranks have been thinned and broken, and thousands of our bravest captains overwhelmed and driven from the field. We have, without a murmur, united with you in these issues, by which you have been strengthened, until you have been able to break down all opposition, and come up here a united and unbroken column. And now, forgetting the means by which you have been strengthened and we weakened, too many of you have become arrogant and dictatorial, and claim for yourselves all the credit of the victory, and the right to set up new and unheard-of tests of Democracy.

If ever a people deserved commendation for a faithful, unflinching adherence to right and duty, the northern Democracy deserve that commendation. If any people are entitled to gratitude for an unselfish and perilous defense of the rights of others, the northern Democracy ought to have been met with that gratitude. But what are the facts? When the great sectional battle had been fought and won; when the Opposition were, by thousands, abandoning their sectional platform of congressional prohibition; we come up here, and, instead of gratitude, friendship, or even common courtesy, we are met with contumely, denunciation, proscription, insult, and injustice. We are denounced as traitors, rebels, and renegades, because we have determined at all hazards to defend the rights of the white man to govern himself, and to resist to the last every attempt to subjugate him by fraud or violence. We are proscribed because we will not basely bow the knee to power, or yield to the seductive influences of executive patronage.

Sir, I have been taught that Democracy is a glorious principle, emanating from God and having its home in the hearts of honest men. I have been taught that it is based on the golden rule of doing unto others as we would that they should do unto us; that it defends the equal rights of all men, and works injustice to none; that, "like the dews of heaven, it dispenses its blessings to all alike," and resists wrong, fraud, usurpation, and oppression, from whatever quarter they may come; that popular rights constitute its base and that its apex points to the eternal principles of truth and justice. This, sir, is what is understood by Democracy in the humble school where I was educated, and among that gallant people whom I am proud to represent here. As the representative of that principle, that people gave a cordial and almost unanimous vote to Mr. Buchanan for President.

But now, as if to add insult to injury, you have dragged into my presence a hybrid monster, conceived in sin and brought forth in iniquity; the miserable offspring of conspiracy and crime, covered with fraud and bearing with it the marks of infamy; a bastard bantling, disowned, repudiated, loathed, and despised by the people whose child it claims to be; you have dragged into my presence this fetid monster, offensive to my eyes and my nostrils, labeled it "Lecompton constitution," christened it by the name of DEMOCRACY, and ask me to bow down and worship it as my idol. I tell you I will not do it. With my convictions it would be dishonorable in me to do so. You may denounce and proscribe, pile epithet upon epithet, and hurl your anathemas until you are sick with your own folly, and it will all pass by me as the idle winds which I heed not. There is no power on earth that could induce me to sanction this wrong.

And now, let me say to my southern friends, you have carried this thing far enough. You are asking us to take a position upon which we could not and ought not to stand. Before you further heap epithets and denunciation upon us, it would be well for you to pause and study the history of the Democratic party. The sacrifices have been altogether on our side, and not yours. We have never been strengthened one particle by any act of yours. I wish to know what concession you have ever made in our party organization for the purpose of strengthening our hands? What do we owe you? When have we been strengthened in our course upon this floor, or before our constituents, by any concession you have made?

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. If the gentleman will permit me to ask him a question, I desire to know if the southern Democracy have ever asked northern men or any other men to concede anything but their constitutional rights? If we have ever gone beyond the Constitution, we ask you not to concede it. All we ask of you is the Constitution of the country and Democratic principles.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Illinois. I am not aware that you have asked more until now. I have said before my constituents, and before the country, in public addresses, that my conviction is that as far as the legislation of the country up to this time is concerned, the South has asked nothing which is not her right under the Constitution of the United States. But I am sure, if you call this Lecompton constitution a southern measure, you are asking that which is an insult to the people both of the North and South, as I honestly believe it ought to be considered.

Mr. HUGHES. I wish to say a word right here in justice to the gentleman from Illinois. The gentleman has made an insinuation here, in reference to my record.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Illinois. Oh, I cannot yield the floor further. I do not intend to go into that.

Mr. HUGHES. I just wish to say that I challenge that gentleman, or any other gentleman, to assail that record.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Illinois. My friend must excuse me. I do not intend to go into small matters this evening. [Laughter.]

Mr. HUGHES. I do; for I expect to answer you. [Laughter.]

Mr. MARSHALL, of Illinois. The gentleman had better discuss himself, as he seems anxious to make himself conspicuous by attempting to magnify very small things. [Laughter.]

Mr. HUGHES. If I desired to make myself conspicuous, I should seek to array myself against some man of more standing than the gentleman from Illinois. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. MARSHALL, of Illinois. This is not the first time I have seen small things trying to magnify their own importance. It is not the first time I have heard of flies buzzing around and trying to attract the attention of objects much larger than themselves. [Laughter.]

Mr. HUGHES. Buzzing around very dirty places. [Excessive laughter.]

Mr. MARSHALL, of Illinois. The very kind of places in which I should expect to find the gentleman from Indiana. [Continued laughter.]

Mr. HUGHES. It is just the place I find myself, when I follow after you.

35TH CONG...1ST SESS.

Admission of Kansas—Mr. Marshall.

H. OF REPS.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Illinois. Well, I hope the gentleman will enjoy his situation. But I must ask pardon of the committee for indulging in this badinage. I have been led into it unexpectedly. Let it stop here. I have no unkind feelings towards the gentleman from Indiana, and I hope he will so consider it. If he is satisfied now, I am very sure that I am. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, the presentation of this Lecompton constitution to Congress offered the people of the South the best opportunity they have ever had of building up a great national and conservative party, which would have been a bulwark to the constitutional rights of the South in all time to come. And why? What was our difficulty throughout the North during the last presidential canvass, in maintaining the doctrine of the Kansas-Nebraska bill and the Cincinnati platform—the doctrine of leaving the people free to form and regulate their own domestic institutions in their own way, subject only to the Constitution of the United States? What was the difficulty? It was not that there was anything in the doctrine hostile to the sentiments of the great body of the northern people. Our opponents charged that the Democratic party were not acting in good faith, and did not mean what they said, or intend to carry out the principles they professed; that the Democratic was a pro-slavery organization; that we, the men of the North, who were supporting it, were doughfaces, hirelings, doing the bidding of the slaveocracy; and that when the Democrats got into power, they would not leave it to the people of Kansas to settle the matter at the polls, but would force slavery upon them; that the Kansas-Nebraska bill was passed for that very purpose. We denied this charge everywhere, and insisted that the Democratic party was honest in its professions, and that the people would be permitted to frame their constitution and regulate their domestic affairs according to their own will. And I tell you, if we could have satisfied the people of the North that such would be the practical effect of the doctrines of the Democratic party, and of the Kansas-Nebraska bill, the Republican party would have been reduced not only thousands, but hundreds of thousands, and the Democratic representation from the North upon this floor would have been doubled.

Well, sir, here comes up, after the election, this famous Calhoun convention in Kansas; and they frame a constitution which everybody knows—there is no use discussing it—and which the members of that convention know—to be a fraud and a misrepresentation of the will of the people of Kansas. They knew, at the time they assembled, that the people of Kansas expected—for such was the impression everywhere, and many of the delegates were pledged to it beforehand—that when the constitution should be formed it should be submitted to the people, that they might decide whether it embodied their sovereign will or not. When this was done, and when this pro-slavery constitution was formed; when there was nothing to be gained by urging this thing, and when everything was to be gained by a contrary course, if the South had come up in a body and spurned and repudiated this fraud; if they had said, "as we will not submit to, so we will not insist upon, any advantage obtained by wrong or fraud;" if they had declared now, when their motives could not have been questioned for so doing, that they were determined to leave the people free to frame their constitution for themselves, and have slavery or not, as they pleased; that if there was any doubt about there having been a fair expression of the popular will they would have nothing to do with it; that they would hold their hands off until the people should settle it for themselves; if you had done that, you would have given the public confidence in the honesty of your professions, and broken down sectionalism and fanaticism forever. Oh, but this would be intervention! Surely, sir, the meaning of words, as well as the principles of parties, must be undergoing a rapid change. Mr. Calhoun brings a paper here which he calls the constitution of Kansas, but which the people of Kansas, in every mode in which they can speak, declare is not their constitution. Their Delegate upon this floor says it is not their constitution; their Territorial Legislature, the only legal legislative body existing in that Territory, say it is not their constitution, and that they are not asking admission under it. And not only that, the people are invited and encouraged by the Governor and Secretary of State, and by the President, to go to the polls on the 4th of January; and they go to the polls, and say, by ten thousand majority, that it is not their constitution, and that they do not ask admission under it; and I, and those who are acting with me, say we are not satisfied that Kansas is asking admission into the Union at this time, under that or any other constitution. There is a dispute about it; and gentlemen pretend that to say we will keep our hands off; that we will let the people settle it; that when we have become satisfied that the people have settled the question, and have organized a government, then we will consider whether they have sufficient population, whether they are the right kind of a people to be admitted into the Union; but until they have done that, we will have nothing to do with the matter; I say gentlemen pretend that this is intervention in the affairs of the people of a Territory, and that to force a constitution upon them which they utterly repudiate, and force it, if need be, at the point of the bayonet, is non-intervention. Well, sir, according to my view, it would be non-intervention with a vengeance.

Let me make another remark or two in regard to this thing of proscription. In 1854, the issues upon which the Whig party had stood, passed away. Their great leader had gone down to his grave. After the dissolution and disorganization of that party, there sprang up in the country two great parties; and the rapidity with which they spread and gained strength appalled the heart of every national and conservative man throughout this great country.

The Democratic party seemed to be melting away like snow before them. On one side was the Know Nothing party, and on the other the Republican party, which seemed to spring into existence spontaneously after the passage of the Kansas-Nebraska bill. The Democrats were flying before them, both on the right hand and on the left, and the spaniel-like time-servers of the party were running howling back to their kennels to evade the contest, and there lurked to await the result of the fierce battle that was approaching.

Terror spread throughout the whole country. Not only the defeat, but the destruction of the Democratic party seemed to be almost inevitable. At that time, when cowards fled and shrunk in terror; when the weak and vacillating were skulking into hiding places, and when men, now loud in denunciations of those who do not act with them on this question, were hesitating to know where they should go, and doubting what should be their course for the purpose of saving themselves; at that time of darkness and terror and dread, there came on the arena two warriors who attracted the attention and eyes of this whole nation. Without hesitation, without doubt, they plunged into the contest; and wherever the clouds lowered darkest, and the battle was fiercest, their stalwart forms were seen driving among the thickest ranks of their enemies, both Republican and Know Nothing. Their war-cry and the words of fire which they breathed forth were caught up and repeated from every stump and in every paper throughout the land. Those who had fainted took courage; those who had fled turned back and began to think that there was still some hope and some chance of saving the Democratic party from destruction and dissolution. The exultant enemy began to quail before their blows. The strong-hearted Democrats rallied around these gallant and victorious captains. By degrees they began to regain the fields they had lost. The enemy, North and South, were at length beaten down, and the banners of the great Democratic party were again unfurled in triumph before the eyes of the nation.

And who were these leaders who came forward at this opportune time, and saved the Democratic party from destruction? One was a northern man, the author of the Kansas-Nebraska bill; the other was a southern man, the present Governor of the much-honored "Old Dominion." Two years have hardly passed away, and now these men, who made the issues on which Mr. Buchanan was brought into power—these men who turned the tide and saved the party from destruction—are now proscribed and hunted down, as if they were in fact felons and traitors; and miserable time-servers are endeavoring to blacken and befoul their characters with their slime. My God, Mr. Chairman, was such ingratitude ever heard of in any country? [Several voices: "Never!"] And why are they read out of the party? One, the author of the Kansas-Nebraska bill, and who ought to know something of what that bill means, and of whose fidelity to the Constitution and to the rights of the South there ought to be no question, says he is not satisfied that the people of Kansas were left to settle and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way. He is not satisfied that this constitution is a fair and legal embodiment of their will; there is a doubt about it; and he would rather wait, keep hands off, and let the matter be settled by themselves, before he was called to act upon it. For that, and that alone, the hue and cry was raised that he has abandoned the doctrine of non-intervention, and he must be read out of the Democratic party; and that, too, by the authors of the Buffalo platform, and others of that kidney. And the great organ for the purpose of doing that is the celebrated New York Herald, the leading organ of John C. Frémont in the last presidential contest.

Mr. Chairman, I am as warm a friend of Mr. Buchanan as he has on this floor. I expended a considerable sum out of my scanty fortune, and a great deal of time and labor, for the purpose of helping to bring him into the presidential chair. From the time I left this House after the memorable session of 1856, until the polls were closed and the votes counted in my district and State, I scarcely laid my head one night on my own pillow at home. Night and day, amid storms and sunshine, where ever there was a blow to be struck and a battle to be fought, my weak arm was found attempting to strike that blow, and to assist in that contest. I am as devoted to the principles of the party, and as anxious for the success of this Administration, as any man can be. But let me tell you, Mr. Chairman, that throughout this country there are more than half a million of men who supported Mr. Buchanan with all their hearts, and who are his best friends, who never will sanction this Lecompton movement under any circumstances. Let me tell you that they are men who owe Presidents and Cabinets nothing, and who expect nothing at their hands. They will think for themselves. And, if the President wants to maintain the integrity of the party; if he wants to have the respect of those who brought him into power, and who love and venerate him; if he expects to leave a bright record, which those who love the party and those who love his name may look upon with respect and love and regard hereafter, he must call off his hounds. He must drive his spaniels that are barking at the heels of better men than themselves, back to their kennels; and the dirty puppies who are spewing forth their filth through their dirty sheets here and through the country, must be muzzle. [Laughter.]

This course cannot be followed through all time. If the integrity of the Democratic party is to be maintained, this thing must stop. Blows will not be always struck on one side. It is not in human nature to tolerate this thing forever. If you keep hammering a man over the head—I care not how good a friend he may be—he will at length resent the indignity, and return blow for blow. There is no doubt that such must be the result. If the President consults his own interests, the interests of the Administration, and of the party of which he is the guardian, I repeat, he must stop this thing.

Mr. KUNKEL, of Maryland. Does the gentleman mean to say that the President of the United States has incited what the gentleman thinks proper to denominate the little petty puppies of newspapers to make this war on any man or set of men?

Mr. MARSHALL, of Illinois. I will say this to the gentleman. I would be glad to believe otherwise; but I am sorry to say that the evidence forces me to the conclusion that the President favors this thing. The special organ of the Administration here, supposed to be in the confidence of the President, has been most bitter and vituperative. The Pennsylvanian, also supposed to be in the immediate confidence of the President, has been equally bitter and vituperative.

35TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Ho. OF REPS.

Mr. KUNKEL, of Maryland. Without any personal knowledge of the fact, I pronounce it a libel upon the President.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Illinois. If the gentleman has no personal knowledge, he ought not to speak about a matter he knows nothing about. [Laughter.] Mr. Chairman, I say this in no unkind spirit. I say it because this thing has been pursued long enough. I say it because it is unjust—unjust to men who are as true friends of the President as any man in the country, and have as little idea of abandoning his general support. Surely, sir, the President and the Administration have mistaken the relation which they bear to the party and the country. Why are we called traitors? Whom have we betrayed? To whom do we owe allegiance? Sir, we are not sent here to represent or reflect the will of the Executive. We do not come here to register the edicts of a master. We owe allegiance, first, to the Constitution, and then to our constituents; and we owe it to no other tribunal or power on earth. If our fidelity is brought in question, we appeal to our constituents to determine the matter, and their verdict is final and conclusive. If they are satisfied, who has any right to complain? The President has his appropriate functions—members of Congress have theirs. He has no right to interfere with the passage of bills through Congress, and it is a breach of the privileges of the House for him to do so. We, who aided in elevating the President to the exalted office which he holds, are his friends, not his slaves. He is our servant, not our master. If there is any treason, it must be on the part of the servant, and cannot be on the part of the master who owes no allegiance. The Democracy of Illinois, who supported him so cordially, owe him none, and have a right to think and act for themselves.

I was about to remark, when interrupted a while ago, that there is something very singular in the fact that upon every question except one, men may think and act as they please, without their party fidelity being called in question. The President has recommended a great many measures, and there is not a Democrat in Congress who supports the President in every position taken in his message. If there is such a man here I should like him to show himself. And yet there is no complaint. Men may oppose the President on his Army bill, on his Nicaragua policy, on his Treasury note bill, and upon other measures, and there is no complaint. There is something that men must notice as remarkable in regard to this, and that is that this thing of proscription and denunciation stops just as soon as you reach Mason and Dixon's line. It is not right, sir. It ought to be stopped. And those from the North, and from the South, who are in the confidence of the President in regard to this measure, ought to say to him to hold off his hands, for every one knows that upon the least intimation on the part of the President to these papers that are feeding and fattening on his patronage, that this thing was unpleasant to him, it would be stopped in a moment. Everybody knows that.

Mr. Chairman, there is one feature which has pervaded the discussions of this Kansas question during the entire session, that could hardly fail to have attracted the attention of the most casual observer. I allude, sir, to the extreme anxiety many professed Democrats have shown to be able to make some point, or find some plausible ground of attack, against Judge DOUGLAS, or the Illinois delegation in the House, or even the State and the Democracy we have the honor to represent. Many have seemed to think, if they could only hunt up some fact that would throw discredit upon that Senator, or weaken him in the esteem of the country, they had accomplished a great end, and all that was necessary to establish their own superior statesmanship. It is every day becoming more and more apparent, that the extraordinary bitterness and vindictiveness manifested in this contest, has resulted from the scheming of aspiring demagogues, who would move heaven and earth to break down and discredit that distinguished statesman. The war has been, to a great extent, a personal one; and, to accomplish their purpose, a course has been pursued which never could have been dictated by sound policy, the interests of the country, or of the Democratic party.

The assaults which have been made upon the State of Illinois and her Democracy, have been treated with indifference and contempt. They deserve neither notice or consideration. I do not propose a defense of my native State now. She needs none. Her own history and her present proud position constitute her own vindication. In her natural resources; in rapid development and material prosperity; in the gallantry of her sons on the field of battle; in their devotion to the Constitution, the Union, and the rights of every section of the country; in their unyielding devotion to the Democratic party and Democratic principles; in all, sir, that can make one of her sons proud of the land that gave him birth, and that has nourished and sustained him, Illinois stands this day without a parallel, the pride of the country, the admiration of all intelligent observers. I thank my God daily, sir, that my lot has been cast among her hardy sons. And as long as I receive their approval, and retain their confidence, I can look upon the frowns of power, the denunciations of a hireling press, and the sneers of hungry sycophants, with perfect indifference. The Democracy of Illinois, sir, have never faltered or failed in the discharge of their duty. She has never given any other than a Democratic vote for President. When many I see around me, and who now claim to be the only "simon pure" Democrats, were battling in the ranks of the enemy; when the storm of war raged heaviest, and the Democracy of other States have been defeated and driven from the field by the fierce charges of the enemy, our forces have never faltered—our columns have never been broken. No odds what array was brought against them; no odds what obstacles presented themselves, the Democracy of Illinois have trampled down the opposition, and proudly borne their flag to victory. And these are the people, sir, that you would now read out of the Democratic party! Mr. Chairman, I find it difficult to realize the fact that such ingratitude, and such consummate folly can possibly exist among men calling themselves Democrats. But we, at least, have the consolation of knowing that if we are forced to separate, we owe you nothing—absolutely nothing. We have faithfully discharged our duty, without fee or reward. We have battled manfully for the right because it was the right, and from no selfish considerations. We have fought bravely for the Constitution and the Union; because, with all our hearts, we love the Constitution and the Union. We have battled day and night, year after year, for the constitutional rights of the South, because they were their constitutional rights, and because we wish to do justice to our brethren of every portion and section of this broad land.

Of all the States, the most true to the Constitution and to the Democratic party, always bold and prominent in the fight, Illinois has reaped none of the fruits of victory. Her sons have often been leaders in the charge, and first to scale the ramparts of the enemy; yet the spoils of victory have always been divided among others. From the moment she became a sovereign State to the present time, she has never faltered in her adherence to the national Democracy. With men of acknowledged talents and statesmanship in her midst, not one of her sons has ever, at any time, received a first-class appointment from the Federal Government. Her claims in this respect have been disregarded. Notwithstanding all this, we have adhered to our faith and battled for the right without a murmur. And now, sir, mere fledglings in the party—men who have devoted the best part of their lives to the service of the enemy, have undertaken the task of denouncing and branding us as traitors and renegades.

But the honorable gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SMITH] has made himself conspicuous by his assaults upon Illinois and her distinguished Senator. Following the example of ladies of doubtful reputation, he, too, seems desirous of patching up his own political character by assailing that of other men. He has arrogated to himself a superior sanctity, and stands up in the market-places and "thanks God that he is not as these publicans and sinners." Towards the close of his singular speech he abandons, for a time, generalities and insinuations, and attempts by distinct charges to assail the motives of Judge DOUGLAS and his associates. One of these arraignments is in these words:

"Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I will say this in conclusion: that the delegation from Illinois, or a portion of them at any rate, met together here, when Congress assembled, to consider the course which a certain gentleman in the other end of the Capitol should pursue, and the means he should use, in order to secure his reelection to the United States Senate. I say that much; and I will make out the case when I have the time. I say that certainly extraordinary action has resulted in a concerted movement, having an eye alone to his reelection."

I have already stated on the floor of the House, that this charge is wholly and entirely destitute of truth. It has no foundation whatever in fact. I allude to it now, for the purpose of adding that the honorable member ought to have known at the time that it could not be true. It was known throughout the whole country (the matter was discussed in the newspapers some time before Congress convened) that the Senator from Illinois was opposed to the unqualified admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution. Upon his arrival in this city, some days before Congress convened, almost his first act was to wait on the President, and state to him frankly his views in regard to this question. Their meeting was said to be cordial, and their conference frank and friendly, but their differences on this question were also said to be radical and irreconcilable. An account of this visit and conference was at the time published in the various papers throughout the country, and ought to have been known to the honorable gentleman. I take it for granted, however, that he had forgotten or overlooked these facts which were so well known to the whole country.

The honorable member has been equally unfortunate in the other specific charge which he thought proper to make. It is equally baseless, and equally destitute of the semblance of truth. That charge is made in the following language:

"Let me say here, also, that Mr. Calhoun wrote to Judge DOUGLAS, not as a Senator, but as a friend, stating the plan that was to be pursued, and asking his advice in reference to it. No answer to that letter was ever received, but the Chicago Times came out and indorsed the proposed plan. I state, as a fact, which will not be disputed in any quarter, that Senator DOUGLAS, not as a Senator, but as a conspicuous friend of this gentleman, was written to in the month of September, asking his advice as to the course to be pursued in the submission of the constitution, and that he never responded to that letter by dissent or affirmation. I repeat, the Chicago Times, understood to be under his influence, was published, containing an article indorsing the suggestions of that letter. I have not time to go into this question as I would like; but such are the facts in relation to this matter."

Mr. Chairman, I am utterly amazed that any gentleman, and especially the honorable member, should travel out of his path and his line of argument for the purpose of bringing forward and placing on record a charge of this character against a distinguished leader of his own party; and that leader a man who has been more prominent, open, bold, and constant in the advocacy of the constitutional rights of the South, and the principles of the Democratic party, than any man now living. If the charge were true, the propriety of that gentleman bringing it forward in the manner and under the circumstances in which he lugged it into his speech, would be at least questionable; but what will the House and the country think of it when I state, what I now do, broadly and distinctly, that in every essential particular it is utterly destitute of foundation or truth? Let me be distinctly understood. It is not contended that Judge DOUGLAS ever wrote to Mr. Calhoun on the subject. The charge plainly and distinctly insinuates, rather than directly made, is that the author of the Kansas-Nebraska act, not openly and boldly, but in an underhand and skulking manner, indicated to Calhoun, through the columns of the Chicago Times, the mode of submission of the constitution which was adopted by the Lecompton convention. I repeat, sir, that the charge is as destitute of truth as any charge could possibly be. Judge DOUGLAS is in no manner responsible for the editorial conduct of the Chicago Times. That is an independent Democratic journal, friendly, in the main, to the distinguished Senator from Illinois; but its editorial conduct is in charge of a gentleman who thinks, acts, and writes for himself, without submitting to the direction or dictation of any one. But this disavowal is not important. The most amazing fact in reference to this calumny is, that no such article as the one indicated by the honorable gentleman from Virginia has ever, at any time, appeared in the columns of the Chicago Times. This fact, at least, if it existed could be easily proven, and I defy the gentleman to produce the evidence. If he fails, which he most assuredly will, the charge is not only shown to be false, but utterly desitute of foundation or plausibility from the beginning.

I do not, Mr. Chairman, charge the honorable gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SMITH] with willful falsehood or misrepresentation. Far be that from me. I have too high an appreciation of what is due to this body, and to the position of the honorable gentleman, even to insinuate such a charge for a moment. I would not believe for a moment that any gentleman occupying a seat on this floor, much less one so distinguished as the honorable member, would be guilty of so base a fabrication, or of giving it currency, knowing it to be false. But what I complain of, what the friends of Judge DOUGLAS have a right to complain of, is that the gentleman should, without investigation, pick up from the purlieus and streets of Washington anonymous slanders against a distinguished statesman, fabricated by plunder-gorged parasites, and the miserable, leprous, hungry pack who are ready to bark at the heels of any one who they may think is under the ban of power—slanders which have been floating around the streets of Washington all winter, but which the friends of Judge DOUGLAS deemed wholly unworthy of their notice. We have a right to complain that so distinguished a gentleman should lend his name to give currency to charges which before were unworthy of notice, and allow himself to become the conduit through which this miserable spawn of malice and defamation should be poured forth upon the House, and sent out to infect the moral atmosphere of the whole country.

Mr. Chairman, I shall append to my remarks, when printed [see appendix] the article which Mr. Calhoun has indicated as the one which he supposed reflected the views of Judge DOUGLAS on the question of submission of the constitution to be framed at Lecompton. Calhoun first saw it in a Kansas paper, copied from the Chicago Times. It appeared first in the Daily Times of the 14th October, 1856. I have evidence, satisfactory to myself, that Judge DOUGLAS knew nothing of this article at the time it appeared, and probably never saw it until I furnished him, a few days ago, a copy of the Times in which it appeared. But, be this as it may, it will be seen that the article, instead of sustaining, utterly disproves the charge made by the honorable member from Virginia; and I have no hesitation in saying, that if the mode of submission, indicated in that article, had been adopted in good faith, the result would have been satisfactory to the people of Kansas, and to the whole country, ultra factionists, North and South, alike excepted.

Mr. Chairman, I see that the time allotted to me has nearly expired. I have been led entirely out of the line of remarks I proposed to myself when I obtained the floor. I intended, when I arose, to attempt to meet the arguments which have been made and so often repeated on the other side. I think I could have shown, to the satisfaction of any candid man, that there is no application on the part or in behalf of the people of Kansas, or the Territory of Kansas, or the State of Kansas, for admission into the Union; that no such question is properly pending before Congress; that a false claim has been raised about this whole matter; that this Lecompton constitution is in no proper sense the constitution of Kansas, and in no proper sense embodies the will of her people; and that it is a miserable piece of most wretched jugglery, a most bare and unblushing fraud. But I see that I cannot now go into these questions at all. They have probably all been more ably discussed by others than I could possibly discuss them. It is probably well that I have been led out of the beaten track, for I am sure that I have thereby had more of the attention of members than I should otherwise have done.

APPENDIX.

The following is the article which appeared in the Chicago Times, October 14th, 1856, which has been indicated by Mr. Calhoun as the one which he supposed reflected the views of Mr. DOUGLAS in regard to the mode in which the constitution framed at Lecompton should be submitted to the people of Kansas for their ratification or rejection:

"KANSAS—THE CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION.—The convention which was elected in Kansas to frame a State constitution for that Territory, will soon meet again. They cannot fail to have observed, what all the rest of the world has observed, that the voice of the people of Kansas is in favor of a free State. We know not what may be the purpose or the feelings of the delegates upon the question of slavery, but the recent election has demonstrated that nothing else than a constitution which shall exclude and prohibit slavery, will be accepted by the people of the Territory. That fact is so patent, that no man can shut his eyes to it.

"It is said that the convention, when elected, was unanimously pro-slavery; that we know to be untrue; we know that there were many delegates who were in favor of obeying the wishes of the people; and a majority in favor of submitting their action, no matter what it was, to popular approval or rejection at the polls. What that convention will do, or what it will not do, we have not the means of knowing. But we know that any attempt to force a pro-slavery constitution upon the people without the opportunity of voting it down at the polls, will be regarded, after the recent expression of sentiment, as so decidedly unjust, oppressive, and unworthy of a free people, that the people of the United States will not vote for it. It would add thousands to the vote of the Republican party in every State of the Union, and give to that organization what it has never had yet—a show of justice and truth.

"To the Democratic members of that convention the course is plain. The people have decided in favor of a free State; though they have not voted on the naked issue of free State or slave State. Two thirds of the Democratic party in Kansas have voted with the 'free-State' party at the recent election, in order to make the popular decision more emphatic. As Kansas must be a free State, even those persons in the Territory who are known as 'pro-slavery' men must recognize in the late election a decision which must not be slighted nor put at defiance. To that expression of the popular will there should be a graceful, if not a cheerful submission. Kansas is to be a free State! That fact being ascertained, let the convention frame a constitution to suit her best interests upon all other questions, and let the prohibition of slavery be put in it, clearly, and without quibble, plainly, without disguise, explicitly, broadly, and firmly. Let the convention then submit that constitution to the people. If it be adopted, Kansas will come into the Union at the next session, and the Republican party will expire for want of sustenance. If any members of the convention desire to prolong the controversy, or to have a regular, direct vote upon slave State and free State, let a free-State constitution—the Topeka constitution, divested of such of its provisions as time has shown to be unsuitable—and a slave-State constitution be prepared. Let them both be submitted to the people—the vote to be 'free-State constitution, yes,' or 'free-State constitution, no'; 'slave-State constitution, yes,' or 'slave-State constitution, no.' Let them, if they desire to vote in favor of a slave State, have the opportunity; but let the constitution be submitted to the popular vote, and at an early day.

"Let the present convention submit this matter to the people without delay, and have the long controversy settled finally, and in the only effectual manner that is possible. In six months after the admission of Kansas Black Republicanism will be no more."

ADMISSION OF KANSAS.

SPEECH OF HON. JAMES HUGHES, OF INDIANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

March 31, 1858.

The House being in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. HUGHES said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I have sought the floor this evening for the purpose of replying to the speech delivered this afternoon by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BURLINGAME.] I had expected and desired, some days ago, again to mingle in the discussion of this Kansas question; not that I hoped to throw any new light upon it after the very elaborate examination which it has undergone, but because some things had been said in the course of the debate which I felt impelled to answer. Owing, however, to the great competition for the floor, I abandoned the idea of speaking again; and the intention to do so was not revived until the very extraordinary speech of the gentleman from Massachusetts, delivered this evening. I have a few comments to make upon that speech. I have already addressed the House upon this subject, and have given the prominent reasons which will control my vote. And, sir, in speaking upon it, I have not spoken as a northern man, nor as a southern man, nor as a man reflecting the views of any section of this country; and I hope the day may never come when, in making my record as one of the legislators of this nation, I shall give utterance to sentiments confined to any section. I addressed myself to the question in its bearings upon the whole country, both North and South; and in what I have to say this evening, I shall not forget, I trust, that this is one branch of the Congress of the United States.

I do propose, however, for a very short time, to bring before the committee a subject that, in my humble opinion, is exceedingly small. I mean the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. MARSHALL,] and the speech which he has just delivered. The gentleman was pleased, in the course of his remarks, when I put a question to him that was pertinent to the subject under discussion, and which legitimately grew out of the positions which he assumed and the arguments he advanced, to make an allusion to my record. I am a humble man, yet my record is, to me, of as much importance as the record of any other gentleman is to him. And, sir, this is not the first time that this insinuation has been made upon the floor of this House. Sir, I owe no allegiance to southern men, or to northern men, or to any other men, except the constituency who sent me here. When I vote I shall vote the convictions of my judgment, and bid defiance to every section.

I have to say simply, that the man, be he representative or sovereign, prince or peasant, leader or follower, who, in this Hall or elsewhere, imputes to me, at the present time or in the past, any sympathy with the Free-Soil party, the Abolition party, or any other one-idea party that has ever disturbed the peace of this country, is a liar, and makes a charge which he cannot sustain. I well understand that gentlemen living outside of my district and State (I, humble as I am, have had my enemies) may gather up worn-out, refuted, and repudiated charges of the Republican party, and reproduce them upon this floor. I believe that they amount to this: that on certain occasions I have seen proper to bolt the Democratic nominations, but not when involving any question of Free-Soilism, or any other question of principle, nor when I was in any way bound by them. Sir, I plead guilty to the charge; and twice have different constituencies, one reaching from the center of the State to her western border, and the other from the center of the State to her eastern border, acquitted me of all blame arising out of that charge of bolting the regular Democratic nomination. Whenever I am not in honor bound to submit to it, and whenever principle and conscience lead me to disregard it, I shall do so; but I shall boldly give my banner to the breeze, and have no apologies to make to the men from the South, to the men from the North, or men from any other section of this Confederacy.

The gentleman from Illinois was pleased, in the form of an insinuation, to reproduce this charge, and then abandon it under the idea that it was an exceedingly small matter. A matter which is of sufficient importance to find an expression in the speech of a Representative upon this floor, which conveys an insinuation against the political integrity of any other member, is a matter of sufficient importance, when interrogated, to stand up to; and, sir, the man who will make such an insinuation, and then evade it, is like him who does the act of the coward, "who raises his arm to strike, and has not the courage to give the blow."

The gentleman from Illinois has occupied this committee with a long and rambling discourse, peculiarly bitter in its character and far below the average standard, low as it is, of congressional debate. The principal themes of his discourse were reading out of the party, consistency, and matters of that kind. I well recollect the position of that gentleman at the commencement of this session. He has alluded to newspaper reports. I remember, sir, that at the beginning of this session, that insidious and treacherous doctrine which the gentleman now is proclaiming, first manifested itself upon the surface of the politics of the country. The public press attributed to him alone, of the Illinois delegation, the position of standing aloof from it. That gentleman then felt himself called upon to come out in a card in the Union newspaper—that same debased and despised organ, as he would represent it, of which he speaks with so much contempt—and therein he attempted to define his position. I believe the amount of it was this: "We expect to reëlect Judge DOUGLAS to the Senate; and as for me upon this Kansas question, I am waiting for the facts." Yet that gentleman comes here to-night and speaks of the Lecompton constitution as an illegal instrument—as an instrument tainted by frauds, conceived in sin, and brought forth in iniquity, corrupt from the hour of its birth.

Admission of Kansas—Mr. Hughes.

HO. OF REPS.

If he is sincere to-night, he dissembled, cloaked, and concealed his sentiments then, with all his professions of independence and honesty. He dissembled and concealed his sentiments when he published this card in the Union newspaper. Oh, yes, "we expect," "we," the Democracy of Illinois, to reëlect Judge DOUGLAS to the Senate.

The gentleman says his district gave Buchanan fifteen thousand majority. Yes, and that may account for his hanging fire when all the balance of the Illinois delegation went off against the Lecompton measure; because his constituents were loyal and true; because they stood firmly by the Administration, and true to the Democratic flag.

But "we expect to elect Judge DOUGLAS to the Senate." Yes, sir, that explains the "milk in the coconut." He wished to triumph with Judge DOUGLAS, and has given rise to all our difficulties, and now threatens to destroy the integrity of the Democratic party.

"Vaulting ambition which o'erleaps itself,
And falls on t'other side,"

The gentleman was pleased to institute a comparison between himself and myself, and spoke of flies. The simile is the gentleman's own, and he cannot evade it. I take his own simile, and I respectfully submit to the judgment of the committee, which had the worst end of it, the flies, or the substance around which the flies congregated? I said that flies were accustomed to buzz around very dirty places. The gentleman said I was accustomed to such places. Yes, sir, politically speaking, I am. I have been accustomed for some time to make war upon, and be made war upon by, the Black Republican party, as dirty a political substance, in my judgment, as can be found; and when I find gentlemen who have heretofore called themselves Democrats, gravitating towards that party—

Mr. STEWART, of Pennsylvania. I call the gentleman to order. It is not in order to indulge in personalities.

Mr. HUGHES. I am dealing with the Black Republican party.

Mr. GOOCH. To carry out the gentleman's simile of the flies, I desire to know if the gentleman derived any sustenance from the Black Republican party with which he came in contact? [Laughter.]

Mr. HUGHES. No, sir. They took the plums all out of the pudding in the last Congress, when they plundered the United States Government to such an extent that in self-defense they had to expel some of their own members for corruption. [Great laughter.] I say that when gentlemen who have heretofore been recognized as healthy and sound members of the Democratic party organization, become identified with that party which draws around it all the flies and crows and buzzards that the political horizon affords, they ought to abstain from offensive personalities towards others.

Now, sir, let me pass from this subject, offensive as it must be to the committee. I said at the commencement of my remarks that I was induced to trespass upon the attention of the committee by the very extraordinary speech made by the gentleman from Massachusetts, upon the other side of the House. That speech contained some statements to which I would have been glad to have replied on the spot, but I could not get the floor; and I avail myself now of the earliest opportunity of giving them such notice as I think they deserve.

It was a very extraordinary speech, sir; one which contained offensive language; one which was arrogant in its manner; and one which, in my humble opinion, called for a reply—not that it contained any argument, for of that it was totally devoid; but because the speaker seemed desirous to challenge attention, and to bring himself into notice. In short, he seemed ambitious of increasing the notoriety he already enjoys. I have some remarks to make upon that very extraordinary speech.

That gentleman was pleased to denounce as "dough-faces," the Democrats upon this floor representing northern constituencies, who, in this most trying hour to our institutions, adhere to those great principles which the people vindicated in 1856 at the polls. He was pleased to denounce these men as dough-faces. He proclaimed that the mission of the Republican party was to exterminate them; and spoke of trampling under foot with scorn certain of their doctrines! Well, sir, there has been some controversy as to the origin and etymology of this word dough-face. I believe in newspaper literature its first syllable is spelled "d-o-u-g-h"; but the correct etymology is "d-o-e," a female deer; and I think that it derives significance from the fact that that animal is exceedingly timid, and when it comes to the water and sees its own image reflected, it starts back with affright. It well becomes the gentleman from Massachusetts to talk about dough-faces—this Don Quixote of the North, this gentleman from the land of Garisons and Sumners, the land of steady habits, where Kalloch preaches, and Dalton divorce cases are tried! [Laughter.] Well it becomes that gentleman to talk about timidity, with his blustering manner, his vociferating kind of speech, throwing his arms about, &c. I called him Don Quixote; let me correct the figure, for he much more resembled the antagonist of that famous knight—the windmill. [Laughter.] Dough-faces, forsooth! Sir, this is not the first time that denunciations have been hurled at northern men who have seen proper to stand by the Administration and the Constitution.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HUGHES. Certainly; this is the gentleman who read the essay from the stand, and I will listen to what he has to say.

Mr. FOSTER. I desire to know if John Randolph did not apply the same term dough-face to the same class of men under the same circumstances?

Mr. HUGHES. I would ask the gentleman if he is a member of the historical society of the State from which he comes? I presume he is, and I respectfully suggest to him to pursue that question at his leisure as a member of that society. [Laughter.]

I said this was not the first time that this thing had been done. Why, sir, a gentleman upon this floor—Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois—made a remark in reference to myself some days ago, in an essay which he read upon this floor; but whether he wrote it or not, this deponent saith not. [Laughter.] He said "the gentleman from Indiana," referring to myself, "had been put forth by our southern friends to be shot down in the outposts of this controversy." Well, sir, in reference to that matter I have this to say: if I am shot down in this controversy upon the outposts, it will be an honorable death. It will be a post of honor, and it will be a death met in defense of the outposts of the Constitution; and I will say to the gentleman, in the language of the poet of old,

"Dulce et decorum est pro patria mori."

But God forbid that I should ever be shot as a deserter, or that I should be captured, as the gentleman has been, in the attempt to desert the flag of my country.

Dough-faces! says the gentleman from Massachusetts. I am glad he has given me the opportunity to declare upon this floor, that the only men who, in this trying struggle, have to meet responsibility, are those men whom he is pleased to denigrate dough-faces. Sir, the man who represents a southern constituency has an easy task to perform in voting for any measure that savors of permitting the peculiar institution. The man who, like the gentleman from Massachusetts, represents that one idea, crazy, irreclaimable Boston fanaticism, which worships in truth "an idolatrous myth" under the name of liberty, has an easy task to perform in voting against such a measure. But those men whom he has taunted with a want of moral courage, with a want of faithfulness to the Constitution, with a want of firmness, it seems to me are the only true conservative men in this national council, and who are in danger of being ground to powder between the two extremes. Will does it become that gentleman to talk to me of crouching to southern men, and of pandering to the vices and peculiarities of southern society. That gentleman made a statement here which I brand as untrue. These dough-faces, said he, come into this Hall and say one thing while they preach another story to their constituents. Sir, if the gentleman will go to my district and read the newspapers of his own party at this hour, he will find that they are publishing that which is in substance true—that I said in the presence of many of my constituents upon a temporary visit to my own State, that "if every stump in Kansas were a negro, every tree upon her soil a slavedriver, and every twig upon the trees a lash to scourge the negro to his daily toil, I would vote for the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution to preserve the peace of the whole country; and if my constituents did not like it, and would let me know it, I would resign. There are those within the sound of my voice who heard me make that declaration, and I have yet to hear from my constituents that they disapprove of my sentiments or my course.

Without going into detail, and discussing or expressing the sentiments of the Democracy of Indiana, which, in my opinion, have been somewhat misrepresented upon this floor, I undertake to say, that though divisions may distract my constituents, nine tenths of the Democracy of my district will be found to indorse the course I have taken upon this floor.

Let me avail myself of this occasion to say that, come what may, I intend to submit my conduct to the verdict of my constituency, although it is a district which was represented in the last Congress by an Opposition member. I intend to face the music on this question. Those who have represented that I expect to take any other course, little know me. I will come back to this Hall approved, indorsed, sustained by my constituency, or I will go to private life, consoling myself with the reflection that—

"Truth crushed to earth will rise again!"— and with the further reflection that, if this country is to be again cursed with a Black Republican majority in this Hall,

"When vice prevails, and impious men bear sway,
The post of honor is a private station."

A word or two more in regard to the noisy partisan from Massachusetts. Will does it become that man to say that the northern men who stand here in defense of this Administration are inconsistent, while, in the next breath, he disavows all claims to consistency, and says that he goes for the Crittenden amendment, his antecedents to the contrary notwithstanding. He disavows all claims to consistency, and goes blindly for the purpose of defeating the Democratic party. What is his logic on this subject? Why, that the Crittenden amendment is the easiest mode of making Kansas a free State. He talks about nailing doctrines and nailing parties. It is a very easy matter to nail him, on this occasion, to the counter, like a base counterfeit as he is—

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman must remember that it is not in order to indulge in personalities on the floor of the House.

Mr. HUGHES. Politically speaking. [Laughter.] I speak in a Pickwickian and parliamentary sense. [Laughter.] He says it is the best mode of making Kansas a free State. Therein, sir, lies all his statesmanship on this question. Since this question was agitated before the masses, an authoritative exposition of constitutional law has been promulgated from this Capitol—from the highest constitutional authority—from that oracle of the Constitution which I intend to respect and to obey as long as a beneficent Government spreads around me its protection, its Constitution and its laws, protecting all, in helpless infancy and in mature age, in all the rights of person and of property. That expression says that the Constitution of the United States, proprio vigore, carries slavery into the Territory. That is a new reading to people in the West, because, as I have frankly said on this floor on a former occasion, we advocated the doctrine of squatter sovereignty. Stare decisis is my motto as a lawyer and a citizen; and standing by the decision that while the Territory remains in a territorial condition it is slave territory, and that southern men may carry their slaves there, are not the friends of freedom emphatically those who desire to hasten this Territory into the sisterhood of States, and to clothe its people with all the power of sovereignty, so that they may regulate and form their domestic institutions in their own way? In other words, if Kansas is to remain a Territory, it is a slave Territory; and its coming in as a State under the Lecompton or any other constitution is the shortest and only method by which it can be made a free State, if it is the pleasure of the people there that it should be a free State. The best enabling act for Kansas is to admit her into this Union. I do not stand on free State or slave State, but I am only answering the logic of the gentleman from Massachusetts. He says that to remand this question to the people, to throw it all again into chaos and confusion, to reopen agitation and strife, and to array the emigrant-aid-society man against the border ruffian, is the shortest and easiest way of making Kansas a free State.

Sir, I deny it. I can imagine another motive and another ground for this facile change of front amongst those who, of late, rang out throughout the country, "the times demand, and we must have, an anti-slavery Constitution, an anti-slavery Bible, and an anti-slavery God." I can account for this sudden change. It is, perhaps, the shortest road to the defeat of the Democratic party. It is, perhaps, the shortest road to the dissolution of this Union, for which those who burn the Bible and the Constitution once a year in Massachusetts have infamously prayed for, "to these many years."

I would say to that gentleman, in reply to his argument, that, instead of standing by him this day in favor of an anti-slavery Bible and an anti-slavery Constitution, I stand with the late Senator from the State of Indiana, [Mr. PERRIN], who well and conclusively replied to that declaration when he said he was in favor of the old Constitution and the old Bible.

The gentleman read the law of the party to the new converts. The Crittenden amendment! That is the shibboleth of Republicanism in these days. Singular coincidence! I have been in no caucus of late, and betray no confidences. I was not one of those deluded men who attempted to make a pile of straw to lay sick Democrats upon. [Laughter.] Singular coincidence! that while the Black Republican party, with the gray-headed gentleman from Ohio, who has received the eulogy of the gentleman from Massachusetts here to-day, were dragging their men into a unanimous support of the Crittenden amendment, the northern Democracy, opposing the Administration, were also attempting to bring the Democratic party into unanimity upon it. Why, sir, we would have a perfect unanimity in the House—a kind of political millennium, or general fusion of parties, with the gray-headed old file-leader from Ohio, whose constituents, some time ago, petitioned the Legislature of that State in favor of dissolving the Union, at its head. And all this, says the gentleman from Massachusetts, is to result in a glorious Republican victory in 1860! Let the "Douglas Democrats" take notice of the prediction, and consider within themselves what share they are to have in the feast.

My colleague from the New Albany district [Mr. ENGLISH] said that when he was asked if he was going to vote with the Republicans, he retorted, "are you going to vote with the Know Nothings?" Now, sir, I have an answer to make to that, and what I say goes before my constituents. In the platforms of 1856, there was no material difference on the slavery question between the Fillmore Know-Nothing party and the Democratic party; and throughout my district I addressed the members of the Know-Nothing party in this way: I said to them, "I repudiate your Americanism; I repudiate your secret organization; but that is not in issue in this contest; slavery is the question; and if you are true to your platform on that question, you and I agree." I spoke in my colleague's district and preached the same doctrine in the city of New Albany, and, bitter as I had been against the peculiar tenets of the American party, as to foreigners and Catholies, when the slavery question came up, I received the votes of a good many of that party, for which I am duly grateful. And I say to my colleague here, I am not ashamed to avow in this Hall, what I avowed before my constituents, that I was willing, and am willing now, to stand side by side with the Fillmore or national American party upon the slavery question, while I shall ever repudiate and abhor their war upon religions and races.

But let me ask my colleague if he did not speak without his host? Is this Know-Nothing party in Congress a unit upon this question? How do they stand in this House? Divided. How do they stand in the other branch of Congress? The presidential aspirants, the leaders, the high priests and prophets of the party, including the author of this new amendment, are arrayed against the Democratic party. Let the gentleman go to his constituents and tell them that, in attempting to defeat this Lecompton constitution, he stood side by side, and shoulder to shoulder, with the Representative from Louisville, and every Democrat in his district, and especially in the principal city of it, who recollects the burning dwellings and bloody deeds of the first Monday of August, 1855, will hear him with sorrow and disappointment. Talk to me, sir, about standing side by side with the Know-Nothing party upon this question! I care not in what company I fight, so long as the flag of the Constitution waves over me. I followed that flag through the contest of 1856. I knew that the Democratic party of this Union had not only inscribed upon it their principles, but that they had intrusted it to the hands of James Buchanan in preference to Stephen A. Douglas. I am following that flag now in the hands of that same leader; and, sir, I intend to follow it even if it be to that political grave which the late member from Illinois [Mr. MORRIS] intimated was awaiting the discharge of my duty here.

But, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BURLINGAME] went out of his way to pronounce a eulogy upon the senior member from Ohio, [Mr. GIDDINGS.] He said that that gentleman had a very warm heart as well as a gray head; and that, if the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. MILES] knew him as well as he did, he would think so. Yes, sir; the if stands very much in the way. I have heard of this celebrated traveler from Massachusetts before—not altogether so celebrated as Captain Cook, who circumnavigated the globe—but the traveler who went all over the country making stump speeches for Fremont, and of whom newspaper accounts were published describing him minutely, and informing the world whether he wore a check neckcloth and striped breeches or not, and reaped the full measure of fame after the Republican manner. [Laughter.] I recollect very well that he made a speech at the capital of Indiana, and pronounced his eulogy upon GIDDINGS there. His memory failed him here this afternoon. In sporting phrase, he let down. He was anxious to sustain his character as an extempore speaker, but his memory failed him and he broke down. I did not hear his speech at the capital of my State; but I recollect hearing and seeing in the newspapers that he told the people to "rally round the mighty GIDDINGS;" but the people could not swallow it, for even the Republicans of Indiana have not sunk quite so low as that yet. [Laughter.]

The gentleman repeated the old eulogy to-day. Yes, sir, a man is known by the company he keeps. This new defender of the Constitution, this Union-lover, this man who objects to southern men talking about a dissolution of the Union, is at his old game, eulogizing the gentleman from Ohio, who, in the convention which nominated Hale and Julian, gave utterance to the following burst of constitutional and Union-loving patriotism:

"Mr. Giddings did not believe there was one man professing to be a Free Soiler, in this city, who had any idea of even looking back to the mass of corruption to be found in the old parties. He believed and asserted that those who slew Gorsuch were the most efficient protectors of our Constitution now living. He would assert such doctrine everywhere, but he was not ready to place such doctrine in the platform. He demanded the repeal of the law, [fugitive slave law,] but friend Smith is opposed to asking for its repeal. I have helped off as many Jerrys as he has; and I have told a fugitive, when pursued by the slave-catcher, to shoot him down; and have put the pistol in his hand. I then told the slave-catcher to take him, but he did not wish to run any risk on that point, for I believe the fugitive would have shot him."

We have here, as the eulogist of this member from Ohio, a member from Massachusetts, a State where Killoch preaches, and where a man is elected Governor who goes into the canvass of State affairs gravely declaring that he is in favor "of the admission of Kansas with her own charter of freedom." This is the defender of the Constitution, from Massachusetts. He is going to exterminate dough-faces. I tell both him and the gentleman from Illinois, who expected to see me shot down at the outposts in this contest, that when this race of dough-faces is exterminated, the Constitution of this country and the Union of these States are at an end. Then the gentleman from Massachusetts will have an opportunity of being confronted with these southern men, and I hope that he will behave himself better than he did on a certain memorable occasion that has passed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman must understand that it is not in order to indulge in personalities.

Mr. HUGHES. Then I will not do it. The gentleman has assumed to himself a kind of leadership here to-day. He announces to us, ex cathedra, that the Republican party has squared itself upon Crittenden's amendment. He patted the Douglas men on the back: "yes, you are patriotic men, that you are; come up and vote for Crittenden's amendment, along with the venerable and warm-hearted member from Ohio. Then perhaps we will have some of these days an anti-slavery constitution, an anti-slavery Bible, and an anti-slavery God."

Something has been said here to-night about reading out of the party. The gentleman from Illinois dodged that question. We have heard a good deal said about reading out of the party, and the establishment of tests. I admit that no man or no set of men have the power to establish a test. I admit that no Administration and no number of men can read men out of the party so long as they are sound upon principle. I will tell you what I do say; tests are matters—

SLAVERY AGITATION—NULLIFICATION—THE LECOMPTON CONSTITUTION.

SPEECH OF HON. M. W. TAPPAN,
OF NEW HAMPSHIRE,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

March 31, 1858.

The House being in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. TAPPAN said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I rise to-day to put upon record the protest of New Hampshire against what I conceive to be the most stupendous political fraud that was ever before attempted to be perpetrated upon any people.

Not that it is necessary, in order that her position should be fully known, for New Hampshire, here and now, to utter her voice against the Lecompton iniquity, for in her recent State election she has already spoken in language more significant and potent than any words which I can utter on this occasion.

The State which but a few years ago was known as the very Gibraltar of northern Democracy, has just been carried against the Administration by a majority of five thousand; and, if the so-called "Democratic" party there had not entirely ignored this issue, or, as was the case to some extent, taken anti-Lecompton ground, instead of five thousand, the majority against it would have been ten thousand—sweeping the party into oblivion.

Mr. Chairman, it is not my purpose to discuss, wholly or mainly, the Kansas question, or to go into a detailed examination of the Lecompton constitution, as I might perhaps have done at an earlier stage of the debate. This has already been done by others, until the subject is well nigh exhausted. But while I intend to refer, in the course of my remarks, to some of the more prominent features of the great question which is so soon to be decided, I intend also to vindicate the people of the North from the charges which are constantly made, here and elsewhere, of slavery agitation, of aggression upon the rights of the South, and of entertaining sentiments hostile to the union of these States!

Sir, in behalf of the Republican party, for whom on this question I think I can speak, and of the people of the North, I deny all and every of these charges. And, in turn, I charge home, where I think it properly belongs, upon the nullification and disunion party of the South, or, as it is pleased to call itself in these latter days, the "secession" party, with being the real aggressors—with entertaining views and sentiments hostile to the Union, and with being the cause of all or nearly all the slavery agitation in this country for the last twenty years!

Mr. Chairman, the people of the North have no wish or design to improperly interfere with the rights of the South. They know that slavery, as it exists in the States, is beyond their control. True, they may hope, through the influence of public opinion and the progress of Christianity and civilization, to one day see the system ameliorated or entirely done away. But further than this, they have no designs upon the "peculiar institution" of the southern States. Ay, they know that that institution has its chief strength and support, to-day, in the Union of these States, and they are loyal and faithful to that Union. But at the same time, sir, they love liberty, and cherish in their heart of hearts the great principles which called this Government into being. They know, too, what the system of slavery is, and, in common with the early and great men of the South, they hold it to be a great moral, social, and political evil—a foul blot upon the otherwise fair escutcheon of our common country. They know that, at the formation of the Government, slavery was regarded by all the great and good men, South as well as North, as a temporary evil, and so inconsistent with the principles upon which the war of the Revolution was fought, that the Fathers would not allow the word slavery to go into the Constitution. They moreover knew something of the effects of the system. They knew that it impoverishes the soil, that it retards progress, that it opposes education and mental development, that it degrades labor, (which is the insignia of nobility in the North,) and brings everything down to its own level. And within a few years they have seen the early policy in relation to slavery abandoned, and in place of the doctrine, which formerly obtained, that it was a local institution, existing only by positive law, they now see an attempt made to NATIONALIZE the system, and, through the doctrines of the President's message and the Dred Scott decision, to plant it in the very heart of the free States.

Sir, one after another, we have seen the old landmarks and barriers erected by our fathers against the encroachments of this system removed; we have seen the plighted faith of the nation trampled upon, that it might find scope and verge; and now, when with bold and defiant attitude it threatens to invade our very fireplaces and hearthstones, because we resist and defend ourselves, we are denounced as "fanatics and agitators." No, sir; we of the North are not responsible for this slavery agitation; but the responsibility, as I have said, belongs to the extremists—the nullification party of the South, who, through their mad and offensive schemes of slavery propagandism, have brought about the present state of affairs.

When I speak of the disunion party of the South, I do not include the entire people of the southern States, nor do I join in an indiscriminate warfare upon all who may happen to hold slaves. I know there are thousands upon thousands of moderate, conservative, and patriotic men there, who, at heart, condemn these ultra and offensive schemes as much as we do. But I speak of that portion of them who threaten us with southern conventions, and a dissolution of the Union, in case the Congress of the United States should fail to give its sanction to one of the most bare-faced swindles that ever disgraced any age or any country! I believe that a party exists at the South, headed by violent men, who seem bent on controlling the Government to their own purposes, and, failing in this, to withdraw from the Union, and set up a southern confederacy. Whether they mean this or not, they preach it, to effect ulterior objects; and a system of terrorism has been established, before which the moderate men of that section can make no headway.

And, what is more alarming still, this party, which General Jackson in 1833 put his heel upon and for the time "crushed out," to-day has complete control of the Democratic organization of the country! And, to the shame and everlasting disgrace of a portion of that party in the North, it seems willing, for the sake of the few miserable crumbs which may fall from the table of its master, to bow down and do its imperious bidding! Talk of "northern fanaticism!" Be it so. Something may well be pardoned to the spirit of Liberty; but for the spirit which would carry slavery into a Territory wrested from the people of the free States by a breach of plighted faith, against the earnest remonstrance of an overwhelming majority of the people of that Territory, and at the expense of every principle of truth, honor, justice, and fair-dealing among men, nothing can be said by way of excuse or palliation. It is a gross, outrageous, impudent, and unmitigated wrong. And it is a series of aggressions such as this which has driven the people of the North where they are obliged to make a stand in self-defense, or see all those principles which are dear to free-men, and which they have always been taught to cherish and revere, forever repudiated and trampled under foot. And, by the blessing of God, we will defend ourselves, and resist this great wrong. And if for this the Union is to be destroyed, I, for one, cannot help it. "Life is not so dear, nor peace so sweet," nor the Union so sacred, as to be "purchased at the expense of chains and slavery," and the humiliation of an entire people, in whose veins yet courses the blood of men who fought for Liberty on Bunker Hill!

Sir, the origin of this nullification party, and this disunion sentiment, at the South, lies deeper than the slavery question. It had its rise from other causes, and the slavery question has only been seized upon, in the language of Mr. Calhoun, to "force the issue" upon the people of the North. The Representatives of the same party which, in 1832, attempted nullification on account of the tariff, to-day threaten to dissolve the Union if Lecompton is rejected! Mr. Chairman, I do not know but that there has always been a disunion party at the South, but it never fairly showed its head till about 1830. As I have intimated, the tariff policy was then the ostensible cause of grievance, and it is not a little remarkable that the very man who did more than all others at the South in favor of the policy of a protective tariff in 1816, in fifteen years afterwards undertook to break up the Confederacy because of the very policy which he had helped to inaugurate. The ostensible cause, then, as I have said, was the tariff; at other periods since that time, and now, it is slavery. But one leading reason then and now, as I believe, is a secret discontent on the part of a portion of the South, at some fancied inequality in the working of the Federal Government, by which, as is supposed, the North have gained some undue advantage over the South. It is seen that, while the North is steadily advancing in population, in wealth, and intelligence, and in everything that marks the progress of a great and prosperous people, the South is on the retrograde; her lands run to waste, her population comparatively diminishing, and her commerce destroyed; and this state of things a portion of her people are insane enough to suppose results from some unequal working of the Federal machinery, and they see no remedy but in the bursting asunder of the fraternal bonds which have so long united the South with the North. Sir, the cause of this apparent decay of the South may be looked for nearer home. A population of ignorant, unthrifty slaves, who, according to the honorable Senator from South Carolina, "have no aspirations," is not a foundation on which to build the material industry of a nation; nor is it in the midst of such a community that manufactures and the mechanic arts will flourish, or that agriculture will be best developed. Slaves cannot build ships, nor sail nor navigate them when they are built. If, then, notwithstanding the comparative barrenness of her soil and the rigor of her climate, the North has continued to prosper, whilst decay and death are stamped upon the once fertile fields of the South, the cause is found, not in any undue advantage which the North derives from the Government, but results wholly from the system of FREE LABOR, which, notwithstanding the contempt in which such labor is held at the South, is at once the pride and glory of the free States.

And, Mr. Chairman, have not the people of the North just cause for alarm, when they see the systematic attempt of leading statesmen to debauch the public sentiment of the country upon this question of LABOR, which forms the very substratum of society in the free States? And, in passing, I cannot help referring to some of the sentiments which have been put forth in the course of this debate on this subject. They have been quoted repeatedly before, but I desire to embody them in my remarks, that the honest, hard-working, intelligent men of the old "Granite State," may see in what estimation they are held by those who are striving to-day to push slavery into the Territory which so recently belonged to them and to their free institutions!

I quote, first, from a speech of honorable Andrew Johnson, of Tennessee, recently delivered in the Senate, and which I listened to myself:

"When you form a community out of individuals, they commence the work of production, intellectual and physical; and as society moves on through time, you find some occupying the lower places, and some occupying the higher places. I do not care whether you call it slavery, or servitude; the man who has mental objects to perform, is the slave of the servant, I care not whether he is white or black. Servitude or slavery grows out of the organic structure of man. All the talk we hear in depreciation of slavery is idle, and a great portion of it mere twaddle. Slavery exists; it is an ingredient of society, growing out of man's mental and physical organization; and the only question for us to discuss is, what kind of slavery we shall have. Will you have white or black slavery? Shall it be voluntary or involuntary?"

Also, from the speech of Governor HAMMOND, of South Carolina, delivered in the Senate on the 4th of the present month, as follows:

"In all social systems, there must be a class to do the menial duties, to perform the drudgery of life, that is, a class requiring but a low order of intellect, and but little skill. Its requisites are vigor, docility, fidelity. Such a class you must have, or you would not have that other class which leads progress, civilization, and refinement. It constitutes the very MUD-STALL of society and of political government; and you might as well attempt to build a house in the air, as to build either the one or the other, except on this mud-stall."

"The Senator from New York said, yesterday, that the whole world had abolished slavery. Ay, the name, but not the thing; all the powers of the earth cannot abolish that. God only can do it when he repeats the fiat, 'the poor ye always have with you; for the man who lives by daily labor, and scarcely lives at that, and who has to put out his labor in the market, and take the best he can get for it; in short, your whole class of manual laborers, and 'operatives,' as you call them, are essentially slaves. Our slaves are black, of another and inferior race.' They are happy, content, una-spirited, and utterly incapable, from intellectual weakness, ever to give us any trouble by their aspirations. Yours are white, of your own race; you are brothers of one blood. They are your equals in natural endowments of intellect, and they feel galled by their degradation. Our slaves do not vote. We give them no political power. Yours do vote; and, being the majority, they are the depositaries of all your political power."

It is said, Mr. Chairman, that the "evil which men do lives after them, but the good is often interred with their bones." Sir, these sentiments, striking as they do at the very foundation of the true sources of wealth and greatness of a nation, will live long after their authors have passed from earth, and the good they may have done shall be forgotten. And, sir, these are not the sentiments of obscure men, having but little influence, but they are the sentiments of leading "Democrats"—of men, without whose active aid and cooperation (and of others holding the same sentiments) the present so-called "Democratic" organization could not hold together a single day.

Sir, with us at the North we have no "class" which leads progress, civilization, and refinement," as contradistinguished from those who labor—and we want none. We hold that society so constituted is a false and aristocratic state of society, and we repudiate it. It is no part of true Democracy. All classes of our people are obliged to work—and yet they are capable of leading in "progress, in civilization, and refinement." From the earliest period of youth, they are taught that industry is one of the highest virtues—that labor is honorable, and idleness disreputable. We have no aristocratic class, born to luxury and ease, and who subsist upon the unpaid toil of an inferior class. Nor do we hold that the highest state of society is attained where one class is born to be

Ho. OF REPS.

"gentlemen," and do all the thinking and governing; while others are mere menials—"hewers of wood and drawers of water!"

Sir, as I have said, these are the deliberate opinions of leading "Democrats," touching the great question of FREE LABOR, and it is but just to hold the Democratic party responsible for the sentiments of its leading men.

But, to return from this digression. Mr. Chairman, this design against the integrity of the Union was foreseen, and we have been warned against it by some of the best and most prominent men of the earlier and better days of the Republic. In 1833, Mr. Madison, in the last year of his life, wrote to his friend, Edward Coles, Esq., as follows:

"What more dangerous than nullification, or more evil than the progress it continues to make, either in its original shape, or in the disguise it assumes? Nullification has the effect of putting powder under the Constitution and the Union, and a match in the hand of every party to blow them up at pleasure." "A susceptibility of the contagion in the southern States is visible; and the danger, not to be concealed, that the sympathy arising from known causes, and the inculcated impression of a permanent incompatibility of interests between the South and the North, may put it in the power of popular leaders, aspiring to the highest stations, to unite the South, on some critical occasion, in a cause that will end in creating a new theater of great though inferior interest. In pursuing this course, the first and most obvious step is nullification, the next secession, and the last a farewell separation."

Thus wrote Mr. Madison, in the stormy times of nullification; and what were then merely the predictions of a far-seeing and patriotic statesman, would seem at this time to be in the process of fulfillment. Nullification to-day seems to be acting under its "disguises," to use the language of Mr. Madison; but occasionally the cloven-foot will protrude itself, and the secret discontent, growing out of the supposed incompatibility of interests to which I have referred, is made to appear! Thus, in the late remarkable speech of the Senator from South Carolina, [Governor HAMMOND,] to which I have just referred, he exclaims:

"What guarantee have we, when you have this Government in your possession, in all its departments, even if we submit quietly to what the Senator exhorts us to submit to—the limitation of slavery to its present territory, and even to the reconstruction of the Supreme Court—that you will not plunder us with tariffs; that you will not bankrupt us with internal improvements and bounties on your exports; that you will not cramp us with navigation laws, and other laws impeding the facilities of transportation to southern produce? What guarantee that you will not create a new bank, and concentrate all the finances of this country at the North, where already, for the want of direct trade and a proper system of banking at the South, they are ruinously concentrated?"

This allusion to the tariff and the United States Bank is, to say the least, extremely unfortunate, when we consider the fact that both of these measures have, at one time or another, received the sanction of Mr. Calhoun and other prominent southern statesmen.

But I do not refer to this matter of nullification and secession as a cause of any very serious alarm, but only to show one motive, and, as I think, the great motive, which impels all this clamor about disunion. I have no doubt that it is used by many as a mere scare-crow, to frighten men from their political propriety, and, by virtue of it, to fasten upon the country the extreme measures of the slave power. In 1833, however, when it assumed its largest proportions, it was "crushed out" by the heroic firmness of the brave and patriotic man who then occupied the executive chair of the nation. It raised its hideous front again in 1850; but when, in the elections of that year, the intelligence and patriotism of the masses of the southern people were appealed to, it miserably failed, even in Georgia and Mississippi. And so it will be again.

And here, again, Mr. Chairman, it may be remarked that the leading disunionists of the country are also the leading Democrats of the country! Examine the speeches, both of the present and last Congresses, where disunion sentiments have been promulgated, and you will find them the speeches of Democrats. Look at the presses of the country which openly "calculate the value of the Union," and you will find them Democratic presses. Look at the men who figure at southern disunion conventions, and you will find them all Democrats! Let the Democratic party, then, repudiate these disunion sentiments, and shake off the leaders who advocate them, or be content to rest under the load of odium and infamy which the American people always have and always will visit upon those who plot against the welfare of the Republic!

Sir, I wish the present Executive had some of the same spirit, and a little of that Roman firmness which characterized the great man who occupied the presidential chair at the time of which I speak! There was no timidity, no wavering, then! General Jackson took his stand; and although the tempest howled about his ears, and a sovereign State was arrayed in arms against the Union, yet he quailed or faltered not! Not so in the present emergency did James Buchanan. He sent his own favorite Governor to Kansas, and gave him instructions that the constitution to be framed should be submitted to the vote of the people. Governor Walker promised over and over again, in the most solemn and emphatic manner, that it should be so submitted. These promises and pledges were brought home to the knowledge of the President, and tacitly approved by him. But this cause disaffected the pro-slavery party in Kansas, and the extreme slavery party in the South; and when Governor Walker, like an honest man, rejected the Oxford and McGee frauds, the fire, that before was partially smothered, now broke out with violence, and from that moment Governor Walker, from whom so much had been expected, was a doomed man! And the President, instead of sustaining his Governor, who was clearly in the right, instead of proudly maintaining the position he at first assumed, repudiated his own instructions, turned his back upon Governor Walker, and left him to be sacrificed!

The Georgia and Alabama resolutions, and the great outcry that rang through the South against Governor Walker, were too much for the weak and shattered nerves of our President! I trust in God that there is yet virtue and intelligence enough left in the American people to enable them, at no very distant day, to choose a President, either from the North or from the South, (I hardly care which,) who will not be frightened to death every time certain hot-headed gentlemen threaten to "break things" by dissolving the Union!

Sir, I desire to trace, very briefly, some of the causes of this slavery agitation, and see who are the real aggressors. Who and what created the disturbance at the time of the Texas annexation? Sir, instead of allowing events to take their natural course, leaving Texas at some time to come into the Union (if the interests of both parties required it) in a constitutional way, that measure was precipitated upon the country in hot haste, in defiance of the treaty-making power, and, as was believed by many of our ablest statesmen, against the plain provisions of the Constitution! There must be no delay. Nothing but "immediate annexation" would answer, and all for the openly-avowed purpose of strengthening and perpetuating the system of human slavery. It is not to be wondered at, under these circumstances, that the people of the free States should remonstrate! They disliked to stand in the inconsistent attitude, before the civilized world, of a great and powerful Republic, boasting of its freedom, and founded upon the rights of man, rushing headlong into a foreign war for the purpose of extending slavery! And yet this was the whole of the Texas question. Slavery was offensively flaunted into the very faces of our people, for the purpose, as it would seem, of again "forcing the issue upon the North!" And because some of the people of the free States, true to the principles of liberty and equal rights, for which their fathers fought and bled, objected to this movement for this purpose, the nullifiers of the South got up meetings and held conventions, and again "breathed out threatenings and slaughter" against the Union, unless Texas should be annexed! Texas was annexed. War with Mexico followed, bringing in its train large acquisitions of territory and numerous evils, the end of which is not yet! And now, sir, I understand that Texas, too, after all the blood and treasure that have been expended in her behalf, threatens to retire from the Union unless the American Congress sanctions this Lecompton fraud! Sir, I feel nothing but kindness towards the State of Texas, her people, or her Representatives on this floor; but if, on such an issue, Texas thinks best to dissolve the bands which bind us together, and to "step out" of the Union, I say let her go! We managed, after a fashion, to get along before she came in, and I think we can live when she shall go out!

Mr. Chairman, there is one remarkable fact connected with this matter of Texas annexation which, in passing, I must not omit to notice; and that is, the prohibition of slavery in a portion of the new State of Texas. That part of the joint resolution of annexation, touching this matter, is in the following words:

"And in such State or States as shall be formed out of said territory north of said Missouri compromise line, slavery or involuntary servitude (except for crime) shall be prohibited."

Among those who voted for this clause I find the names of the honorable gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS;] of the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. HOUTSON;] of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. G. W. JONES;] of Howell Cobb, now Secretary of the Treasury; of Jacob Thompson, Secretary of the Interior; of Aaron V. Brown, Postmaster General; of Andrew Johnson, now Senator from Tennessee; of JOHN SLIDELL, Senator from Louisiana; and a great many other prominent Democrats, both from the North and South. And yet the same gentlemen who then, and in the application afterwards of the same principle to Oregon, directly "intervened" to prohibit slavery in both of those Territories, now hold that it is unconstitutional for Congress to interfere with slavery in the Territories, and make "non-intervention" a test of Democratic faith.

This only shows the rapid strides which the so-called Democratic party has made in behalf of slavery within the last few years, until to-day it stands before the country and the world having for its test measure a bill which puts the "right in slave property higher than any constitutional sanction!"

Growing out of the Mexican war was the acquisition of California, and her subsequent application for admission as a State into this Union, with a free constitution. Mr. Chairman, this was the "unkindest cut of all." The Texas annexation scheme had been got up to strengthen slavery; but, owing to the discovery of gold, and the great rush to California from the free States, the original slavery design (it would seem almost by the direct interposition of Providence) was frustrated, and our golden sister of the Pacific knocked at the door of the Union with a constitution uncontaminated by slavery!

Mr. Chairman, we all remember the terrible agitation which shook the land in 1850; how the stoutest hearts appeared to tremble and quake with fear at the "wreck of matter and crash of worlds" which seemed impending! Southern conventions were held; disunion speeches were made; and the Union itself, which had stood so many hard shocks, seemed at last to be going to pieces.

Sir, what was the occasion of this great outcry? what the cause of the new agitation which once more seemed to threaten the permanency of the Union? It was simply because the southern nullifiers were determined that California, the fruit of their own scheme of slavery extension, should not come into the Union as a free State. Sir, the whole agitation, at that time, and now, shows that the contest going on in this country is a contest for political power. It is a question whether a few thousand slaveholders shall, in all time to come, rule and govern this country, as they have, according to Senator HAMMOND, for the last "sixty years;" and whether, as a consequence, all the Territories of the nation shall be cursed by the blighting mildew of slavery, or become the abode of freemen, with free institutions and free labor. Such was the question in reference to California, and such is the Kansas question to-day. By the admission of California, the South, nominally at least, lost the balance of power in the United States Senate; and so, to compensate for this loss, it is necessary to secure Kansas, at any expense of fraud, outrage, and wrong.

Sir, it is curious, as well as instructive, to consider where prominent southern gentlemen—the same who are now urging the forcible admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution—stood, when California sought admission under a free constitution. Do we find them contending then that no enabling act was necessary? that it made no difference whether a legal census had been taken or not? that she should be admitted, though her constitution reeked with fraud, and the rights of her people had been trampled under foot by armed invaders? No! But, upon the passage of the bill admitting California as a State, a protest was entered upon the Journal of the Senate, protesting against its passage, for these, among other reasons:

"First. That it gave the sanction of law, and thus imparted validity to an unauthorized action by a portion of the inhabitants of California.

"Second. Without any legal census, or other evidence of their possessing the number of citizens necessary to authorize the representation they may claim.

"Third. Without any of those safeguards about the ballot-box, which can only be provided by law, and which are necessary to ascertain the true sense of a people.

"Fourth. As not having sufficient evidence of its (the constitution) having the assent of a majority of the people for whom it was signed."

The protest was signed by J. M. Mason and R. M. F. Hunter, of Virginia; A. P. Butler and R. W. Barnwell, of South Carolina; H. L. Turney, of Tennessee; Pierre Soulé, of Louisiana; Jefferson Davis, of Mississippi; D. R. Atchison, of Missouri; Jackson Morton and D. L. Yulee, of Florida. All Democrats.

Here was a case attempted to be made against the admission of California, which actually exists in regard to Kansas, only a thousand times stronger than was even pretended then. Then it was objected, against the admission of California, that there was "no sufficient evidence that the constitution had the assent of a majority of the people for whom it was signed." If there was no such evidence, this was a reason, and a good reason, for its rejection.

But how is it in the case of Kansas? What say Senators Mason and Hunter and Jefferson Davis to the Lecompton constitution in that respect? There is not only no pretense that it is sanctioned by a majority of the people of Kansas, but, on the other hand, although not submitted to the people by the convention that framed it, as the President pledged himself that it should be, at a submission of it by the legally-constituted Legislature of the Territory, it was voted down by a large majority of her people. And the evidence of this is not disputed or gainsayed. And yet, where are the solemn protests of Senators against the consummation of this gross outrage upon the rights of the people? Ay, more than this, these same Senators are attempting to drag Kansas into the Union now against the earnest remonstrances of her people, and over the ruins of the Democratic doctrine of popular sovereignty, which brought the present Administration into power!

But, sir, to return to this charge of slavery agitation against the North. The intense excitement in 1850, growing out of the admission of California, was allayed by the passage of the compromise measures, and the country once more settled down into a state of repose. The Democratic party, in convention at Baltimore, when General Pierce was nominated for the Presidency, resolved that the compromise measures were a finality, and that henceforth there should be no further agitation of the slavery question, "whether in or out of Congress." The Whig and Democratic parties both were pledged in the same way; and General Pierce, in his first message, after congratulating the country on the happy state of quiet which then existed on this vexed question, used these remarkable words:

"That this repose is not to be disturbed during my official term; if in my power to prevent it, those who placed me here may rest assured."

Mr. Chairman, how was that repose disturbed? And who is responsible for the reopening of this fearful agitation of the slavery question? Sir, let those who were instrumental in repealing that time-honored compact, which had stood for over thirty years, made between your fathers and mine in 1820, answer.

The repeal of the Missouri compromise was the cause of the agitation that exists to-day in reference to Kansas and the Lecompton constitution, and every intelligent person in the country knows it. It was sprung upon the country, as this Lecompton swindle is, at the advent of a new Administration, in the hope that quiet would be restored before another presidential election should come round. The hope was vain. That iniquitous measure crushed the late Administration, and came well high crushing the Democratic party with it! The consummation of the scheme, by the passage of Lecompton—and I believe it will be so, whether it passes or not—will, in my judgment, not only ruin the Administration, but it will sink the party so deep that no bubble will rise to mark the spot where it went down.

But, sir, although the real object of repealing the Missouri compromise was perfectly apparent, which object was to make Kansas into a slave State or States, still the repeal was carried under pretense of inaugurating the great idea of "popular sovereignty;" and the whole design of the Nebraska bill, as it was said, was to let the people "form their own institutions in their own way." That this was a mere pretext, subsequent events, and more than anything else, this Lecompton constitution, have fully shown. As long as it was supposed that slavery would be the gainer, "popular sovereignty" was good enough Democratic doctrine; but now, when it is known that if the matter is fairly left to the people of Kansas, the result will be favorable to liberty, the doctrine of popular sovereignty is abandoned; and, in face of promises and pledges and platforms, the constitution is not submitted to the people, and they are denied the right to "form their domestic institutions in their own way."

Sir, this bill for the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution, in the face of frauds the most glaring and palpable, when it is not even pretended that it has received the assent of a majority of the people, is a vital blow at the great fundamental principle which underlies all republican governments, to wit: the right of the people to make the constitution under which they are to live. It strikes at the very existence of popular rights, and, if enacted into a precedent, will become a landmark from whence we may date the overthrow of democratic institutions, and the establishment of despotic power in their stead.

So sacred and essential is this right of the people to pass upon their fundamental law regarded, that in my State not only has the constitution always been submitted to the people for ratification, but by its provisions no revision or alteration of that instrument can be made unless the same shall be laid before the people, and approved by two thirds of the qualified voters present and voting on the subject. Let the people of that and other States of this Union, who have so zealously guarded their own rights, see whither this country is tending under the rule of a false and spurious Democracy.

Mr. Chairman, it has always been contended by the Democratic leaders and presses at the North, that Kansas would be a free State, and that it never could, in any event, come into the Union as a slave State. To show how this was understood in my own State, I quote an editorial article from the New Hampshire Patriot, of October 13, 1854:

"The Whig and Abolition agitators are constantly declaring that slaves are being carried into Kansas and Nebraska by hundreds. This is undoubtedly false, for reliable accounts concur in stating that few, if any, slaves have been carried there; and this is likely to be the case, from the fact that every slave carried there becomes in law a freeman the moment he sets his foot upon the soil of either of those Territories. This is the law; and it is not very probable that the owners of slaves will run the great risk involved in carrying them where they will be now free, in the hope that subsequent legislation will give them the power to hold them as slaves. All admit that there is no law tolerating slavery in these Territories; and, in the absence of such law, slavery is illegal. The doctrine is well established that slavery can exist only by positive law; that, without a positive law permitting it, 'slavery can no more exist than a man can breathe without air.' Therefore, slavery cannot exist, not a slave can be legally held in Kansas or Nebraska, until the Legislature of the Territory enacts a law establishing slavery. That this is the law, we have both the decisions of the highest courts and judges in the land, and the opinions of the most eminent statesmen. We will quote a few of these decisions, since Abolition and Whig editors are laboring so zealously to make the people believe that this is not the settled doctrine."

The Patriot then quotes a long list of judicial decisions in support of this position.

But, sir, as I have said, this old doctrine that slavery is local—the creature of positive law, and of no validity beyond the range of that law—and which had been so decided by a long series of judicial decisions, from that of the famous Somerset case in England, down to that of the case of Prigg vs. The State of Pennsylvania, decided by the Supreme Court of the United States in this country, has now been repudiated and overturned, and the dogma of Mr. Calhoun, that slavery can go anywhere by virtue of the Constitution, has been set up in its place. When this doctrine was first broached in the Senate, it was scouted by Mr. Clay, Mr. Webster, and other leading minds of the nation; and to-day it is the test question in the Democratic creed of this country! In 1854, Mr. Toombs contended, in a speech in the Senate, that slavery was a national institution; and so far as the President can go in declarations to that effect, so far as the Democratic party can go in its leading measure—the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution—slavery is to-day as completely nationalized as are the great fundamental principles of liberty and republicanism, which have so long been our pride and boast!

In the last presidential campaign, it was said everywhere at the North that Kansas would be a free State, and the Democratic war-cry then was, "Buchanan, Breckinridge, and free Kansas!"

How these pledges have been redeemed, let the President himself answer by the extract from his message in which he says that "Kansas is as much a slave State to-day as Georgia or South Carolina."

Again, in his celebrated New Haven letter, he says:

"Slavery existed at that period, and still exists in Kansas, under the Constitution of the United States. This point has been at last finally decided by the highest tribunal known to our laws. How it could have ever been seriously doubted, is a mystery."

In his annual message he says:

"Should the constitution without slavery be adopted by the votes of the majority, the rights of property in slaves now in the Territory are reserved. The number of these is very small; but if it were greater, the provision would be equally just and reasonable. These slaves were brought into the Territory under the Constitution of the United States, and are now the property of their masters. This point has at length been finally decided by the highest judicial tribunal of the country—and this upon the plain principle, that when a confederacy of sovereign States acquire a new territory at their joint expense, both equality and justice demand that the citizens of one and all of them shall have the right to take into it whatever is recognized as property by the common Constitution. To have summarily confiscated the property in slaves already in the Territory, would have been an act of gross injustice, and contrary to the practice of the older States of the Union which have abolished slavery."

No matter if the number of slaves in Kansas were much greater than it really is, the President says the principle would still be the same. And the right claimed is, that the slaveholder may take his slaves in the same way that a man may take his horse or his ox, go into any Territory which the United States may now have, or may hereafter acquire, and there hold them as property under the Constitution; and, further, that when the people of the Territory come to form a State constitution, they have no power to touch the existing relation of master and slave! This is the legitimate deduction from the doctrine of the message. Sir, if this be so, the question is already settled, and there can never be another free State added to this Union! And this doctrine reaches its culminating point in the seventh article of this Lecompton contrivance, which provides as follows:

"Sec. 1. The right of property is before and higher than any constitutional sanction; and the right of the owner of a slave to such slave and its increase is the same, and as inviolable, as the right of the owner of any property whatever."

And this, sir, is the doctrine which the Democratic party to-day put forth as a test of party fidelity. We shall see what the people of the free States, when they come to pass upon it, will have to say in reference to this doctrine, and of the Administration which sustains it.

Sir, on the 26th day of July, 1856, in a speech which I had the honor to make on this floor, I endeavored to prove that the evident tendency of the Democratic party was to the abandonment of the doctrine of "popular sovereignty;" and I ventured to predict that if the doctrines put forth by certain southern leaders were indorsed by the American people in the election of Mr. Buchanan, there would be a decision of the Supreme Court, sanctioning the Calhoun doctrine that slavery, under the Constitution, could, ipso facto, go into any of the Territories, and be protected there; and that this would be an article in the Democratic creed.

The day but one after the inauguration of President Buchanan, Dred Scott was decided; and the position of the party to-day, on this Lecompton constitution, verifies but too well the other part of the prediction. And, sir, if the Administration, in this gross and violent outrage upon their rights, is sanctioned and sustained by the American people, I will venture another prediction: that when the Lemmon case, now before the courts in New York, shall find its way to the same tribunal which decided Dred Scott, slavery, by virtue of it, will be planted in every free State of the Union.

That this statement, Mr. Chairman, is no mere bugbear, with no foundation on which to base it, and as additional evidence tending to show which way the Democratic current is drifting in this particular, I quote from an article in the Washington Union, of November 17, 1857, but a few days before the President's message was sent to Congress. The quotation which I have made from the message contains, in effect, though expressed in terms a little more ambiguous, the same sentiments which are more boldly avowed in this article from the Government organ.

"All State laws, whether organic or otherwise, which prohibit a citizen of one State from settling in another, and bringing his slave property with him, and most especially declaring it forfeited, are direct violations of the original intention of a Government, which, as before stated, is the protection of person and property, and of the Constitution of the United States, which recognizes property in slaves, and declares that 'the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States,' among the most essential of which is the protection of person and property."

"What is recognized as property by the Constitution of the United States, by a provision which applies equally to all the States, has an inalienable right to be protected in all the States."

"The emancipation of the slaves of the northern States was then, as previously stated, a gross outrage on the rights of property, inasmuch as it was not a voluntary relinquishment on the part of the owners. It was an act of coercive legislation."

Let the honest masses of the Democratic party in the free States ponder well the position occupied by their party on this most vital question!

Sir, I oppose this measure, and protest against it, because it contains this anti-republican feature, which, I believe, has never before found a place in any constitution, that the "right of property in slaves is higher than any constitutional sanction." Slavery, in other constitutions and in legislative enactments, may have been recognized as an existing institution; but never before, to my knowledge, has the attempt been made, by express terms in a written constitution, to put property in man upon the same ground of natural right as that by which other property is held. Sir, this doctrine is anti-republican—a gross libel upon the common law, and upon the progress, philanthropy, civilization, and spirit of the age in which we live. It is a wanton departure from the early faith of the fathers of the Republic on the question of slavery, and will be a stigma and a reproach upon the country in all coming time.

Sir, it is said by the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. HILL,] who, in a very calm and moderate manner, has advocated this measure, that, in opposing it, not one word should have been said by men of the North about the institution of slavery in connection with it. Why, sir, whatever doctrine is applied to territory south of the Missouri compromise line, all north of it was, by a solemn compact, consecrated and set apart to freedom and to free labor. That territory was ours, by agreement of patriots South as well as North. We have seen that compromise ruthlessly violated and broken down; and there has not been a moment, since that fell measure was sprung upon the country, that the prime and secret movers in it have not lent all their energies to make it a slave State! The whole scheme was "conceived in sin and brought forth in iniquity;" it was reared and nurtured in falsehood, violence, and fraud, and it has been baptized in innocent blood, until now it is attempted to be crowned by this Lecompton constitution, which is only the concluding act in this great drama of outrage and wrong upon the rights of the people of Kansas and of the free States! Sir, when we cease to talk about slavery in connection with this Territory, it will be but with our lives!

But before I sit down, Mr. Chairman, I desire to advert briefly to one other matter relied upon by the friends of this measure, to smooth its passage through this House. It is said, that although this constitution provides the terms of its own amendment, among which is the provision that it shall not be interfered with till after 1864, nevertheless, in defiance of the mode pointed out in the instrument itself, the people of Kansas may, at any time, as well before as after the year 1864, alter, amend, or abolish it, at their pleasure! Sir, I regard this doctrine as utterly illusory, and as entirely subversive of those principles of "law and order," the championship of which is the peculiar boast of the present Democratic party.

Sir, when this constitution has received the sanction of Congress, and Kansas is admitted under it, if it has any binding force at all, it is at once the supreme and fundamental law of the new State. It is, so far as outward forms are concerned, the legitimate government; and, like all other governments and constitutions, there are but two modes by which it can be reformed—the one through the mode provided in the instrument itself; the other, by revolution.

Mr. Chairman, in all the speeches that have been made in both Houses of Congress in favor of this measure, the great burden of them all, and the gist of every argument brought forward to sustain it, amounts to just this: that the Lecompton constitution has all the "forms of legality," and that we cannot go behind these "forms," to inquire into the actual facts, however much disputed those facts may be. And here we have the singular spectacle presented, of the same men, who in one breath contend that the constitution is valid and binding because all the "forms" appear to have been complied with, in the next maintaining that it may be, at any moment, altered, amended, or absolutely repudiated, and a new one made in its place, in subversion of all "forms," and against all law.

Sir, let me illustrate this point by a reference to my own State. The people of New Hampshire have a written constitution. That constitution provides the mode by which it may be revised or amended. According to the doctrine set up here, however, the people are not confined to the mode of revision prescribed in the constitution. But how are they to accomplish their purpose outside the constitution? Through an act of the Legislature? That cannot be done, for each man is sworn to support the constitution, and a violation of its plain provisions would simply be perjury. But shall the people assemble in mass meeting, at Concord or Manchester, and take measures to the end proposed? Who and what authorizes that portion of the people, so assembled, to speak for those who stay at home? What authority have they to bind those who prefer the old constitution? Sir, the whole thing is absurd. There is no peaceable mode of reforming the constitution of a State, so that it will be binding upon all the people, except through the regular mode pointed out by the constitution itself, and the laws enacted under it. I admit the right of revolution, that the people can rise in their majesty, and by force of arms, if successful, trample their constitution under foot, and establish a new one in its place. The people of Kansas could do this, if they had the strength. But who is foolish enough to believe that they would not be shot down, as rebels and insurrectionists, by United States troops, if they should attempt anything of the kind, after this constitution is fastened upon them? And this is the reason why, by no vote of mine, shall a single dollar be appropriated for the increase of the Army, until the troops are removed from Kansas.

But, Mr. Chairman, now, as on former occasions, the hydra of disunion is dragged in here to help force this measure through Congress. Sir, let Lecompton be defeated, and then let the leaders of the Democratic party in the southern States make the disunion issue on the defeat of it, if they dare. It will, in that event, not merely be the Democratic party in the North that will be shivered to atoms, but the same party South, on such an insane issue; for such a cause would, by the patriotic sentiment of the southern States, be driven like chaff before the whirlwind. Gentlemen, you tried it in 1859, on an issue stronger than this, and you failed. Try it again; and of two things you may be sure: first, that the Union will not be dissolved; and second, that whatever party combinations may rise on its ruins, the present "National Democratic party" will be known no more forever.

Sir, I know not how it may be, but I trust that on to-morrow this measure is to be defeated; and if it should be, I hope that those who make these threats will attempt to put them into practical operation. That, at least, would present an issue where all true and patriotic men, both of the North and the South, could stand together; and the result would be the final overthrow of the faction which threatens disunion and nullification, if every mad scheme it invents is not carried out. It would result, too, in the complete extinguishment of that sham Democracy, which, being the firm and steadfast ally of southern nullification and disunion, if not put down by the American people, will finally subvert the liberties of the country.

SPECIAL KANSAS COMMITTEE.

SPEECH OF HON. JOHN LETCHER, OF VIRGINIA, IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, March 31, 1858.

The House being in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. LETCHER said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I do not propose to go into any general discussion of the merits of the Kansas question. My sole object in seeking the floor is to reply to some remarks made by three gentlemen in the progress of this debate, in reference to the action of the committee of fifteen, of which I was a member. The first gentleman who alluded to it was the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BENNETT,] the next was the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. WALBRIDGE,] both of whom were members of the committee; and the last was my friend from North Carolina, [Mr. GILMER,] in the remarks submitted by him this morning. These gentlemen have undertaken to say that the majority of the committee were satisfied of the fact that these frauds had been committed in the Territory of Kansas, that great wrongs and great outrages had been perpetrated; and that, knowing this fact, the committee determined not to execute the order of the House, but to dodge the instructions which had been given to the committee at the time of its appointment. So far as I am concerned, there is nothing in my action connected with that committee which I consider requires any defense, either before my constituents or before the country. I pursued that course which my own convictions of duty pointed out as the proper one, and which, under similar circumstances, with all the lights now before me, I would pursue again.

It is my purpose to show that the majority of the committee of fifteen discharged their duty faithfully, as that duty was enjoined upon them by the order of the House. It will be recollected that, on the 2d day of February, the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HARRIS,] whose illness I greatly regret, introduced into this House a resolution which contained ten specifications in the nature of instructions to the committee which he proposed to raise.

I will now call attention to each one of these instructions, because I desire to have them impressed upon the minds of such as are present, and such as may read my remarks, in order that the resolution, as then presented, may be contrasted with the resolution as it was finally adopted. On reference to the Journal, it will be found that the resolution, as originally proposed, instructed the committee that he then designed to raise, in the first place—

"To inquire into all the facts connected with the formation of said constitution, and the laws, if any, under which the same was originated; and whether such laws have been complied with and followed."

"Whether said constitution provides for a republican form of government, and whether there are included within the proposed boundaries of Kansas sufficient population to be entitled to a Representative in this House upon the basis now fixed by law; and whether said constitution is acceptable and satisfactory to a majority of the legal voters of Kansas."

Now it will be recollected that my friend from North Carolina [Mr. GILMER] to-day charged the committee of fifteen with having dodged their duty in not ascertaining whether there was a sufficient population in that Territory to entitle them to a member according to the ratio of representation as fixed by the act of Congress—ninety-odd thousand. We had no such instructions before us. The instructions as then presented were subsequently withdrawn by the mover, and we were charged, therefore, with no inquiry of that sort; and if we had been, I would like to know of my friend from North Carolina how the committee of fifteen were to execute that requirement? We were clothed with no power to take a census of the people of the Territory to ascertain the fact; we were provided with no means of getting at it, unless we undertook to call upon Tom, Dick, and Harry, for the purpose of getting their impressions in regard to the population in each one of the counties which constitute the Territory of Kansas. We could have got nothing more, if we had been required to execute such an order, than the prejudiced partisan opinions of individuals—means of information which were as accessible to every member of this House as to members of the committee.

The resolution goes on:

"Also, the number of votes cast, if any, and when, in favor of a convention to form a constitution as aforesaid, and the places where they were cast, and the number cast at each place of voting and in each county in the Territory.

"The apportionment of delegates to said convention among the different counties and election districts of said Territory, and the census registration under which the same was made, and whether the same was just and fair, or in compliance with law.

"The names of the delegates to said convention, and the number of votes cast for each candidate for delegate, and the places where cast, and whether said constitution received the votes of a majority of the delegates to said convention.

"The number of votes cast in said Territory on the 21st of December last, for and against such constitution, and for and against any parts or features thereof, and the number so cast at each place of voting in said Territory.

"The number of votes cast in said Territory on the 4th day of January last, for and against said constitution, and for and against any parts or features thereof, and the number cast at each place of voting in said Territory.

"The number of votes cast in said Territory on the day last named for any State and legislative officers thereof, and the number so cast for each candidate for such offices, and the places where cast.

"That said committee also ascertain, as nearly as possible, what portion, if any, of the votes so cast at any of the times and places aforesaid, were fraudulent or illegal.

"Whether any portion, and, if so, what portion, of the people of Kansas are in open rebellion against the laws of the country."

Now, sir, as this resolution was introduced, there were ten specifications, specifically directing what that committee were to be required to do when they assembled in the discharge of the duties imposed upon them by the resolution. Those specifications are distinct, clear, and explicit, so that there can be no mistake or doubt in regard to either or all of them.

Well, now, what followed? We find no further action was taken until the 5th of February, when the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HARRIS] proposed to strike out all the specifications thus clearly set out in his resolution introduced on the 2d of February, and to substitute the following:

"Resolved, That the message of the President concerning the constitution framed at Leecompton, in the Territory of Kansas, by a committee of delegates therein, and the papers accompanying the same, be referred to a select committee of fifteen, to be appointed by the Speaker. That said committee be instructed to inquire into all the facts connected with the formation of said constitution and the laws under which the same was originated, and into all such facts and proceedings as have transpired since the formation of said constitution having relation to the question or propriety of the admission of said Territory into the Union under said constitution, and whether the same is acceptable and satisfactory to a majority of the legal voters of Kansas, and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers."

Now, if the House intended that we should execute the purposes indicated by the specifications set forth in the original resolution, then I desire to know why that original resolution was abandoned by the mover, and this general resolution substituted in its stead? In the original resolution, sir, we had positive instructions; everything was definite and distinct; our duties were marked out in words that could not be misunderstood. But with a resolution thus clear, thus definite, thus distinct in its language, the mover himself [Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois] proposed to strike out all the specifications, and to insert this resolution, thus general in its terms.

What was the action of the committee when they met under this resolution? When we met, according to the journal of the proceedings, as published with the demurrer (as he termed it) of the gentleman from Illinois, the first business attempted was to introduce resolutions covering each one of the identical points which were embraced by the specifications in the original resolution, as introduced by the gentleman from Illinois. We were to go into that broad field of investigation in detail; we were not only to inquire in regard to this constitution, the law which gave rise to it, the registration of the voters, the apportionment of delegates, the election of delegates, the formation of that constitution, the submission of one clause of that constitution to the popular vote, and the presentation of that constitution here for the consideration of Congress, but we were to go into the investigation of frauds anterior to that, not connected with it in any way whatsoever, and also into frauds alleged to have been committed subsequent to that time, and in no wise bearing upon the question pending before Congress. We were to go into matters outside of the question which this House was called upon to decide. And no matter how those points might have been determined, no action which that committee could have taken would have exerted any influence upon the question of the propriety of the admission or rejection of Kansas under the Leecompton constitution.

Look at some of the specifications contained in that resolution. You will recollect that there was one specification which directed the committee to ascertain whether there is an open rebellion against the laws of that Territory by the citizens thereof. That was stricken out. But after the committee met to discharge the duty imposed upon them by the House, it was proposed to do what? Why, sir, to adopt this resolution proposed by the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ADRAIN:]

"Resolved, That it is an important fact, having relation to the propriety of the admission of Kansas into the Union under the Leecompton constitution, whether or not a large part of the people of Kansas have been in rebellion against the government, and such a fact as this committee are required by the resolution of the House directing said committee to inquire into; and the committee will therefore inquire into the alleged fact."

Well, now, sir, if the committee was directed, under this resolution of the House, to make this inquiry, why was that clause of the resolution stricken out? or, in other words, why was it withdrawn to give place to the resolution, containing no such specification, which was subsequently adopted? And then, besides, sir, does it not puzzle you, does it not puzzle any member of the House, to ascertain what the fact of a rebellion in Kansas has to do with the admission of that Territory as a State into the Union? What had it to do with the organization of their convention and the formation of their constitution? What has it to do now with the action of this House in determining the question whether that constitution shall be accepted or rejected? I frankly confess, sir, that I can conceive of no earthly connection that it could have with the constitution, nor of any influence that it could exert on the minds of members on this floor, nor of any influence that it ought to exert on any question on which we are now called to act. The resolution containing this instruction being withdrawn, and a resolution adopted which did not contain it, satisfied my mind that the House did not intend that we should make such an inquiry.

That was one of the resolutions proposed, and that resolution was voted down, for the reasons I have stated, and I think properly voted down, by my vote in part.

Well, let us look a little further into the matter. Here is another proposition made in this committee:

"Resolved, That the chairman be requested to inquire for and procure the statement of John Calhoun, the late president of the Leecompton constitutional convention, relative to the number of voters in certain counties of the Territory of Kansas, where no census was taken, or registry of voters made, prior to the election of delegates to said convention, and to which Senator GREEN refers in his report of February 13, 1858."

That resolution was offered by the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL,] and was adopted by the committee. At a subsequent meeting, when the statement of Mr. Calhoun was laid before the committee, what was the next thing done? Why, the very next thing done was that the gentleman from New York, who has alluded to this matter, [Mr. BENNETT,] submitted this resolution:

"Resolved, That the statement of John Calhoun, on file by the call of this committee, is not considered evidence of the facts therein stated."

If it was not evidence of the facts therein stated, why was it called for? For what purpose was it wanted by the committee? Why was the resolution adopted which declared its importance, and which was the means of bringing it to the consideration of that committee? Was it not intended to be used for some purpose? But the statement is no sooner brought in than the gentleman from New York proposes to declare that that statement of John Calhoun, called for by the committee, is not to be regarded as evidence of any fact which may be stated in it.

Can you understand what light that statement would throw upon the matter then before the committee? Still they got the benefit of it as they had asked for it; and is it not a novelty, in the action of committees, to adopt a resolution calling for a particular paper, and when the paper called for is brought in answer to the demand, then for the committee to adopt a resolution which, in my view, discredits that paper; and then presents it to the House as a part and parcel of the proceedings of the committee? Yet all this was done; and now that those who called for it have discredited the testimony by a resolution, solemnly adopted in that body, they come into the House and intimate that the majority of the committee have been faithless to their trust, and have suppressed an investigation which would have established frauds that have been charged, but not sufficiently proved to be regarded as settled.

Now, let me ask, in this connection, if the statement then called for was not to be regarded as evidence, why was it not to be so regarded? Can it have been on any other ground than the fact that the gentlemen who called for it, and who were opposed to Mr. Calhoun, regarded him as an interested partisan in this matter; thought that his feelings were controlled by the position which he had occupied in that Territory in the past, and by the position which he expected to occupy in the future, and that, therefore, his declarations were not entitled to weight? But, sir, more strange than all this, after this resolution was adopted, one of the gentlemen proposed that Mr. Calhoun should be brought before the committee for examination as a witness. I put this question to them, then: "You disregard his statement which you called for; would you believe one word he would swear to?" Two gentlemen answered promptly and distinctly that they would not; and the others sat silent, and thus acquiesced in these declarations.

Mr. WINSLOW. If my colleague will allow me. While he was upon that point, I will suggest to him that he will recollect that when that resolution was under discussion it was distinctly stated by two of our colleagues that they did not consider, when voting for the resolution, that they discredited Calhoun's statement at all, but only meant to say that the evidence was not conclusive, and should only pass for what it was worth.

Mr. LETCHER. I am very glad to be corrected by my friend from North Carolina in this particular. If they would not believe him, why did they want to cross-examine him?

Mr. LOVEJOY. To make him show that he did not tell the truth.

Mr. LETCHER. To make him show that he did not tell the truth? Here is a man who, in the estimation of the individuals calling him, is of so notorious a character, and so little to be relied upon, that those calling him ardent in advance that they would not believe him on oath, and yet the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LOVEJOY] says that, perhaps, they wished to cross-examine him to show that he did not tell the truth—a man who, in their estimation, would swear falsely. Is not that a most remarkable position?

Well, let me say further: is it not palpable to any one that, in the present state of feeling in the House, with the prejudices aroused, if the committee had gone into an investigation, and spread the testimony of witnesses on the record, you would have had each party discrediting and disbelieving the testimony of the other? Is it not so here now? Do we not see each side discrediting the statements made by the other throughout this entire debate?

Then it seems to me that there was nothing else to be done than what we have done. If we were to go into such an investigation as was proposed in the resolutions presented to the committee, we should have been engaged in it for perhaps six or twelve months to come. We should have had either to go to Kansas or to send there and bring here such witnesses as either of these parties desired. And where was the necessity for it? Did you not send out a committee there the summer before last, with authority to run over this entire Territory, and gather up whatever they could get with reference to frauds, murders, and atrocities of all sorts? And is not the report of that committee here in a volume of a thousand or more pages? That evidence relates to many inquiries suggested in the resolutions presented before the committee as proper inquiries to be made in connection with this constitution.

Well, sir, we adopted this resolution on the motion of my colleague at our first meeting of the committee:

"That the chairman of this committee, after inquiries made at the State Department, and the Interior Department for the same, report to this committee, at its next meeting, copies of the following papers, or such as he can obtain; and in case he cannot get copies of the whole of the same, that he report those that he cannot procure copies of, to wit:

"Copies of the law under which the convention assembled at Leecompton, and under which the constitution then adopted was organized; also the returns of the election or vote on said constitution on the 21st of December last; also copies of the law, if any, by which the sense of the people of Kansas on the question of the propriety of their applying for admission as a State in the Union was authorized to be taken, and the vote thereon; also copies of the registration of voters for the election of delegates to said convention, as well as the apportionment of delegates to the same."

Now, sir, I very respectfully submit to those gentlemen who have undertaken to cavil at the action of this committee whether that proposition introduced and adopted by the committee at its very organization, does not cover all the requirements contained in the resolution of the House as it was passed and under which this committee acted? What have we omitted? We have gone back to the very organization, the incipient steps for the gathering together of this convention, and we have come down to the close of the action in connection with that subject, when the very last act had been done in the submission of it to the popular vote, and the popular sentiment had been pronounced in regard to so much of it as has been presented to the people for their consideration. Was there anything more to be done? Could it have any influence on the action of this House to ascertain whether the first election of delegates, under the territorial organization, to the Territorial Assembly was characterized by frauds, or whether the second election was characterized by frauds, or the election of the 4th of January? And, besides all that, under what authority, under what law, would this House undertake to look into questions of this sort and to decide upon them? I grant you that, so far as the election of a Delegate to this House is concerned, in that case, the House, being the judge of the qualifications and returns of its own members, can look into his case and ascertain whether his poll has been stained by fraud—whether he has, in other words, been fairly and properly returned a member of this House by the constituency who claim the right to send him here. That is the extent of our powers. But what authority have we to look into legislative returns? None that I can conceive—none whatever. And even if you could look into them, they are matters which do not bear upon this subject, and that cannot influence the action of any one member of this House. If we had gathered up a thousand pages of testimony—as the committee did a year ago—the result in all probability would have been identically the same as it is now. I insist, therefore, that so far as this committee is concerned, they have performed their duty strictly up to the letter of this resolution. They dodged nothing; they sought to dodge nothing. But they were unwilling to procrastinate the decision of the question by the introduction of irrelevant matter that could not enlighten the mind of any human being upon the question that is the subject of consideration here.

Having thus placed myself and my colleagues on the committee right in this matter, so that this statement may go upon the record with the charges that have been preferred against us, I leave the subject.

REVOLUTION IN THE LAW OF THE LAND.

SPEECH OF HON. E. P. WALTON,

OF VERMONT,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

March 31, 1858.

The House being in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. WALTON said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: "Revolutionary" was an epithet applied, a few hours ago, to the Republicans on this floor by an honorable member from Georgia, [Mr. TRIPPE,] if I did not misunderstand the application of the word. I will take it, and bear it, and honor it. It was the honorable title of the patriots of old; it is embalmed in the hearts of the people, and bound, in your day and mine, to a swift resurrection in power. We are revolutionary, as they were, against tyranny and wrong, for liberty and right. But it is a counter revolution that we have inaugurated; it is against that other revolution, of which the whole history of Kansas and this Leecompton constitution are the illustration and example; it is to roll over that other revolution, and to roll back the governments of the nation and the States to the principles and policy of our revolutionary fathers.

We are in the midst of an attempted revolution; and we have present proof of its mighty import, in the fact that as its certain result—whether we roll it onward or roll it back—the dissolution of the Union has been gravely predicted, or passionately threatened, as suited the purpose or the temper of the man and the hour. That contingency, I think, is beyond our control. Higher than Congress and the combined powers of the Federal Government, higher than State governments or conventions, than nullification or secession, is the power of the people. I will not anticipate their will. Higher even than that of the people, is the power of Him who "fashioneth their hearts alike." In His domain, earth's grandest empires are as dust; and the eras of their history—their founding, climax, fall—are the foot-prints of the Almighty in His eternal round. We may not antedate our fate.

It were enough to say, that peers in privileges, responsibilities, and rights, must spurn intimidation; but against the power of a Christian's faith and a patriot's hope, these threats of angry men are lighter than their breath. I will smile at them—sorrowfully smile:

"Be angry when you will, it shall have scope;
Do what you will, dishonor shall be humor.
O Cassius, you are yoked with a lamb,
That carries anger as the flint bears fire;
Who, much enkindled, shows a hasty spark,
And straight is cold again."

The danger of to-day, it seems to me, is not in dissolution, but rather in that revolution whose end is despotism. Thence may come another issue. I threaten nothing; I predict nothing; but if another issue ever comes, I fear it will be only this: despotism and Union; or disunion, as the sole, sad remedy for despotism. I submit, therefore, that to-day our great duty is, to take care that by no blindness or perversity of ours, shall we doom the people to such a choice as that.

The attempted revolution, of which I come here to speak, is a revolution in the law of the land as to slavery, in the powers of Congress and the States, in the rights of the people, and in the Constitution itself. It is a revolution wrought through a new interpretation of the Constitution by the Supreme Court, with the connivance of the President and his party, and in defiance of the entire history of the Government, of legislative acts, judicial adjudications, and the universal acquiescence of the States and the people, for two thirds of a century. In short, sir, it is my conviction that the judiciary and the Executive have been guilty of USURPATION. I have no weight of character, of learning, or experience, to give emphasis to such words as these; but, in my poor judgment, they can be proved by the record, and sustained by the Constitution, as expounded by the most illustrious statesmen and jurists, from the dawn of the Union to our own evil day. This is my task for the allotted hour.

First, as to the law of the land. It was the common-law maxim of England, to wit: Slavery legally exists by no general rule, but "only by the force of some local law." (Forbes vs. Cochran, cited in note to 1 Blackstone, p. 127.) A self-evident proposition not long ago, but now denied. I therefore observe, that true it is, that as early as Edward VI. slavery temporarily existed in England, and that for two hundred years the slave trade received the sanction of the British Government and courts; but it was only by positive law—by charters, treaties, grants of the Crown, and acts and resolutions of Parliament. This is history; and thus is history "confirmation strong as proof of Holy Writ" of the maxim of the common law. Lord Mansfield declared it in 1772, while the special slave-trade laws were still in force, in these memorable words:

"The state of slavery is of such a nature that it is incapable of being introduced on any reasons, moral or political, but only by positive law."

Blackstone was the cotemporary of Lord Mansfield, and spoke of the common law—as it was then, and ever had been, and still is—in still more emphatic terms:

"The law of England abhors, and will not endure, the existence of slavery in this nation."

Sir, we have been told, in this debate, that Lord Mansfield was in error; that Lord Stowell has reversed his decision in the case of the slave Grace, and received the approval of an eminent jurist of our own. No, sir. That was a misuse of the decision of Lord Stowell. That was a misuse of the name of the American judge, who ranked, at home and abroad, in America and in Europe, and wherever you find the grace of learning and the guards of law, with the most illustrious masters, the clearest expounders, and the purest administrators, who have adorned the bench of this or any other land. I need not say that I mean Judge Story. Now, sir, in justice to Lord Stowell and Judge Story, I quote the case of the slave Grace, as pitifully described by Judge McLean:

"Lord Mansfield held that a slave brought into England was free. Lord Stowell agreed with Lord Mansfield in this respect, and that the slave could not be coerced in England; but on her return to Antigua, the place of her slave domicile, her former status attached."—Dred Scott decision, pamphlet, page 154.

And to this I add the words of Lord Stowell himself, in the case of the slave William:

"The four judges all concur in this—that he was a slave in Granada, though a freeman in England; and he would have continued a freeman in all other parts of the world except Granada."—Same, page 166.

Sir, these decisions of Lord Stowell were within our own time, and they confirm the common law. Lord Mansfield's decision was in 1772, and almost cotemporary with the Revolution. The special laws of England brought slavery to the American colonies under her jurisdiction, and sometimes against the remonstrances of her American subjects; but when British jurisdiction ceased, the old thirteen States all recognized Lord Mansfield's maxim of the common law. Be it right or wrong, it is not important to my present purpose. It was recognized as law in America. The old Thirteen States all tolerated or abolished slavery, each within its jurisdiction; and many of them abolished slavery. They permitted or prohibited the slave-trade, each at its own will; and of the thirteen, there were but three that permitted the importation of slaves when the Constitution was adopted. They, in equity, permitted the master to bring his slaves from other States, and to recapture fugitives; or, by their clear and undisputed right, and of their own free choice, they denied all comity at all. Such is American history previous to the Constitution; and that, too, is "confirmation strong" of the maxim of the common law.

I come to the Constitution, and I find it distinctly recognizing, and palpably based upon, the maxim of the common law. Turn to the clause on the slave trade, and there see the recognition of the power of the States to admit or reject imported slaves, and the power of Congress to prohibit, after 1808. How? Through sovereignty, both in the States and nation—not by special grant; through that Federal sovereignty which simply resulted to the Federal Government, when State sovereignty, in 1808, should be surrendered. What was this but a recognition of that common-law maxim, which leaves the sovereignty to prohibit or permit, by positive law? Turn to the clause in respect to fugitives from service, and tell me, how is it? Redolent of the common law; redolent, all over it and all through it, in the beginning, in the middle, and in the end. Persons are "held to service or labor in one State under the laws thereof;" that is the beginning. Fugitives in any State are not to be discharged "in consequence of any law or regulation therein;" that is the middle. And service is "due," by virtue of the laws of the State from which the persons escape; that is the end.

Sir, here is Lord Mansfield's common-law doctrine, couched in equivalent words—in words embracing the entire doctrine; and it is incorporated into the organic and supreme law of the land.

I come to the Supreme Court of the United States, and here I give you the words of Judge Story himself, uttered as the organ of the court. It was imprudent, to say the least, to quote the authority of his great name against Lord Mansfield's. Judge Story said:

"The state of slavery is deemed to be a mere municipal regulation, founded upon and limited to the range of the territorial laws."—16 Peters, page 611, Prigg's case.

In respect to this point, a member of the court (Judge McLean) who sat upon the case, has declared:

"There was some contrariety of opinion among the judges on certain points ruled in Prigg's case, but there was none in regard to the great principle, that slavery is limited to the range of laws under which it is sanctioned."—Pamphlet Report of the Dred Scott case, page 140.

Among the judges, who thus are compromised by their associate, was the present Chief Justice.

So much for the law of the land as it was, from the Revolution to the Constitution, and from the Constitution, and under the Constitution, down to the opinion of a majority of the Supreme Court in the Dred Scott case, delivered by the Chief Justice, in March, 1857.

In the second place, as to the powers of Government, both Federal and State, over slavery.

As to the judicial power: the fundamental law recognized in the States and in the nation being that slavery can have no legal existence except by the authority of the Government having jurisdiction, the courts emancipated slaves whenever and where ever they had been brought from the bonds of local law into the liberty of the common law. That was the legal and logical conclusion from the fundamental principle, and I give you two judicial decisions as the type of hundreds, from every section of the Union—slave States and free:

"The taking of a slave to any country, by the owner, where slavery is not tolerated, operates on the condition of the slave and produces immediate emancipation."—Ninth Louisiana reports, 475.

As late as 1851, the court of appeals of South Carolina declared that a slave, being taken to a free State, is free. (Commonwealth vs. Pleasants, 10 Leigh Reports, page 697.)

Such was the judicial authority recognized and exercised, even in slave States, and in States where the civil law originally prevailed; and such authority, I take it, would have been recognized in every court in the land, Federal or State, down to the opinion of the Supreme Court in the case of Dred Scott. It was a judicial recognition of Lord Mansfield's maxim of the common law.

As to the political power: the logical conclusion from the fundamental common-law maxim was, that all governments have exclusive political control over slavery, each within its own jurisdiction. No other authority can give legality to slavery; no other can regulate it, define the rights of master and servant, and give the remedies appropriate to those rights. Such was the theory; and the facts correspond. On this ground many of the old States abolished slavery; and Vermont, from her very birth, excluded it. On this ground the slave States tolerated slavery, previously established through British "positive laws," and have ever since defended it against all assaults from without. "Touch me not!" "mind your own business!" such were their maxims, and these were their shield and defense.

On the same solid ground rests the power of the Federal Government, within its own exclusive jurisdiction—that is, outside of the States. We differ widely, in these latter days, as to the source and the extent of Federal power over Federal Territory. Never was there a doubt that it was in Federal sovereignty, and exclusive and perfect, until these latter days; never did the fathers and founders of the Union doubt it. Never, indeed, was there a political power which rested on a more solid foundation, and rarely was there one sustained by so many "pillars of strength." In 1823, Chief Justice Marshall—venerable name!—with the concurrence of the Supreme Court, declared the power to be "unquestionable" in fact, and equal to "the combined powers of the General and of a State government," in extent. (1 Peters, 546.) Sir, there was no dissenting opinion in that court. Strange that a Taney should reverse the opinion of a Marshall. Passing strange, if the unbiased and unanimous opinion of John Marshall and Bushrod Washington of Virginia, William Johnson of South Carolina, Gabriel Duval of Maryland, Joseph Story of Massachusetts, Smith Thompson of New York, and Robert Trimble of Kentucky—(five of the seven, mark it, from slave States)—is now to be cast into utter contempt, by a pro-slavery majority of the present court, on a case improvised for a political purpose, in the heat of a political revolution, and tainted all over with partisan zeal.* Chief Justice Marshall placed the power upon four grounds, each being deemed sufficient; and among them was "the general right of sovereignty, which exists in the Government." These words assert both the existence and the power of sovereignty "in the Government." Twenty-five years before, in 1803, John Randolph had claimed for the Federal Government "all the military, civil, and judicial powers" over the Territory of Louisiana, on this identical ground of SOVEREIGNTY. (3 Benton's Abridgment, page 73.) Sovereignty, sir, what is it? Sovereignty "exists," said John Marshall. It was born, not merely made. It is the sum of more than written powers, the attribute of all governments, with or without the machinery of constitutions, or the recorded forms of law. On our American theory, sovereignty—springing from the people as springs the soul from God—rules all the States; the people guide it, as God guides man, by written supreme laws. The people are the source of sovereignty, but sovereignty is the soul of government. Charters, constitutions, all organic laws, are hindrances of flesh and bones to hedge it in. We say the sovereignty is in the people, and goes not into governments except by right of grants. In all our States, however, the grants carry more than the specific powers—all incidental, necessary, proper powers, essential to the true end of government—to guard the people's interests or rights from exigencies unprovided for, and dangers unforeseen. Without a specific grant, no man doubts, no man can doubt, that it was and is competent for any State to take control of slavery. By the implied consent of all the people, though it were not written in the organic law, by virtue of the universally accepted principle of the unenacted common law, that power was in the sovereignty of the States. From necessity it was there, as well as there in fact. From necessity it was in Federal sovereignty, and it was there, too, in fact, to the precise extent of exclusive Federal jurisdiction—that is, outside of the several States.† The Constitution is a hindrance on Federal sovereignty. You cannot touch the internal affairs of States. The article on the slave trade was a hindrance, preserving State sovereignty and limiting Federal sovereignty until 1808. Moreover, there is no specific grant to prohibit the slave trade; and the power only exists, and was presumed to exist, in the sovereignty, as the limitations prove. The article on fugitives from service is a hindrance both to the State and Federal Governments: neither can discharge them from service. Moreover, it is noticeable that Congress has no specific grant of power as to fugitives in Federal territories,* and the claimant, therefore, has no specific right; both exist in Federal sovereignty, or do not exist at all. But, above all, the fifth amendment is a hindrance to Federal sovereignty, a shield to every "person," irrespective of color or condition. The power to prohibit slavery in Federal territory remains unlimited; but, thanks to our fathers, it is limited as against the liberty of the poorest, weakest, lowest living soul. You cannot establish slavery on Federal soil, and, by act of Congress, that was never done. The whole history of the Federal Government, from 1789 to 1850, is of prohibition; prohibition by almost every Congress; prohibition with the assent of every President; prohibition with the approval of statesmen of every school, and jurists in every court; and prohibition with the acquiescence of the people and the States. So much for the past.

The new ideas, so radically different as to deserve the epithet "revolutionary," have been of rapid growth. They sprang not from the Constitution; for they were never dreamed of by those who made it, and never known to those who, for the first half century, administered it. The late distinguished Senator from South Carolina, Mr. Calhoun, was their father; and the errand on which they were sent was rather sectional and political, than peaceful and patriotic. So long as there was slaveholding territory to make slaveholding States, these new ideas were never known. Until the acquisition of a vast domain from Mexico, in which slavery did not exist, they were never known. With that emergency came the necessity—purely a political one—for a new scheme of constitutional law, which would admit slavery into free territory in spite of congressional intervention, without any act of Congress, and against any. Mr. Calhoun devised the scheme; and on the 19th of February, 1847, he submitted it to the Senate in a series of resolutions, which were consigned to sleep upon the table, without the formality of a vote. As the very origin of the late decision of the Supreme Court, almost in the words of the court and of the President, I recall them here. They were as follows:

"Resolved, That the Territories of the United States belong to the several States composing this Union, and are held by them as their joint and common property."

"Resolved, That Congress, as the joint agent and representative of the States of this Union, has no right to make any law or do any act whatever that shall directly, or by its effects, make any discrimination between the States of this Union, by which any one of them shall be deprived of its full and equal rights in any Territory of the United States, acquired or to be acquired."

"Resolved, That the enactment of any law which should directly, or by its effects, deprive the citizens of any of the States of this Union from emigrating, with their property, into any of the Territories of the United States, would make such a discrimination, and would, therefore, be a violation of the Constitution and the rights of the States from which such citizens emigrated, and in derogation of that perfect equality which belongs to them as members of this Union, and would tend directly to subvert the Union itself."

Here was a distinct proposition to obtain a legislative declaration of the right to take slaves, as property, into all the Territories; and a legislative denial of any right in Congress to forbid. But it failed. Mr. Benton denounced it as a "fire-brand," and it failed.

In the next year, 1848, an attempt was made to effect the same purpose by a judicial declaration from the Supreme Court. To effect this, a clause was inserted in one of the bills for the government of Territories, allowing slaves to enter court by way of petition for liberty, with the right of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States. That bill passed the Senate by the combined votes of Senators of entirely different opinions—some believing that the court would be for freedom, and others for slavery; but the House, on the first

* The court was divided, as follows, on the validity of the Missouri compromise act: against it, Judges Taney of Maryland, Wayne of Georgia, Catron of Tennessee, Daniel of Virginia, Grier of Pennsylvania, and Campbell of Alabama, five from slaveholding States. For it, Judges McLean of Ohio, and Curtis of Massachusetts. Expressing no opinion, Judge Nelson of New York.

† Said Judge Taney: "Undoubtedly, the powers of sovereignty and the eminent domain were ceded with the land."—Dred Scott, pamphlet, page 40.

* The right was accorded in the ordinance of 1787, coupled with a prohibition of slavery, and was limited to the Territories embraced in it. The Constitution embraced that ordinance in the word "engagements," in Article 6.

† Mr. Foote, of Mississippi, feared that the decision of the Supreme Court, as now constituted, would be against the South.

* Mr. Reverdy Johnson, of Maryland, believed in the ex-appearance of the bill, promptly nailed it to the Speaker's table. In March, 1857, when Mr. Calhoun's scheme was precisely ten years and one month old, the court adopted it as its own, and President Buchanan pledged himself "cheerfully to submit." The court adopted as law what Congress had ever denied from 1789 to 1854; what Mr. Calhoun and Mr. Buchanan both denied, by excluding slavery north of 36° 30', in the Texas resolutions of 1845; what Congress refused to declare as law in 1847; what Mr. Calhoun himself denied in 1848, by his vote to extend the Missouri compromise to the Pacific ocean; what the southern Democratic Senators denied at the same time, by the same vote; what Congress denied in the territorial bills of 1850; and what Congress also denied, by retaining the Missouri compromise, down to the 30th of May, 1854.

In view of these facts, so utterly irreconcilable with any settled conviction that Congress had not constitutional power to prohibit slavery, I hesitate not to say, that the purpose which Mr. Calhoun conceived, and which the President and the judiciary have attempted to execute, was purely political, founded upon no express provision of the Constitution, and no previous interpretation of it; founded upon nothing but a determination to extend slavery, without the consent of Congress or the people; and excused by nothing but those shallow, sectional, and therefore mischievous, notions of an "equilibrium of free and slave States" in number, and "equality of rights," which have not a shadow of support, either in the Constitution or the history of the Union.* The politicians of the pro-slavery school—the President and the court—are one; it is for the future to show whether Congress and the people shall withstand or submit. The Congress of 1854 was a party in the scheme; the Congress of 1858 may be a party in the scheme. The country looks to the next.

Let us look for a moment at the legislative and judicial politicians of 1854, harmoniously blending to give us a new Constitution without the process of formal amendment, or so much as saying to the States and the people, "by your leave." In the month of April, 1854, the Dred Scott case was argued in the United States circuit court for Missouri; and in that same April, 1854, the Kansas-Nebraska bill was argued in Congress. In May, 1854, the court decided the case for slavery; and in that same month of May, and on the 30th day thereof, Congress passed the Kansas-Nebraska bill. What was it? Every way a most remarkable act—remarkable for its fullness of promise; more remarkable for its fullness of failures; most remarkable for the fate of its prophet. He is not entirely without honor, save in his own party. His party has read him out; but with tolerable assurance that he will read his party out—out of the favor of the people, out of the next Congress, and out of the next Presidency. A fitting climax to the unexpected accidents of the Nebraska bill. It promised quiet, and has given us agitation; peace, and we have had the sword; non-interference, and we have had interference; fairness, and we have had fraud; law and order, and we have disorder and defiance to all law; freedom, and we have slavery; the rights of the sovereign people, and the people have been defrauded of their first, their dearest, and most sacred rights. Why should it not defeat its party? But in one point, and the chief one, the Kansas-Nebraska bill has not failed. It repealed the Missouri compromise, and swept our wide domain north of 36° 30' of the statute against slavery. Thus it prepared the way for the South to bring in its legions of slaves; and the court has decided that they can go in "under the Constitution of the United States." The design of the politicians has been confirmed by the court, and now it stands out in characters far too bold to be blinked. Slavery the supreme law in Federal territory! Slavery the general rule! Freedom the exception! That is the revolution. Let us see how it was to be achieved.

I will consider the edict of the court as it comes to us, officially declared and illustrated, by the President of the United States. Let us consult his official announcement to the country, in the first blush of gratitude to a confiding people, and the freshest sanctity of his official oath:

"A difference of opinion has arisen in regard to the time when the people of a Territory shall decide this question [of slavery] for themselves."—Inaugural Address, March, 1857.

It is of the rights of the sovereign people he speaks.

"This is, happily, a matter of but little practical importance."—Id.

To be sure, it concerns the rights of the people and the liberties of men; to be sure, it is a mere question of time—one year or ten; a petty question, whether they shall be half buried, or wholly buried, beneath the black flood of slavery, before they can decide whether they will be buried at all or not. To be sure, this is a very small matter, or the President is very much mistaken. But he goes on:

"And, besides, it is a judicial question, which legitimately belongs to the Supreme Court of the United States, before whom it is now pending, and will, it is understood, be speedily and finally settled."

"Before whom it is now pending!" The President "understood" that. It is true, then, that the Nebraska act was a mere tender to the Dred Scott decision, and Congress the very humble servant, to sweep the path in which the court would tread. And it is a "judicial question"—not political! for the court, which is hardly responsible to anybody; and not for Congress—not for the Representatives of the States and the people—whose responsibility is direct and inevitable. It is the Executive, too—one of the three coordinate branches of the Government—who thus exalts the one at the expense of the other! But, again, said the President:

"To their decision, in common with all good citizens, I shall cheerfully submit, whatever this may be."—Same.

Sir, it is not fit that I should stand here to harshly judge the President of the United States—a venerable old man, whose very age demands our homage and respect—now sinking from the topmost place of all the dignities of earth, by weight of years, and toils and cares; but no light words will serve, through any skill of mine, to express the sentiments I hold of that inaugural pledge. There are those who take that pledge as proof of collusion between the President and the court, against the powers of Congress and the liberties of the people. I take it as it stands: a total surrender of the independence of the President; a surrender of his constitutional right of judgment on a high official act, involving as well his own powers as the powers of another coordinate branch of the Government; and a pledge in advance, without examination, without judgment, without a why or wherefore, of unconditional submission to the court. Highest in dignity, as the President is; equal in power with each of the other two great constitutional branches of the Government, as the President is; and bound by his very oath to preserve his independence perfect and intact in the very least official act, it strikes me that the servility of that declaration was complete; that it implied a total surrender of the dignity of his position; a neglect of the high duty of his office, and an impeachment of the very independence that we are alone bound to respect.

Not so have other occupants of the presidential chair demeaned themselves and the dignity of their place; not so mistaken their duty, privilege, and right.

Said Mr. Madison, in founding the Constitution, and long before he reached the highest post created by it:

"If it be a fundamental principle of free government that the legislative, executive, and judiciary powers should be separately exercised, it is equally so that they be independently exercised."—5 Elliot's Debates, 337.

Said Washington, in his Farewell Address:

"The habits of thinking, in a free country, should inspire caution in those intrusted with its administration to confine themselves within their respective constitutional spheres, avoiding, in the exercise of the powers of one department, to encroach upon another. The spirit of encroachment tends to consolidate the powers of all the departments in one, and thus to create, whatever the form of government, a real despotism."

The submission of the executive to the judiciary, is submission to an encroachment; the subordination of the executive and legislative branches to the judicial, is but to "consolidate the powers of all the departments in one, and thus to create a real despotism." I believe in Washington.

Said President Jackson:

"The opinion of the judges has no more authority over Congress than the opinion of Congress has over the judges; and on that point the President is independent of both. The authority of the Supreme Court must not, therefore, be permitted to control the Congress or the Executive, when acting in their legislative capacities, but to have only such influence as the force of their reasoning may deserve."—President Jackson's Veto Message on Bill to Charter the United States Bank, July 10, 1832.

Sir, I thought, and honestly thought, that declaration of President Jackson arrogant, then; I think it admirable now. It contains the constitutional rule.

I pass to the next announcement of the President, five months after the inaugural address, and the decision of the court. It is in that remarkable document, then unofficial, but since made official—the President's letter of August 15, 1857, to Professor Silliman and others, citizens of Connecticut:

"Slavery existed at that period, [the passage of the Kansas-Nebraska bill], and still exists in Kansas, under the Constitution of the United States. This point has at last been decided by the highest tribunal known to our laws. How it could ever have been doubted, is a mystery."

Behold the advance! In March, only five months before, it was a mere question of time that was submitted to the court; in August, it was a grave constitutional principle that had been asserted. In March, it was merely a question "when the people of a Territory shall decide this question of slavery for themselves;" in August, they cannot decide it at all! In March, it was squatter sovereignty or State sovereignty; in August, it is neither—slavery "exists under the Constitution of the United States." In March, it was "a question of little practical importance" that was submitted to the court; in August, the court had asserted a supreme rule of law, and a rule utterly subversive of all the ideas and intentions of the framers of the Constitution, and of the practice of the Government; a rule of law never even dreamed of until 1847, and then consigned, by common consent, to quiet sleep upon the table of the Senate. The dream of the South Carolina Senator has been realized by the court. It has received the lineaments and power of a new divinity from the breath of the court. The President "ignorantly worshipped" it in March; but in August, his faith was fired by sight, and, in all the glow of a new conviction, he shouts, I BELIEVE! THE WONDER IS THAT I EVER DOUBTED! And what is the new Democratic creed imposed by this new Democratic divinity? It is a reversal of the common law as to the Territories. It is, that slavery went into Kansas, and goes into every new Territory, "under the Constitution." It is, that Congress cannot exclude it, and the territorial people and government cannot exclude it. It is, that slavery must go there, and stay there—at least until the people, by virtue of their sovereignty as an organized State, shall turn it out. It is, that we are to have no peace, but an ever-recurring struggle in the Territories on their settlement, and in Congress on their admission as a State. No peace! no more peace! but strife and heart-burnings; a dearth and death of patriotic sentiments, fraternal affections, and mutual respect; passion responding to passion, and threats to threats—in this Capitol, in the States, and among all the people; struggle upon struggle, and conflict upon conflict, involving, at last, the Territories, the States, and the istence of the power in Congress to pass a law to prohibit slavery in Territories; and if such a law was presented to the Supreme Court for a decision on its constitutionality, it would be in favor of the law. As a judicial question, the decision would be against the protection of the South."—Benton's Examination of Dred Scott Case, note, page 26.

*The ratification of nine States was required to form the Union; and thirteen was the whole number at the adoption of the Constitution. You cannot divide these numbers by two. Moreover, eight of the thirteen were regarded as free, to only five slave States; and six new free States (including Vermont) not exceeding four new slave States, were provided for. So much for "equilibrium." In Federal Convention, August 29, 1787, Gouverneur Morris moved to strike out from the clause on the admission of new States, the words—"The new States shall be admitted on the same terms with the original States." Mr. Madison "did not wish to bind down the Legislature to admit western States on the terms here stated." Mr. Langdon "did not know but circumstances might arise which would render it inconvenient to admit new States on terms of equality." Mr. Williamson was for "leaving the Legislature free." Mr. Morris's motion was agreed to—nine States voting "ay," and two States (Maryland and Virginia) voting "no." (Madison Papers, 5 Elliot's Debates, 493, 493.) Thus, Congress was left with the simple power to admit new States, restrained in nothing except that they shall be "republican." (Constitution, article 4, section 3.) So much for "equality."

nation, in all the horrors of civil war. These are the promised fruits of this bud of revolution.

Transmigration is the new article of Democratic faith, and trouble is the inevitable result. Transmigration is the doctrine declared by the President; and he quotes upon us the authority of the court. As well might he quote the ancient Greek, and hope thus to force us all

"To hold opinion with Pythagoras,
That souls of animals infuse themselves
Into the trunks of men."

Transmigration of slavery is the new Democratic doctrine: transmigration from State to Territory, and Territory to Territory, till all your broad domain is doomed to bear the taint of slaves; to bear the wrongs, the wrath, and I know not but the revenge, of slaves; and with all these, and because of all these, the hatred of freemen and the scorn of the world.

But we have had a further revelation from the President, in the annual message transmitted to the present Congress:

"The slaves were brought into the Territory [of Kansas] under the Constitution of the United States, and are now the property of their masters. This point has at length been finally decided by the highest judicial tribunal of the country—and this upon the plain principle that when a Confederacy of sovereign States acquire new territory at their joint expense, both equality and justice demand that the citizens of one and all of them shall have the right to take into it whatsoever is recognized as property by the common Constitution. To have summarily confiscated the property in slaves already in the Territory, would have been an act of gross injustice, and contrary to the practice of the older States of the Union, which have abolished slavery."—President Buchanan's Annual Message, December, 1857, p. 23.

The plot advances—the consequences advance; and again we have the testimony of the President that the advance is by the authority of the court. In August we learned that slavery went into Kansas "under the constitution;" in December we learn a harder lesson: property in slaves is recognized by the common constitution; and the common property in land (i. e. in the Territories) was acquired by and belongs to the States, in their confederated capacity. The consequences are, that slavery goes there, and stays there, through all the years of territorial pupillage, and that a new-born sovereign State cannot eject it without making compensation. All this, too, upon the plea of "equality and justice." Slavery extended by "equality and justice;" and freedom—the common property of each living soul, by the "equality" of a common birth, and the eternal "justice" of a common God—is forgotten! I think now we have gained a tolerably clear idea of the doctrines of the court and the President, which constitute the three prime articles of the new Democratic creed in respect to all the Federal Territories; and I express them as follows:

1. Slavery is to go there; Congress cannot prevent.
2. Slavery is to stay there until State organization; neither Congress nor the people can prevent.
3. Slavery cannot be excluded, even by the new State organization, without compensation.

Thus Federal sovereignty is ignored; squatter sovereignty is ignored; popular sovereignty is ignored; and State sovereignty itself is circumscribed. Call all that by what name you choose; I call it—REVOLUTION.

But is there no mistake? Look at the history of Kansas and the Lecompton constitution—the illustration and the example of this entire revolution. Two points in the history of the Territory are conceded by everybody: slavery went there and staid there. How is it now in the State of Kansas? The President permits no mistake, no misapprehension in the matter; and I therefore introduce the Lecompton constitution as he introduced it to us on the 2d of February last—in accordance with the authority of the court.

"It has been solemnly adjudged, by the highest tribunal known to our laws, that slavery exists in Kansas by virtue of the Constitution of the United States. Kansas is therefore, at this moment, as much a slave State as Georgia or South Carolina."—President's Special Message, February 2, 1858.

"Article VII.—Slavery.

"SECTION 1. The right of property is before and higher than any constitutional sanction; and the right of the owner of a slave to such a slave and its increase is the same, and as inviolable, as the right of the owner of any property whatsoever.

"Sec. 2. The Legislature shall have no power to pass laws for the emancipation of slaves without the consent of the owners, or without paying the owners, previous to their emancipation, a full equivalent in money for the slaves so emancipated. They shall have no power to prevent emigrants to the State from bringing with them such persons as are deemed slaves by the laws of any one of the United States or Territories, so long as any person of the same age or description shall be continued in slavery by the laws of this State."—Lecompton Constitution.

Kansas is "as much a slave State as Georgia or South Carolina"—"by virtue of the Constitution of the United States!" These are the President's words. I stop not to say that the common-law principle is abrogated by these words—revolutionized, indeed—and that slavery is nationalized. Perhaps the President's language was not well weighed. Nor do I stop to ask whether the purpose of the Kansas-Nebraska act was to make independent States, outside of the Union; or to suggest that the Union is dissolved already—our Territory, our common property, our new-born State of many woeful throes, already gone. The point is this: Kansas has been made a slave State by the new revolutionary doctrine, without act of ours, without Federal consent, and without the act or consent of its own people, and against them all; and, by the same new revolutionary doctrine, it can never get rid of slavery without paying for the privilege! This is the illustration and example of Kansas; plain, pointed, unmistakable, and undeniable. What says the Lecompton constitution? Slaves are property; so said the court and the President. Slaves cannot be "confiscated" without compensation, says Lecompton; so said the President. The right in slave property is "as inviolable" as the right in any other property, says Lecompton. Yea, more; a little more inviolable. It cannot pass "on tick." "No trust!"—a full price!"—cash down, or no trade!"—that is the rule of the Lecompton constitution; and the President recommends it to us. We are bound to believe that he at least thinks it is all right.

Now, sir, I think we can begin to understand the exact meaning of that very pretty and very fashionable phrase—"the equal rights of the people and the States in the common domain." The slave-State man goes there and takes his "institution" with him. He plants it all over the land; he guards it with laws and guns; around it all he puts the Constitution of the United States, and on this triple wall he mounts the Federal Army. He takes his "institution" there; he keeps it; and calls on us to defend it, at the common cost.

That is one picture. How fares it now with the liberty-loving and hard-laboring free-State man? "Equal rights" is the doctrine. You invite him with the promise of "equal rights;" you flatter him with the hope of "equal rights;" and he goes to your "common territory," expecting there to find that the common government of a common people, under a common constitution, on a common soil, will give him at least common and "equal rights." How fares the free man when he goes? He finds himself despised, degraded—cut off from the amenities of social life, the common civilities of society, and the power of rising, by superior industry and virtue, to the dignity he had left in his old northern home, and the dignity he had lost by contact with your slaves. Through all the territorial term he cannot even buy back his birth-right! Does he talk of his common rights? he is seditious! Does he resist infringement on his personal rights, or refuse obedience to unjust and unconstitutional acts? he is rebellious! Does he attempt to frame a government after his own pattern, and put into it guarantees for the free institutions he loves—all in submission to your authority? it is treasonable! And you treat him as a seditious, rebellious, and dangerous man—an alien and an enemy. Such has been the territorial condition of the free-State men of the Territory of Kansas. And now how is it in the State of Kansas? Sometime or other—perhaps in 1864, but nobody knows exactly when—the free-State men may have the privilege of trying to get free institutions—on conditions! SLAVERY IS CERTAIN—FREEDOM IS CONDITIONAL! And the conditions—what are these? Why, sir, the free-State men can have free institutions when, and only when, they are able to out-vote and buy out the pro-slavery men. Slavery goes in at the common expense of the whole nation. Slavery goes out at the expense of the new, half-settled State, poor from the very burdens of its youth, but rich in noble souls, endued with all the grace and glorious hopes of freedom. SLAVERY SCOT FREE—FREEDOM BY PURCHASE! That is the exact result.

Sir, the President and the court use honeyed phrases, and give them magic power—the absolute power of constitutional grants. The President talks of "equality and justice," and the court talks of the "common and equal benefit" of all the people, and the "common use" of all the Territories. These pretty phrases badly suit the actual picture I have drawn; far worse suit the end designed. As the Territories are the common property of all the people of all the States, and subject to their "common use," what rule is just, is equal, is practicable, but the harmonious rule that none but common property of all the people of all the States can enter there? He who takes uncommon property, takes more than is his common right. He who takes property that others cannot take or hold, makes more than "common use." What, then, is the fact? Slaves are not the common property of all the citizens of all the States. A majority of the States forbid it, and the consciences of their people forbid it. They hold, and their States hold, that property in slaves exists by no right at all—no common, general law. God gave to man "dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowls of the air, and over every living thing that creepeth upon the earth"—not over man. (Genesis i., 28.) There may be, and there is, legal dominion; but only by force of arbitrary power, expressed in governmental law, having no sort of force beyond the governmental line. Property in slaves is therefore special—limited to a moiety of the States, and to some four hundred thousand men, out of the millions of this land. This is the great and undisputed fact. Give us, then, the equal, just, and common rights of equal owners in the common soil. The humblest freeman of Vermont demands an equal right with any southern man, in all your broad domain. He never did, and never will, concede to any other man one hair's breadth beyond. "Equal rights"—no patent of nobility—no special privilege of property—no privilege of caste; on these he stands, and will forever stand. Equal you may go—equal you shall stand—and the brave Green Mountain boy will be your brother and your friend. On any other ground, in ballot-box or field—by Allen's blood, by Allen's pride, by Allen's scorn of danger or of wrong—you meet a foeman worthy of your steel.

Such was the law; such were the common rights of all the citizens of all the States. How is it now? Sir, I have tried to understand the position and the opinion of the court, and I think I have not mistaken it. It had a task to perform, not necessarily included in the case of Dred Scott. It seems to me it had a task to perform, set by the politicians. It was to construct a bridge from the slave States to free Territories, by means of which to carry the slaves of the one to cover the acres of the other. The process of construction I think I understand.

"The right of property in a slave is distinctly and expressly affirmed in the Constitution," said Judge Taney. Now I am not sure of the full force intended by this rule; but, taking it in the most limited and least exceptionable sense, it means that the Constitution "recognizes" (a word once used by the court) the right of slave property in the slave States. There, then, is one abutment of the bridge—in the slave States. Now for the other:

"The territory was acquired by the General Government, as the representative and trustee of the people of the United States; and it must therefore be held in that character for their common and equal benefit."

* "Moveth," in the common version; creepeth, in the Hebrew.

† It is now claimed that citizens of slave States are entitled to take their slaves to Federal territory, and hold them there, by virtue of the common interest, or common property of the States, says the President, or of the people, says the court, in the Territory; yet, the fact is, that Congress, in the constitutional power to admit new States, was expressly authorized to ignore utterly, the property, or the interest, of the States, or the people, in territory out of their jurisdiction. Vermont was claimed as the property of New York, and of citizens of New York, and as being within the limits of New York, and Congress so recognized the fact to be; yet, the Federal convention expressly provided for the admission of Vermont to the Union as an independent State, without the consent of New York. In the clause of the Constitution on the admission of new States, the word "limits" originally stood in place of the word "jurisdiction." Mr.

Revolution in the Law of the Land—Mr. Walton.

HO. OF REPS.

So said Judge Taney. There, then, is the other abutment—in the Territory. Now for the connecting beams:

"The Territory being a part of the United States, the Government and the citizens both enter it under the authority of the Constitution, with their respective rights defined and marked out."

These are the words of Judge Taney. Sir, the venerable Chief Justice speaks of the constitutional rights of citizens and Government as being "defined and marked out." I find no "defined" rights in the Constitution that will take slavery into free territory; I find no statesman or jurist, in all the noble line from the Revolution to our day, who has ever found such a right "defined." Mr. Calhoun inferred it, in 1847, and to him belongs the merit—if merit it be—of that almighty inference. I find no beams "defined." Must we imagine them? Does the stated fact, that the Territories "are a part of the United States," bridge the unfathomable gulf? Then, what a bridge! the bridge of many bridges—reaching from all the slave to all the free Territories and States! No longer sovereign States; no longer "free and independent States." The free States are "parts" of the United States. In lands, in forts and arsenals, in navy-yards and warehouses, there is not one which has not, within itself, some common public property. We cannot so make slavery national—so blot out every free State. I charge the court with no such crime. We must find better beams than these, and long and strong, to bear the weight of wrong and woe, involved in that word "slave." The President has supplied them in "equality and justice;" and the court has supplied them in the "common and equal benefit." These are the beams—the real beams. They are full strong enough for the real design; but weak as shadows for the false. These beams will bear the common property of all the States, and all the people; and that is all they bear. That only is for "the common and equal benefit;" that, and that alone, is "equality and justice." Add but one ounce of special property, of "a peculiar species of property, over and above the species of property common to all the States"—I say, add but one ounce of this peculiar property, add one single slave, and the beams of a "common and equal benefit," of "equality and justice," will break beneath the unlawful weight. Now, sir, if I am right; if I have justly appreciated this piece of judicial and executive mechanism, I submit it as good law, that the slave-owner, or the slave-driver, who puts his load through the bottom of that bridge, cannot require any Government—Federal, territorial, or State—to respond in damages.

Mr. Chairman, it is time, and it is but fair, to turn to the declarations of the court. The President charges all to the court. Three times has he spoken in the name of the court. I give you, now, the declarations of the majority of the court, declared by the Chief Justice, barely remarking that they are, substantially, copied from Mr. Calhoun's resolutions, of 1847.

As to territory, Judge Taney says:

"It was acquired by the General Government, as the representative and trustee of the people of the United States, and it must, therefore, be held in that character for their common and equal benefit; for it was the people of the several States, acting through their agent and representative, the Federal Government, who, in fact, acquired the territory in question, and the Government holds it for their common use until it shall be associated with the other States as a member of the Union."—Dred Scott Decision, pamphlet, page 54.

As to slaveholders, he said:

"The territory being a part of the United States, the Government and the citizens both enter it under the authority of the Constitution, with their respective rights defined and marked out."—Same, page 55.

As to slave property, Judge Taney said that the Constitution "makes no distinction between that description of property and other property;" that "the right of property in a slave is distinctly and expressly affirmed in the Constitution;" that "no word can be found in the Constitution which gives Congress a greater power over slave property, or Madison gave the reason for this change, as follows: "This also was meant to guard the case of Vermont—the jurisdiction of New York not extending over Vermont, which was in the exercise of sovereignty, though Vermont was within the asserted limits of New York."—5 Elliot, page 495.

George Mason, of Virginia, thus described slavery in the Federal convention.—5 Elliot, page 296.

which entitles property of that kind to less protection than property of any other description. The only power conferred is the power coupled with the duty of guarding and protecting the owner in his rights." (Same, pages 57, 58.) As a conclusion, the judge said:

"Upon these considerations, it is the opinion of the court that the act of Congress, which prohibited a citizen from holding and owning property, of this kind, in the territory of the United States, &c., is not warranted by the Constitution, and is therefore void."—Same, page 58.

The burden of the court is, that slaves are property, and that the title to the Territories is held by the Federal Government as a mere trustee, leaving the use to the States and their people. But not one word of all this is found in the Constitution! The court gives them to us as fundamental principles of constitutional law; and, as conclusions, strips Congress of a power exercised from the very foundation of the Government, and opens all our Territories to slavery! Is it not strange that principles so great as these were entirely omitted from the Constitution? strange that they were left to mere implication or interpretation? and strange that no Congress, no statesmen, no jurists, and not even this court itself, ever discovered them, until two thirds of a century had elapsed? Now, sir, I do not believe that the whole country hath been in ignorance until this day. I do not believe that these principles were ever put into the Constitution, or designed to be drawn from it. That instrument puts no limit to the power of Congress over Federal territory, but rather grants the power to "make all needful rules and regulations respecting" it. I see nothing in it like a guarantee of the use of all the Territories for slavery, or even a use of it by citizens or States for any purpose whatever, without Federal consent. The title and the sovereignty are both in the Federal Government, as Judge Taney himself has said—"the powers of government and the right of soil," as the Supreme Court has said, (8 Wheaton, 543)—and Federal sovereignty has heretofore excluded both property (liquors) and citizens (traders) from Federal territory, and alienated the very land itself to foreign Governments. It seems, then, that the court has revolutionized the Constitution in this respect. Nor can I believe in—nay, I utterly reject—the new doctrine that the Constitution affirms the right of property in slaves. Four times does it speak of them as "persons," not once as property. Indeed the very record shows that all countenance to the idea of property in man was carefully and designedly excluded. Thus:

"Mr. Sherman was against this second part [sec. 9, vol. 1, the tax on importation of slaves] as acknowledging men to be property."—5 Elliot's Debates in Federal Convention, vol. 5, page 478.

"Mr. Gorham thought that Mr. Sherman should consider the duty, not as implying that slaves are property, but as a disencumbrance to the importation of them."—Same.

"Mr. Madison thought it wrong to admit in the Constitution the idea that there could be property in men. The reason of duties did not hold, as slaves are not, like merchandise, consumed," &c.—Same.

Thus in the case of the solitary word in the Constitution which could possibly convey the idea of property in man—"importation"—the inference was promptly and plainly repelled upon the first suggestion. The true design, then, of the framers of the Constitution is defeated by the court. It is the court, then, which is responsible for this new and sweeping dispensation. It is the court which affects the power of sovereignty, and grants, of its own will and pleasure, a new constitution! It is the President who interprets it, who accepts it for the States and the people, and who attempts to bind it upon their Representatives here, with all the weight of supreme law! And with what fruits?

The law of the land was, that slavery is local; the new is, that it goes wherever the Constitution goes, unchecked by the sovereignty of the new States. The common law, then, as to Federal territory, has been abrogated.

The judicial power was, to emancipate a slave when taken beyond the jurisdiction of the local law; the judicial power is, to enslave him where ever the Constitution goes, unchecked by the sovereignty of a free State.

The power of the States was complete; it is now circumscribed. No emancipation without compensation!

The power of Congress over slavery in Federal territory was complete; now it is annulled.

The Constitution was for freedom; now it is for slavery.

The old idea was, that slavery was the exception; the new one is, that it is the general rule—extending through all the slave States, and over all the unorganized territory. You have enough of it already to double the organized States of the Union, and are preparing to-day for the annexation of Cuba, of Mexico, and of Central America.

Sir, if I understand the doctrines of the President and the court, there is no half-way house for slavery—no bound to stay the advancing flood—no home, no resting-place for freedom, in all your broad and grand domain. If I understand them truly, then is our proud boast of liberty a miserable lie; and then that song of ours—doubly inspired by the deities of poetry and patriotism, and born beneath the very portals of your Capitol—that melody of glory, that fires our souls and nerves our arms for is but the sharpest, saddest sarcasm, that ever flashed from human lips.

Mr. Chairman, this is the revolution: how swift! how sweeping! Sweeping away high powers of Congress, and of the new States; sweeping away the ancient laws of our fathers; sweeping away the ancient landmarks of our fathers; sweeping away that ordained "blessing of liberty" which was the reward of their sore trials, the crown of their great victory, and their legacy to us. What is our heritage, and what shall our children's be? All this is wrong; it is not right, nor wise, nor safe. We are false to our fathers if we believe it, and false to their honor and ours if we do not reject it.

I believe that a great wrong has been committed upon the Constitution itself, and a wrong that will tell with terrible power upon the future destiny of the country. In the exercise of my right here, on the convictions of my judgment and the obligations of my oath, I have attempted to expose it. Incidentally and inevitably, I have spoken freely of a coördinate branch of the Government, whose rightful powers I am bound to respect. Incidentally and inevitably, I have condemned the Supreme Court of the United States; but not intentionally to detract from its dignity, or bring it into contempt. Taught to reverence it from my youth, and habitually reverencing it through life—respecting it still, and meaning to respect it hereafter, whenever and so far as it revolves in the appointed line, harmonious with other equal spheres in the Federal system—I have lived to learn, alas! that this exalted court can err. And with what wreck! as if some central sun, the source of light and life, should quit its pathway in the skies, and leave its worlds to die.

I shall fail of my conceptions of my duty if I do not add a denial of the right of the judicial department to infringe upon the province of the political department; if I do not deny the right of the court to revise the political acts of Congress, or to bind a single member of this body by the authority of its opinions. Its judgments are final between all the parties before it in every judicial "case;" but it has no power over Congress or the Executive, and can claim no respect from them, beyond what is due to the reasoning of the court. I give you my justification:

"Every member of the legislative body is bound to examine and decide for himself, whether the bill or resolution is within the constitutional reach of the legislative powers confided to Congress."—Story's Commentaries, sec. 374.

But, let us look to the very source of the Constitution itself:

"IN CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION,
August 27, 1787.

"Dr. Johnson moved to insert words so as to give the Supreme Court jurisdiction over 'cases' arising 'under this Constitution.'"

"Mr. Madison doubted whether it was not going too far to extend the jurisdiction of the court generally to cases arising under the Constitution, and whether it ought not to be limited to cases of a judiciary nature. The right of expounding the Constitution, in cases not of this nature, ought not to be given to that department."

"The motion of Dr. Johnson was agreed to nem. con., it being generally supposed that the jurisdiction given was constructively limited to cases of a judiciary nature."—Madison Papers, 5 Elliot's Debates, page 483.

Said Judge Story, in his Commentaries on the Constitution:

"In measures exclusively of a political, legislative, or ex-entire character, it is plain, that as the supreme authority, as to these questions, belongs to the legislative and executive departments, they cannot be reexamined elsewhere."—See 374.

Let us go to one of the apostles. Said Mr. Jefferson:

"You seem to consider the judges as the ultimate arbiters of all constitutional questions—a very dangerous doctrine, indeed, and one which would place us under the despotism of an oligarchy." * * * "The Constitution has created no such single tribunal, knowing that, to whatever hands confided, with the corruptions of time and party, its members would become despots."—Jefferson to Mr. Jarvis, September 28, 1820.

Were those words prophetic? Is the court a despotism?—tempted, tainted, with "the corruption" of these times, and a "party" of our day? Representatives of the people! judge ye. To whatever motive, whatever purpose, you now charge the judgment of the court—be it high or low, patriotic or partisan, right or wrong—its fruits must be the test. The President has three times tendered you these fruits; three times he tells you—"it is the court!" What are these fruits? Revolution! reversal of ancient and honored law! denial of the high privilege and power of Congress, and annulment of our acts! Judge ye—truly, fairly, faithfully judge. Above us all—above Congress, the President, and the court—stand the sovereign people of this land; and to that mightier court this mighty case will be appealed.

Mr. Chairman, I warn the Representatives of the South. You count the court upon your side in this mad party strife. You dream of triumph through the court; you dream of safety in the court; you quote its words; you call them law; you try to bind us by their power. Are you safe? What mean these words: "The right of property in a slave is distinctly and expressly affirmed in the Constitution; it makes no distinction between that description of property and other property?" What is the interpretation of your President? "Slavery exists by virtue of the Constitution!" What is the actual effect that has been given, and that you are fierce still to give, to this doctrine? Slaves, as property, not as "persons," pass from States to Territories. Do you not see that "property" thus passed, by sale or otherwise, is a commercial matter between the States? Do you not see that the court has reversed the opinion of Judge Barbour, to wit: that slaves, as "persons, are not subjects of commerce?" Do you not see that it has reversed a late decision of this very court, to wit: that slavery did not come within the power of Congress to regulate commerce, both external and internal, because it was "A STATE INSTITUTION?" Do you not see, then, that, as property, undistinguished from other property, Congress has the clear right, by specific grant of the Constitution, to regulate the slave trade "among the several States" and Territories, and "with the Indian tribes?" Ay, do you not see, that as mere property, undistinguished from other property, slavery falls within that other constitutional attribute of Federal sovereignty—the power to take private property for public use, on making just compensation?

Representatives of the South, is it not even so? If it be so, then has your strong wall of State sovereignty crumbled to the dust; then Federal power will rightfully touch your slaves within your very citadels; then will it touch your slaves with death, to give your men to liberty and life. If it be so, a single generation shall not pass—the half of a generation shall not pass—ere your slave system falls; ere not one slave remains, save here and there a battered wreck—a few lone servants, superannuated and sad, standing by your lintels, like the tottering pillars of some old Egyptian temple—the melancholy monuments of a past slaveholding age. Are you safe? Is this the lesson of the court? Is this the lesson you are teaching us to-day? If the dicta of the court do stop short of this, then tell me where is the line? It is not marked in the chart the court has given you. But if there is a line, what then? What is the lesson that you teach, as to the power of the court? Run that lesson out to its inevitable result. One day will come another court; one day will come another opinion of a majority of the judges; I will not say another revolution, but a movement forward—a very slight advance, compared with the recent stride—some new installment of judicial law; some new investment or new denial of Federal power, to bring to its very end the system you now so desperately sustain. Are you safe? And when that day comes—and by your present teaching it may quickly come—will you not call it despotism? Ay! you know it, and I know it; and by that token let me say that the powers that you have invoked, the powers which you have so unscrupulously used for your unscrupulous schemes of dominion or disunion—the excesses of power, of the court, of the Executive, of the Army, all unwarranted by authority of law—can bear no softer, smoother, courtlier name. It is despotic power. It is irresponsible power. It is unconstitutional power.

Rejecting, as I wish to do, the hitherto unknown and abominable doctrine, that the right of property in slaves exists "by virtue of the Constitution," I would also reject the logical consequences that flow from it; but if, on the authority of the court and the Executive, we are compelled to take the doctrine, the South certainly must not complain, should we carry it rigidly out to all its consequences. I prefer the teachings and the policy of the fathers. I prefer to act up to their sentiments. I prefer a prohibition of slavery in all Federal Territory; a rigid exclusion of the slave trade, in all its old and all its new disguises; and encouragement to all the slave States for the amelioration and ultimate extinction of slavery, within their own limits, by their own voluntary acts. All this would be in harmony with the spirit, the principles, the expectation, and the acts of the fathers of the Union. All this, undertaken with kindness, and prudence, and wisdom, I believe to be yet possible: in the face of the madness that rules the present hour, I yet believe it. Undertaken in such a spirit, and pursued in such a spirit—though the struggle be long and the foes many—no good thing has ever failed. Sir, I hope the crisis of to-day is the crisis of the disease; and that coming days will be the happy days of health and peace. Are there not symptoms warranting hope?—in the fresh example of Russia, and even in your own new voluntary movements. You of the South to-day are calling for laborers to till your golden fields. Why, then, do you not cease to weaken your strength and impoverish your States, by expanding your already incompetent force? Some of your States are seeking, even now, fresh hordes of barbarian Africans, and even more dangerous hordes of the corrupt, but intelligent, Chinese—all, nominally, as voluntary servants. Why, then, not make all your labor voluntary? You tell us that the difference between free labor and slave, is but in name. Why quarrel on a word? Why foment dissension—why light the torch of civil war—why break the bond of union—upon a paltry phrase. Another phrase will sound as well, and voluntary labor will do as well. Why, then, not give us what just now you speak—FREE, VOLUNTARY LABOR? That phrase—adopted in good faith, pronounced in laws, and sealed in honest deed—may heal the trouble of our time. If anybody is to object to that, I think it is the people of the North. If anybody is to reap peculiar advantages—in wealth, in numbers, and in power—I know it is the people of the South. The question for the South is whether to elevate her people and her States. The question for the North is, whether to envy you, I think—not oppose—the blessing of so grand a work, or, in the fullness of a brother's heart, to pray for all—"God speed." But you give us here no such alternative as that. You press us to the wall, and you break over it, or through it, if we do not unyieldingly resist. If we do not resist, you break down the wall of 1820, and plant slavery forever on freedom's consecrated soil. We do, and we will, resist. You seek to extend your peculiar institution over all the Territories which are the common property of the Union; and by virtue of our common rights, we do, we must, we will resist. You are the assailants; it is for us to defend. You start the revolution; it is for us to roll it back.

One word, sir, as to the bill which is the subject of this long debate. It involves the Lecompton constitution, which is itself the example and illustration of the revolution I have condemned. I am for defeating that bill, as an embodiment of this revolution. I will strangle it here if I can; and if I cannot, I will commit it to the people of Kansas, to receive an ignominious death upon the very soil it would pollute. But whatever be the event, as I now resist the revolution which is involved in this bill, so do I intend to resist it hereafter, in all the shapes which it may be made to assume. Your revolution dates in 1847, from the rejected resolutions of John C. Calhoun; you revived it in the Kansas-Nebraska act of 1854; nursed it through the dubious crisis of 1856; rooted it in the Supreme Court in 1857; and now you dare to show the budding of its despotic fruits in the Lecompton constitution. Our counter-revolution is but just begun; here and to-morrow, on this bill, we strike the first blow. God and the people willing, it shall not be the last.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I suppose that it is about time for the committee to rise; and I suppose that, on the rising of the committee to-night, the debate will be closed upon the Kansas question, and that, when next we go into committee, the merits of the deficiency bill will be open for discussion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair stated that it was his intention, on the last day of the debate, to give the floor to gentlemen who desired to discuss the bill, in preference to others.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I desire to make a few remarks upon the bill, and I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

And then, on motion of Mr. BOCKOCK, the House (at twenty minutes to one o'clock, a. m.) adjourned.

ADMISSION OF KANSAS.

SPEECH OF HON. W. BARKSDALE, OF MISSISSIPPI,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
March 20, 1858.

[REVISED BY HIMSELF.*]

The House being in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. BARKSDALE said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: The third section of the fourth article of the Constitution of the United States declares that new States may be admitted by the Congress into the Union; and the fourth section of the same article provides that the United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion, and, on application of the Legislature, or of the Executive when the Legislature cannot be convened, against domestic violence.

Under these clauses of the Federal Constitution, Mr. Chairman, from the beginning of the Government to 1820—in its purer and better days—in the days of Washington, Jefferson, Madison, and Monroe, of the great men who fought the battles of the Revolution, and achieved our independence, free States and slave States were admitted into the Union without any discussion as to their domestic institutions. During that period Vermont, Kentucky, Tennessee, Ohio, Louisiana, Indiana, Mississippi, Illinois, and Alabama, were all admitted into the Union on terms of perfect equality with the original States that formed the Confederacy. In 1820, however, when Missouri applied for admission, her application was resisted, not because her constitution was not republican in form, not because there was any objection to her boundaries, not because she did not have the requisite population, not because she had not undergone a territorial pupillage, but because her constitution recognized slavery.

Here, sir, commenced the agitation of that fearful question of slavery, which, though presenting at different times somewhat varying aspects, remains unchanged in its essence and character, and is to-day what it was then—a contest for sectional aggrandizement on the one hand, and existence on the other.

This fierce struggle was finally ended by the admission of Missouri; but in order to secure it, the South was forced to yield to an unjust and unconstitutional restriction, by which slavery was forever prohibited north of 36° 30'.

Admission of Kansas—Mr. Barksdale.

HO. OF REPS.

It is unnecessary for me, sir, to repeat the events of that period. They have been often depicted during the present session of Congress in the discussion of this Kansas question, and are well known to the country. And from that period to the present, whenever a slave State has applied for admission into the Union—as in the case of Arkansas, of Florida, and of Texas—the country has passed through the same scenes of agitation, of excitement, and of turmoil, through which we are passing now.

Mr. Chairman, when a State applies for admission into the Union, what are the inquiries to be made by Congress? First, whether the constitution is the act and will of the people of that Territory, or inchoate State; and secondly, whether her constitution is republican in form. To arrive at a satisfactory solution of these questions, as connected with the application of Kansas, I propose to call the attention of the House to certain facts, the authenticity of which no one can successfully controvert.

On the 3d of February the President of the United States, in the patriotic discharge of his duty, transmitted to Congress a constitution formed by Kansas, at Leecompton, with her application for admission into the Union, accompanied by a message marked with extraordinary ability, urging her admission. The question for us to ask is, is this the constitution of the people of Kansas? Have they made it? Is it their act and deed, and are they applying for admission into the Union under it?

The objects of the Kansas-Nebraska bill, introduced into the Senate by Judge DOUGLAS, who was its avowed champion, were to organize these Territories; to confer upon the people whatever powers of legislation were possessed by Congress; to leave them perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way; to banish the slavery question, with its accompanying evils, from the Halls of Congress, and to repeal the Missouri restriction, thus establishing the principle of non-intervention, upon which patriotic, national men, of all sections, could stand. That bill became the law of the land. The Missouri restriction was repealed, and Kansas and Nebraska became organized Territories. A Governor of Kansas and other officers were appointed. A Territorial Legislature was elected by the people, and all the machinery of a territorial government put in operation. It has been charged, however, that there were frauds practiced in the election of the first Legislature of the Territory of Kansas. I do not know how that may be. I do know, however, that before the Kansas-Nebraska bill passed—after it became evident that it would pass—an organization was gotten up in the State of Massachusetts, with a capital amounting to $3,000,000, for the purpose of sending emigrants into Kansas, with a view, not of becoming citizens, but of shaping and controlling its institutions, and defeating the objects of the law. Now, sir, what does Judge DOUGLAS say with reference to the organization of this Emigrant Aid Society, in an official document, in his report to the Senate, made before he had formed an unhallowed combination with the Black Republicans to defeat this bill?

Mr. DAWES. The gentleman is mistaken in what he says about a society organized, as he says, in Massachusetts.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I understand, sir, what are the facts in connection with the organization of this society. Its objects were to defeat the law; and many of those who went to that Territory under its auspices, left it, never to return, immediately after the first election.

Mr. DAWES. Will the gentleman let me correct him?

Mr. BARKSDALE. No, sir. I do not mean to treat the gentleman discourteously, but I cannot yield.

Mr. DAWES. I wish to say to the gentleman that no such society was organized in Massachusetts as he has described.

Mr. BARKSDALE. Why, sir, it has never been denied before, to my knowledge.

Mr. DAWES. It is denied now. He is mistaken about the society.

Mr. BARKSDALE. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] boldly avowed it in the Senate, and it was admitted upon this floor by the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. Mace, a member of this House in the Thirty-Third Congress.

Mr. SINGLETON. Mr. Mace acknowledged that he was president of the association.

Mr. DAWES. The gentleman says that the Legislature of Massachusetts incorporated such a society.

Mr. BARKSDALE. The gentleman is mistaken. I did not say the Legislature incorporated the society. I said there was an organization formed with a capital of $3,000,000.

Mr. DAWES. And formed in Massachusetts, I understand you to say.

Mr. BARKSDALE. Yes, sir; that is my understanding.

Mr. DAWES. The gentleman is mistaken. There was no such society formed in Massachusetts.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I repeat, sir, that I have never heard the fact denied before. It has been gloried in by the Representatives from Massachusetts heretofore. I recollect that the Senator from Massachusetts avowed it, and exulted in it on the floor of the Senate. I allude to Mr. SUMNER, in that celebrated speech of his, which gentlemen on the other side of the House will remember, perhaps, forever.

And let me state here that the candidate of the anti-slavery party for Congress, in the first election, left the Territory immediately after the result was made known, and never returned.

The object of that organization, I repeat, was to defeat the purpose of the law, and to prevent slaveholders from enjoying their property in that Territory. Here is what Judge DOUGLAS says:

"The passage of the Kansas-Nebraska act was strenuously resisted by all persons who thought it a less evil to deprive the people of new States and Territories of the right of State equality and self-government than to allow them to decide the slavery question for themselves, as every State of the Union had done, and must retain the undeniable right to do, so long as the Constitution of the United States shall be maintained as the supreme law of the land. Finding opposition to the principles of the act unavailing in the Halls of Congress, and under the forms of the Constitution, combinations were immediately entered into in some portions of the Union to control the political destinies, and form and regulate the domestic institutions of those Territories and future States, through the machinery of emigrant aid societies."

Here, I have quoted the language of your great leader, in his war upon Kansas and the South, in regard to these emigrant aid societies—

Mr. DAWES. If the gentleman will permit me, I will in a moment set him right in this matter.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I only have an hour, and the gentleman will see that I have no time to spare. Judge DOUGLAS continues:

"In order to give consistency and efficiency to the movement, and surround it with the color of legal authority, an act of incorporation was procured from the Legislature of the State of Massachusetts, when a powerful corporation, with a capital of $3,000,000, invested in houses and lands, in merchandise and mills, in cannon and rifles, in powder and lead, in all the implements of art, agriculture, and war, and employing a corresponding number of men, all under the management and control of non-resident directors and stockholders, who are authorized by their charter to vote by proxy to the extent of fifty votes each, enters a distant and sparsely-settled Territory, with the fixed purpose of wielding all its power to control the domestic institutions and political destinies of the Territory, it becomes a question of fearful import how far the operations of the company are compatible with the rights and liberties of the people. Whatever may be the extent or limit of congressional authority over the Territories, it is clear that no individual State has the right to pass any law, or authorize any act, concerning or affecting the Territories which it might not enact in reference to any other State. It is a well-settled principle of constitutional law in this country, that, while all the States of the Union are united in one, for certain purposes, yet each State, in respect to everything which affects its domestic policy and internal concern, stands in the relation of a foreign power to every other State. Hence, no State has a right to pass any law, or do or authorize any act, with a view to influence or change the domestic policy of any other State or Territory of the Union, more than it would with reference to France or England, or any other foreign State with which we are at peace. Indeed, every State of this Union is under higher obligations to observe a friendly forbearance and generous comity towards each other member of the Confederacy, than the laws of nations can impose on foreign States."

I have thus established the fact of the organization of this society by the testimony of Judge DOUGLAS, who was eloquent in denunciation of its objects.

The fact that there was such an organization in existence, I repeat, has never been denied before, to my knowledge.

Mr. DAWES. I do not deny that.

Mr. BARKSDALE. There may have been frauds in that election. I do not pretend to know how the facts are. If there were frauds on one side, there were frauds, doubtless, on the other; and if Missourians invaded that Territory, it was for the purpose of counteracting that which had been improperly and illegally done by the Emigrant Aid Society of Massachusetts.

But, sir, how was it? Members of that Legislature were commissioned by Governor Reeder himself. He issued their commissions and he did not object to that Legislature upon the ground of its illegality, until after it removed the place of its meeting. The Territorial Legislature of 1855 passed an act, submitting the question to the people, whether they desired a convention to be called to organize a State government or not. That question was submitted to the people. Every man in that Territory had the right to vote; the United States troops were there to protect them in that right, if they did not have the courage to protect themselves. If the anti-slavery party of the Territory were opposed to organizing a State government, why did they not say so? They refused to obey the law; to exercise the privilege which had been guaranteed to them under it; a large majority, almost a unanimous vote, was given in favor of calling a convention of the people to organize a State government. Armed with Sharpe's rifles, with cannon and ball, and all the implements and munitions of war, the object of those who were sent into the Territory of Kansas by these emigrant aid societies, was to set at defiance the authority of the Federal Government and the Territorial Legislature, and headed by such miscreants and demagogues as Lane and Robinson, they have been but too successful in accomplishing it.

They not only refused to obey the law, but property was rendered insecure, and human life itself was put in constant peril. The country was ever and anon shocked with accounts of murders and assassinations committed by the abandoned outcasts who were gathered from the dens and purlieus of northern cities, and transported into that Territory by these emigrant aid societies. Arson, robbery, and murder, and every crime known to the black catalogue of crimes, were committed by these outlaws and traitors. Yet we are told that, because they did not vote, this constitution is not the will of the people of Kansas. Sir, are we to be influenced by conduct like this? The true people of Kansas, those who had fixed their homes and cast their destiny in that Territory, and whose interests were identified with it, decided, under the forms of law, that a convention should be held; the succeeding Legislature passed an act requiring all the voters of the Territory to be registered preparatory to the election; officers were regularly appointed to register the names. But these men refused to obey the law, or avail themselves of the rights which had been so carefully secured to them. Law-abiding citizens of the Territory, however, did observe the law, to the number of more than nine thousand.

After this opportunity had been given to every man in the Territory to register his name, an election was held for delegates to this convention—the apportionment having been made by Mr. Secretary Stanton himself. Here, again, was another opportunity afforded to the free-State men of that Territory to have secured a majority in that convention, and thus to have made a free-State constitution, or a constitution prohibiting slavery, if they desired to do so. They did not vote; or, if they did vote, they were in a minority, and hence a large majority of pro-slavery delegates were elected to that convention.

In due course of time—the time specified by law—the convention met, having been elected by the people at the ballot-box, every man in the Territory having had an opportunity of participating in the election of those delegates. The validity of this convention was recognized by the President in his instructions to Governor Walker, and by Judge DOUGLAS himself in a speech delivered by him at Springfield, Illinois, in which he declares that:

"Kansas is about to speak for herself, through her delegates assembled in convention to form a constitution preparatory to her admission into the Union on an equal footing with the original States. Peace and prosperity now prevail throughout her borders. The law under which her delegates are about to be elected is believed to be just and fair in all its objects and provisions. There is every reason to hope and believe that the law will be fairly interpreted and impartially executed, so as to insure to every bona fide inhabitant the free and quiet exercise of his elective franchise. If any portion of the inhabitants, acting under the advice of the political leaders in a distant State, shall choose to absent themselves from the polls, and withhold their votes, with a view of leaving the free-State Democrats in a minority, and thus securing a pro-slavery constitution, in opposition to the wishes of a majority of the people living under it, let the responsibility rest upon those who, for partisan purposes, will sacrifice the principles they profess to cherish and promote. Upon them, and upon the political party for whose benefit and under the direction of whose leaders they act, let the blame be visited of fastening upon the people of a new State, institutions repugnant to their feelings, and in violation of their wishes. The organic act secures to the people of Kansas the sole and exclusive right of forming and regulating their domestic institutions to suit themselves, subject to no other limitations than that which the Constitution of the United States imposes. The Democratic party is determined to see the great fundamental principle of the organic act carried out in good faith. The present election law in Kansas is acknowledged to be fair and just. The rights of the voters are clearly defined, and the exercise of these rights will be efficiently and scrupulously protected. Hence, if the majority of the people of Kansas desire to have it a free State, (and we are told by the Republican party that nine tenths of the people of that Territory are free-State men,) there is no obstacle in the way of bringing Kansas into the Union as a free State by the votes and voice of her own people, and in conformity to the great principles of the Kansas-Nebraska act—provided all the free-State men will go to the polls and vote their principles in accordance with their professions. If such is not the result, let the consequences be visited upon the heads of those whose policy it is to produce strife, anarchy, and bloodshed in Kansas, that their party may profit by slavery agitation in the northern States of this Union."

Governor Walker and Mr. Stanton, who are now reaping the rewards of their treachery to the South, in the adulation of their Abolition friends at the North, both repeatedly acknowledged the validity of this convention. In his inaugural address, Governor Walker says:

"The people of Kansas, then, are invited by the highest authority known to the Constitution, to participate freely and fairly in the election of delegates to frame a constitution and State government. The law has performed its entire appropriate function when it extends to the people the right of suffrage, but it cannot compel the performance of that duty. Throughout our whole Union, however, and wherever free government prevails, those who abstain from the exercise of the right of suffrage, authorize those who do vote to act for them in that contingency, and the absentees are as much bound, under the law and constitution, where there is no fraud or violence, by the act of the majority of those who do vote, as if all had participated in the election. Otherwise, as voting must be voluntary, self-government would be impracticable, and monarchy or despotism would remain as the only alternative."

He not only admits the validity of the convention, but declares that those who refuse to exercise the right of suffrage are as much bound by the act of the majority of those who do vote, as if they had participated. But, sir, it is proper for me to say that I attach no importance whatever to any position that may be assumed, or any declaration that may have been made by Robert J. Walker.

When his appointment was first made, many of the friends of the Administration in the South, while they did not question the purity of the President's motives in making it, believed that he would betray his trust, throw the influence of his position against the South, and thus court the favor of those who are warring upon her institutions.

His subsequent conduct shows that these apprehensions were well founded; for he had scarcely reached the Territory before he commenced to interfere in its affairs, and to dictate to the people the manner in which their constitution should be formed. And, having been rebuked by the President, and forced to resign his office by the just indignation of those whom he had betrayed, he is now leagued with the Black Republicans to defeat the passage of this bill, and to rekindle the fires of civil war in that Territory.

As I said, the convention met and proceeded to form a constitution for the people of Kansas. That constitution recognizes slavery, and throws around it protecting sanction. But it is said, in reference to this constitution, that there ought to have been an enabling act, and that the Territorial Legislature had no right to call this convention.

Now, sir, let us look into that matter. When, sir, did the author of the Kansas-Nebraska bill, and the leader of the forces in opposition to the admission of Kansas, become a convert to the doctrine that it is necessary that there should be an enabling act in order to the admission of a new State into the Union? Why, sir, if it is necessary to have an enabling act, the Kansas-Nebraska bill is itself an enabling act. Now let me read the language of that bill.

The sixth section declares that the legislative power of the Territory shall extend to all rightful subjects of legislation consistent with the Constitution of the United States and the provisions of this act. That calling a convention to form a constitution, when, by a vote of the people, it had been authorized, and their interest demanded it, was a rightful subject of legislation, it seems to me, cannot be questioned; and hence, by the organic act, the amplest power was conferred on the Legislature to call the convention; and, by the fourteenth section, the people are left perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way, subject only to the Constitution of the United States.

Here, sir, was the enabling act, if one was necessary. But Kansas is a portion of the territory which we acquired from France; it is a part of the Louisiana Territory; and, by the treaty under which we acquired it, Kansas has a right to be admitted into the Union.

By the third article of the convention with France, the inhabitants of the ceded Territory were to be incorporated into the Union of the United States, and admitted as soon as possible, according to the principles of the Federal Constitution to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages, and immunities, of citizens of the United States.

Then, sir, two enabling acts have been passed already for the people of Kansas to form a State constitution; and, acting under this authority, the people of Kansas, through their Territorial Legislature, called a convention to organize a State government.

But, sir, was it necessary that an enabling act should be passed at all? What has been the practice of the Government? Why, sir, seven out of eighteen States, which have been admitted into the Union since the foundation of the Government, came in without enabling acts: Vermont, Maine, Arkansas, Iowa, Tennessee, Michigan, Florida, and California. In the case of Tennessee, a convention was called, a constitution framed, and an application was made to Congress for the admission of that State, without any enabling act, or without any authority from Congress. And it is a fact worthy of note that General Jackson himself was a member of that convention, and that General Washington urged upon Congress the importance of admitting Tennessee into the Union without delay.

What were the facts in relation to California? Acting under the authority of a military commander, an election was held, and delegates chosen to a convention to form a State constitution, when no census had been taken, when no registry of votes had been made. The inhabitants of the Territory at the time, whether Mexicans, Chilians, Frenchmen, or Dutchmen, were allowed to march up to the polls, and usurp the political sovereignty of that vast Territory. Thus it was that California, with its one thousand miles of sea-coast, its one hundred and fifty thousand square miles of territory, its boundless resources, and vast treasures, was forbidden to the South, and appropriated for the purposes of free-soil.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. I would say that Florida was admitted under a constitution adopted by the people, who were not in the State when it was admitted, but nine years prior to its admission, and against the protest of the Territory at the time when it was admitted.

Mr. BARKSDALE. That is true, I believe. Why, sir, it has not been the practice of the Government to require an enabling act, nor was an enabling act necessary in the case of Kansas.

But it is said, sir, that this constitution should have been submitted to the vote of the people, and that it is not their act because it was not so submitted. Sir, I would ask, have constitutions been formed in this way alone, by the people of this country in organizing States? A portion of the States have submitted their constitutions to the people after they were framed; but in eighteen States of the Union the constitutions were not submitted. And why? Because here the people do not act en masse. They act through delegates elected by themselves. Ours is a representative Government. The convention of Kansas embodied the sovereignty of the people, carried out the will of the people, spoke the voice of the people, and was, in fact, the people. The Constitution of the United States was never submitted to a vote of the people. The delegates to the convention that framed that Constitution were not even elected by the people. They were appointed by the Legislatures of the States. And after they had finished their great work, it was indorsed and ratified, not by the people at the ballot-box, but by conventions of the States, acting for them in their sovereign capacity. Vermont, Tennessee, Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama, Arkansas, Kentucky, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, and Wisconsin, were admitted into the Union with constitutions that were not submitted to the people. Kentucky presented herself for admission before her constitution was formed or her convention had met; and hence was admitted into the Union without any constitution.

But, sir, while this constitution was not submitted as a whole to the people of Kansas, the only question in dispute—that of slavery—was submitted. It was submitted to a vote of all the people of Kansas. It was submitted, too, in such a way as to secure a fair vote on that article of the constitution. Now, sir, what do the gentlemen on the other side of the House care about the school question, or the bank question, or the internal improvement question, in the Territory of Kansas? Has there been any agitation of these questions? I ask my friend from Illinois [Mr. HARRIS] if he is interested in these questions in that Territory? The only question in dispute was the slavery question; and that, I repeat, was submitted to a vote of all the people in that Territory. Now, I believe that that convention acted unwisely in submitting it to a vote of all the inhabitants.

In my judgment, a residence of three or six months should have been required as a qualification for voting; but it was the province of the convention to prescribe the qualifications of voters, and they allowed all to vote who happened to be there on the day of election, claiming to be residents. If an individual arrived in that Territory five minutes before the polls closed, and came up with the sweat and dust of travel upon him, and claimed to be a resident of Kansas, he was allowed to vote on the question whether this slavery article in the constitution should be retained or rejected.

Mr. CURTIS. The constitution says "inhabitants."

Mr. BARKSDALE. All were allowed to vote, as I have already said. And what was the result? More than six thousand votes were given to the constitution with slavery, and but a few hundred against it.

But it is said that the majority of the people of that Territory did not vote. That the right to vote, however, was given them, and every safeguard provided, cannot be and has not been denied. If they desired Kansas to be a free State, and did not so vote, that is their own fault. But it is said that the application of Kansas must be rejected, because a majority of the people are opposed to her admission. Where, I ask, do you ascertain that fact? Do you find it in the election returns of the 4th of January? The question had then been settled. The pro-slavery clause of the constitution had already been ratified by the people. Those who were in favor of its insertion did not vote at the election, because it was a question which had been settled, and which perished with the settlement of it.

Where, then, do you find evidence that the constitution framed at Lecompton is not acceptable to the majority of the people of Kansas? I think I have shown that it is the constitution of the people of Kansas; that they have made it; that it is theirs; and that under it they are applying for admission into the Union.

Now, the next question is, is this constitution republican in form? I hardly suppose there is any dispute with regard to that fact. It is a republican constitution. It is founded on the will of the people. Under its provisions the Governor is elected by the people; the Legislature is elected by the people; even the judiciary are elected by the people. All the officers are so elected. If the constitutions of the other States are republican in form, no objection on this ground can be urged against that of Kansas.

Then, sir, I have endeavored to answer the only questions that Congress ought to ask in the admission of new States; first, that it is the will of the people; and next, that the constitution which they present is republican in form. What, then, is the ground of the opposition to the admission of Kansas? The true ground, sir, disguise it as gentlemen may, is that her constitution recognizes slavery. I see near me the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. COLFAX,] who is one of the leaders of his party in this House, and I desire to ask him now whether, if all the people of Kansas desired to have a pro-slavery constitution, he would vote for her admission into the Union?

Mr. COLFAX. The gentleman from Mississippi asks me a question. I have listened very attentively to his speech, and I desire to say to him that if I get the floor when he concludes, as I hope to, I intend to answer every point he has made in his speech.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I do not know that I will be here. I should like to have the answer now. I ask you, gentlemen on the other side of the House, of the Black Republican party, would you vote for the admission of Kansas into the Union with a constitution tolerating slavery, if a hundred thousand people there wished it?

Mr. GIDDINGS. Does the gentleman ask me?

Mr. BARKSDALE. I ask all of you.

Mr. GIDDINGS. Then I answer the gentleman that I will never associate, politically, with men of that character, if I can help it. I will never vote to compel Ohio to associate with another slave State, if I can prevent it.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I desire to ask the gentleman from Ohio if he speaks for his party?

Mr. GIDDINGS. I speak for the thinking, reflecting, humane portion of mankind generally. [Laughter.]

Mr. BARKSDALE. Black Republican mankind you mean. [Laughter.] I have no doubt of it. I repeat that the true ground of opposition to the admission of Kansas is, that her constitution tolerates slavery, and I now have indubitable evidence of the fact in the declaration of the gentleman from Ohio. Why, sir, gentlemen on the other side of this Hall voted for the admission of Kansas into the Union under the Topeka constitution; a constitution framed not only without authority of law, but in violation of law; a constitution which did not embody the will of the people; a constitution which, notwithstanding their professed philanthropy and devotion to the negro, as I am told by a friend near me, [Mr. KEITT,] prohibits the immigration of free negroes.

Mr. BINGHAM. If the gentleman will allow me for a moment, I wish to say that the statement which I have heard made before, that the Topeka constitution excluded free negroes from Kansas, is an entire mistake. It excludes nobody from that Territory. On the contrary, so far from excluding free negroes, it provides that no person shall be transported from the State, not even for crime.

Mr. BARKSDALE. Was that constitution ever submitted to the people, and voted on by them?

Mr. BINGHAM. It was submitted, and I believe voted on, though the vote was not a large one.

Mr. BARKSDALE. Was it ratified?

Mr. BINGHAM. Yes, sir.

Mr. BARKSDALE. The gentleman is mistaken; it had not been submitted before it was sent here. While the gentleman from Ohio is on the stand, I desire to ask him if he would vote to admit Kansas into the Union with a pro-slavery constitution if the people of that Territory all desired it?

Mr. BINGHAM. Certainly not.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I repeat, then, sir, that the opposition to the admission of Kansas into the Union is based upon the ground that her constitution tolerates slavery.

Mr. STANTON. I will say, if the gentleman will allow me, that the Republican members of this House, so far as I know, will never vote for the admission of any slave State north of 36° 30'.

Mr. KEITT. Will you south of 36° 30'?

Mr. STANTON. A good many of them will. Mr. BARKSDALE. The gentleman speaks for himself, I suppose, when he makes that declaration. He certainly did not speak for his colleague over the way, [Mr. GIDDINGS.] Then, sir, that question involves the rights, the equality, and honor of the southern States of this Confederacy. Upon the floor of the Senate it has already been avowed by the Senator from New York, [Mr. SEWARD,] that no more slave States shall be admitted into the Union. I will read the language of the Senator:

"Free labor has at last apprehended its rights, its interests, its power, and destiny, and is organizing itself to assume the government of the Republic. It will henceforth meet you boldly and resolutely here; it will meet you everywhere, in the Territories or out of them, wherever you may go to extend slavery. It has driven you back in California and in Kansas; it will invade you soon in Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, Missouri, and Texas. It will meet you in Arizona, in Central America, and even in Cuba. The invasion will be not merely harmless, but beneficent, if you yield seasonably to its just and moderate demands. It proved so in New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and the other slave States, which have already yielded in that way to its advances. You may, indeed, get a start under or near the tropics, and seem safe for a time, but it will only be a short time. Even there you will find States only for free labor to maintain and occupy. The interest of the white races demands the ultimate emancipation of all men. Whether that consummation shall be allowed to take effect, with needful and wise precautions against sudden change and disaster, or be hurried on by violence, is all that remains for you to decide. For the failure of your system of slave labor throughout the Republic, the responsibility will rest not on the agitators you condemn, or on the political parties you arraign, or even altogether yourselves, but it will be due to the inherent error of the system itself, and to the error which thrusts it forward to oppose and resist the destiny, not more of the African than that of the white races. The white man needs this continent to labor upon. His head is clear, his arm is strong, and his necessities are fixed. He must and will have it. To secure it, he will oblige the Government of the United States to abandon intervention in favor of slave labor and slave States, and go backward forty years, and resume the original policy of intervention in favor of free labor and free States."

This, sir, is not only a declaration that no more slave States shall be admitted into the Union, but that slavery must yield even in the fifteen slave States where it exists. He must have the whole continent. That is his declaration.

And, sir, with this formal and well-considered proclamation by the leader of the Black Republican party in the Senate, reiterated by chiefs and subalterns of the same party here on this floor, can there be any misapprehension as to the purposes and the inevitable end to be accomplished by this opposition to the admission of Kansas?

Mr. Chairman, it is time the North and South understood each other. If this is the position of the North, we of the South desire to know it. If no more slave States are to be admitted into the Union, our people should be informed of your determination. In the language of one of the noble statesmen of the South, [Mr. TOOMBS,] delivered in the Senate a day or two ago, I, too, have counted the cost of this Union; and I think I understand something of its value. Sir, this Union was made by slaveholders. The battles of the Revolution were fought by slaveholders. A slaveholder headed your armies, and led them on to victory. Slaveholders laid deep and broad the foundations of this great Republic. The Declaration of Independence was published to the world in behalf of thirteen colonies—all of them slaveholding. The Union which they afterwards formed—"the more perfect Union"—was a Union of equality, of equal rights, and of equal privileges. If you intend to deprive the southern States of their rights, it is well for us that you have so frankly and unreservedly avowed your purpose. In every period of our history, when dangers impended over us, the South has been true and loyal to the Union. When, sir, in the hour of danger, has she ever faltered? The bones of her sons are bleaching upon the very soil from which her people are excluded, and the achievements of her heroes adorn the brightest pages of your history. But, sir, that same patriotic devotion which inspired them to bare their breasts, and shed their blood for our Union when it was a glorious Union of equals, will arouse their hearts and nerve their arms to resist its aggressions upon their rights and honor.

ADMISSION OF KANSAS.

SPEECH OF HON. SYDENHAM MOORE, OF ALABAMA,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
March 25, 1858.

[REVISED BY HIMSELF.*]

The House being in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. MOORE said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: The message of the President, the reports of the committees of the two Houses, and the many able speeches which have been already made in favor of the admission of Kansas, have fully exhausted the subject, and swept away all the flimsy pretenses and excuses of those who oppose that measure.

Some have the candor to admit, what all know to be true, that if her constitution did not tolerate domestic slavery, no serious opposition would have been made to her admission. Those who advocated the adoption of the Topeka constitution, as the Black Republicans all did, cannot, without the grossest hypocrisy, pretend to have serious scruples on account of any irregularities in this of Lecompton. I should not, at this late period, have engaged in the discussion of this question, important as I regard its decision, but for the allusions which have been repeatedly made to Alabama, and more especially in the speech of the honorable gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. FARNSWORTH,] the other day, who, not satisfied with indulging in the tirade against the institution of slavery, which has been heard from day to day from that side of the Chamber, saw fit to single out Alabama, and, with a view to disparage her people, instituted a comparison between that State and his own.

First, he says, Alabama has not increased as rapidly as Illinois in population. Is not that easily explained? The census returns show that Illinois had, in 1850, of her then population, 111,860 foreigners, while Alabama had but 7,498. The former being in close proximity to the old and densely-populated States of the North, would also account in part for this.

Next, as to the number of children at school; he says, in Alabama there are 62,846 pupils and students at school; while in Illinois there were, at the same time, 182,292. Out of about 190,000 white persons between five and twenty years of age, Alabama had, in fact, 100,000 at school; while in Illinois there were 350,000 white persons between five and twenty, and of these only 140,000 at school. But the gentleman, very adroitly, dropped the comparison between Alabama and Illinois when he came to speak of the number of persons over twenty-one years who could not read or write, and then contrasts Alabama with Massachusetts. I prefer to continue the comparison which he commenced with Illinois. In 1850, there were in Alabama 33,757 persons over twenty-one who could not read or write, while in Illinois there were 40,000. In Illinois there were 978,855 acres of public land appropriated for educational purposes, while in Alabama there were 902,775; and the lands of Illinois, it is well known, were far richer. Alabama had, in 1850, 1,375 churches, while Illinois had but 1,223.

The gentleman from Illinois sneeringly comments upon these results of the census as to the education of the masses in Alabama, and asserts that there are multitudes in all the slaveholding States who "cannot even read their ballots, nor sign their names to a poll-book." Does he not know that a large portion of the population of many of the States, at the period of our Revolution, were unlettered men? And yet what nobler examples of heroism and intelligent appreciation of popular rights has history anywhere afforded us? Was Rome much indebted to the literary cultivation of her masses for the sturdy virtues and practical wisdom which secured to her, for so many ages, the conquest and government of the world? Did not some, even, of the feudal barons who wrested the great charter from King John make their marks, being unable to append their signatures?

Admission of Kansas—Mr. Moore.

HO. OF REPS.

The gentleman ventures these sneers against the hardy yeomanry of the South, with whom it is at other times the favorite policy of his party to claim an affiliation against what they call the slaveholding aristocracy of the South. The scorn with which the masses of the South have ever rejected these insidious appeals is a sufficient proof of the intelligent and unselfish patriotism of those free and independent citizens. Though they may have been denied the advantages of early education, by living in a new and sparsely-settled country, this comparative want of education and of book-learning is less to be regretted if they have thereby escaped the follies of free-love associations, of spiritualism, and the thousand infidelities which prevail in New England. Remote from crowded cities, engaged in agricultural pursuits, compelled, in their solitude, to study the great book of nature, gathering information at church, in the jury-box, at the political hustings, and in the practical business of life, their store of knowledge is not always scant; but this, above all, they have not been contaminated even by the suspicion of corruption, and always make the best, the bravest soldiers in the world.

The gentleman who has just taken his seat [Mr. THAYER] taunts us with the want of that commerce and manufacturing industry which we have so long assisted the North in establishing. It is also another illustration of our freedom in the past from sectional jealousies, as it is also of our fond illusion that we had yet a part in David, and an inheritance in the son of Jesse.

And why, let me ask, should there be perpetual strife between us? Why should this relentless war be waged against the South? Does not the chief product of our slave labor keep in motion the spindles of Massachusetts, and create there an increased demand for your labor? We offer you a market for your manufactured goods, employment for your ships, and encouragement to your ship-builders. Every additional plow which is driven into the soil of Alabama, and each cargo that is landed at Mobile, gives an increased impetus to your various manufactures.

The time was, Mr. Chairman, and at no remote period in our history, when the Representatives of the people, from the various sections of this Union, were wont to meet together to consult, to deliberate for the welfare of a common country. Party feeling might, at times, run high; differences might arise as to questions of domestic or foreign policy, or as to the true construction of the Constitution; but in these things all were agreed—namely, in recognizing the binding obligations of the Constitution in all its parts, in attachment for the Union, and in reverence for the decisions of our judicial tribunals. What a change has taken place in a few years! Now, sons of one common and glorious lineage are here seen pitted like gladiators, or ranged apart as delegates of hostile nations. But little has been heard during the four months of the session save violent philippics, day after day, against the South, her people, and her institutions, and occasionally recrimination and retaliation on the other side. The stormy sessions of the National Assembly of France scarcely indicated more hostile feeling between the different parties than has been manifested here.

If what we see here is a reflex of the state of feeling among the masses of the North, then it requires no prophet to tell that this Union cannot much longer endure. The crusade, so long preached against the South, has, it seems, maddened and estranged the North, and has at last aroused the South to the dangers that menace her. A little while ago the young adventurer from the North would often seek his home in the South, and, when deserving, never failed to meet with friends, with promotion, and advancement. The distinguished gentleman who sits before me [Mr. QUITMAN]—the Chevalier Bayard, “without fear and without reproach,” and whose military and civil services have won for him a national fame—stands a shining example of this; so do the honorable gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CRAIG] and the honorable gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MAYNARD,] and many in distinguished positions all over the South.

Then the southern man and the northern man could kneel at the same altars, and meet around the same communion table; but now the slaveholder is accused in the estimation of these Pharisees who “have stolen the livery of the court of heaven to serve the devil in,” and his presence would pollute their altars. Then kindly intercourse existed, and the mutual interchange of friendly, if not fraternal feeling. In those days, we of the South felt that the Hancocks, the Otises, and the Warrens of the North, belonged alike to us; and that their glory was also a part of our inheritance. Our youths then went to your renowned institutions of learning, without feeling, as they now would have too much cause to do, in some of them, at least, that they were the veriest hot-beds of treason and fanaticism. Then the southern man felt, as he stepped his foot upon the free soil of the North, that he was still within his own land and among his brethren. He wandered over her battle-fields, read the monuments of her heroes, and exulted in their glorious achievements.

Our pulpits, our work-shops, our factories, our legal and medical professions, our school-houses, all were open to, and many were filled by men from the North. They often married and dwelt among us, thus adding new links to the chain that bound the Union together. Some, after being treated with kindness and hospitality, and encouragement and patronage, in their youth, have returned to the North to stir up strife and ill-will between the sections. Prominent among these is a distinguished Senator of New York, who in early life was thus kindly treated and patronized while pursuing the honorable profession of a teacher in a rural district in Georgia. But all kindly recollections of those early days, if any he ever had, have long since been effaced from his memory; and his life has been spent in fomenting sectional strife and ill-will, and in seeking to overturn the institution of slavery, which, he knows, if successful, would result in ruin to the black as well as the white race, and in disruption of the ties that bind together the States of this Union.

I chanced to hear him recently exulting that there was a North side and a South side in that Chamber and in this, a northern party and a southern party, and expressing the hope that he might live to see the day when the footsteps of a slave would not be seen on this continent. Sir, no love of country prompted that exultation; for he knew too well that, wherever tried, emancipation had proved to be a failure; either bringing speedy destruction and ruin upon the land where they had been thus emancipated, resulting in the massacre of both races, regardless of age or sex, or, by their slower, but not less sure decay and ruin in the lapse of time. I never see him, with his bland smile and Oily Gammon manner, that I am not reminded of Milton's description of one of the fallen angels:

“BELLAL, in act more graceful and humane;”
“he seemed
For dignity composed and high exploit:
But all was false and hollow; though his tongue
Dropt manna, and could make the worse appear
The better reason, to perplex and dash
Maturest counsels; for his thoughts were low;
To vice industrious, but to nobler deeds
Timorous and slothful.”

A few—a very few—persons, like the ill-used individual mentioned by the gentleman from Illinois the other day, who was banished from the city of Mobile, abuse the kindness which had been extended to them, and, viper-like, turn upon their benefactors. How well it becomes that gentleman to express such heartfelt sympathy for the slaves of the South, when his State will not even allow a free negro to tread upon her soil! If one should do so, he may be seized and sold into servitude. He sympathizes deeply with the hard lot of our own sleek, well-fed, contented, and happy slaves; but the free black, as, hungry, naked, and friendless, he stands upon the borders of Illinois, looking wistfully upon her well-filled granaries, might exclaim: “I was an hungered, and ye gave me no meat; I was thirsty, and ye gave me no drink; I was a stranger, and ye took me not in; naked, and ye clothed me not; sick and in prison, and ye visited me not!”

What has brought about this great change to which I have before alluded? Upon whom rests the heavy responsibility? Is it upon those who wage this unjust, unholy, sectional war against their own countrymen? or is it upon those who have stood up and defended their section when assailed, opposing argument to argument, meeting taunts and insults with scorn, and threats with defiance?

The Abolition party was for years few in numbers, and altogether contemptible; but wicked and ambitious men united with it, and drew together in one solid mass the odds and ends of all the old parties; proclaiming for their watchword—hostility to the South and its institutions. They seek to array one section against the other; hoping, when that is accomplished, from being superior in numbers, to get the control of the Government, and hold us in complete subjection. To effect their unholy purposes, we are abused and misrepresented. Their orators, their presses, and even their pulpits, are employed in fomenting strife and ill-will, by continual denunciation, ridicule, taunts, and threats towards the South; a fair sample of which we have just heard from the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. THAYER.]

These bad men, to gain their ends, have shown that they do not hesitate to trample under foot the Constitution, and nullify the solemn enactments of Congress made to carry out its express provisions, and wholly indifferent to the consequences which may flow from their rashness. The President of the United States, for daring to oppose their unholy designs, notwithstanding his venerable years, his eminent position, his unsullied public and private character, is traduced and vilified, his motives aspersed, his patriotism questioned, and he openly and falsely charged with resorting to corruption and bribery to influence the legislation of Congress. The Supreme Court, too, of the United States—the highest judicial tribunal known in our country—composed of men distinguished for their learning, their exalted wisdom and virtue, whose luminous decisions have added to the national reputation; whom the people reverence and respect for their firmness, their impartiality, and the unsullied purity of their lives, because they will not perjure themselves and mold their decisions to suit this fanatical party, is to be annihilated, or reformed, as they say; while the individual members, including the venerable Chief Justice, are denounced as vile, corrupt, and debased.

For years we of the South have patiently borne these wrongs and injuries. We have warned the people of the North of the inevitable consequences which must follow these attacks; but, with reckless indifference, they still pursue their course of madness, folly, and wickedness. They are arrogant enough to believe that we will tamely submit, and declare that if we shall resist they will “whip us into submission.” The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] intimated the other day that hemp would be used to crush out this spirit of resistance, if any should be manifested. Great Britain threatened this against the thirteen colonies, all of them, be it remembered, at that time holding slaves; and the gallant Hayne, of South Carolina, was actually hung; but was the proud spirit of the colonies thereby subdued?

Talk about subduing a sovereign State of this Confederacy! of whipping her into submission! What folly! What kind of a Republic would that be, I should like to know, where one portion of it had to hold the other in subjection by force? A Republic it might be in name, but in fact it would be a pure, unmitigated despotism.

Mr. GILMAN begged to interrupt Mr. Moore, by asking how it happened that all the threats of separation have proceeded from the South?

Mr. MOORE. Sir, I deny the correctness of this assertion; and point to the fact of the Hartford convention, assembled during a war waged for the protection of New England citizens, and in the face of an enemy threatening our coasts. It has never been under such circumstances that the South has chosen to vindicate her violated rights. When the defense of your country, the honor and glory of your empire, were involved, you have nowhere found more obedient and more emulously patriotic citizens. Do you ask me for instances of northern insubordination? Look to the nullification of the laws of Congress by Massachusetts and her surrounding States. When

South Carolina threatened to resort to this remedy, she was to be dragged into submission; when the boasted land of Pilgrims exerts it, it is perfectly consistent with law, order, and constitutional obligations.

It is openly proclaimed that they intend, under no circumstances, to vote for another slave State. They would crib and confine us to our present limits, saying to us, "thus far shalt thou go, and no further;" knowing that ruin must thereby, if not speedily, yet sooner or later, overtake our fair land. Growing more insolent of late, they boldly proclaim that they intend to rule and govern the South; and thus allow her people none save a mere nominal participation in the administration and control of public affairs. Some, more daring than the rest, openly declare that their purpose is to destroy the institution of slavery and crush out the South, making her a dependent province; her sons "hewers of wood and drawers of water" for northern task-masters. And this is to be the doom, if their designs are consummated, not only of the slave owners, but of all the freemen of the South.

James Watson Webb, who conducts one of the leading Republican presses at the North, hitherto claiming to be moderate and conservative, in his paper of February 20, says:

"If any State should attempt to secede, she will be whipped into subjection. Should they continue refractory, the United States would be compelled ultimately to hold such refractory States as colonies—just as Spain and other European powers hold their slave colonies—until such time as it might be safe to rely upon their obedience."

And again, listen to his fierce bombast. It is rich. He says:

"If a southern State should attempt to resist, she will be made to submit, and bear herself with deference and respect thereafter to those who are morally and socially her equals, and politically and physically her superiors, and when provoked to demonstrate it, if needs be, her masters."

Such is the language now employed by the Black Republican presses throughout the North—seemingly to verify the old adage, "whom the gods wish to destroy they first make mad."

Contrast this insolent bravado with the wisdom of Edmund Burke:

"Your instructions and your suspending clauses are the things that hold together the great texture of this mysterious whole. These things do not make your Government. Dead instruments, passive tools as they are, it is the spirit of the English Constitution which, infused through the mighty mass, pervades, feeds, unites, invigorates, vivifies every part of the empire, even down to the minutest member. It is the love of the people; it is their attachment to their Government—from the sense of the deep stake they have in such a glorious institution—which gives you your Army and your Navy, and infuses into both that liberal obedience without which your Army would be a base rabble, and your Navy nothing but rotten timber."

That gentleman [Mr. FARNSWORTH] spoke sneeringly of the republic of Alabama. Let me tell him that Alabama has not yet decided upon her course. She has indulged in no threats; but by the unanimous voice of her Legislature has determined, in case Kansas is rejected, to hold a convention to determine what her honor, her safety, and independence may seem to require. She came into the Union as an equal; and her equality she will never surrender.

Mr. PALMER wished to know by what process it was proposed that Alabama should be withdrawn from the Union.

Mr. MOORE. She has decided, sir, in a contingency which involves the loss of her equality and honor, to assemble a convention to decide upon her course. It is not for me to anticipate that decision; but, if she deem it necessary to dissolve a compact, of which it is openly declared that she shall no longer participate in the advantages, I have no fear that she will not have the intelligence and unanimity to devise the means of her long deferred, reluctant, but compelled withdrawal.

But she still cherishes the hope that her constitutional rights may be respected; that Kansas may be admitted, and peace and quiet restored to the country. I know the sentiments of her people, and especially of those who have honored me with a seat on this floor. They are a law-abiding though proud-spirited people, content with the Constitution and Union which were made and handed down to them by their fathers—attachment to that Union having been a cherished principle of political faith throughout the South. What but this caused her people to submit for so many years to a high protective tariff, by which her industry was taxed to enrich the North? What but this caused her to submit to be robbed of her slaves annually to the value of thousands of dollars? What but this induced her to acquiesce in those measures by which the North obtained all of those vast territories which we acquired from Mexico by, to say the least, an equal expenditure of blood and treasure on her part.

I tell these Black Republican leaders, I tell the North, that they may, when it is too late, exclaim, as a celebrated English historian did in reviewing the causes that led to the loss of America to Great Britain: "What demon of folly got possession of our councils? What malignant star shed its influence on our arms? Where were our statesmen?" All we ask is to be left alone; to be permitted to manage our own affairs; to be protected in the enjoyment of equal rights and equal privileges with the people of the other States of this Union, as well in the Territories as in the States. Believing that all the signs around us point to revolution, that the danger of dissolution is imminent, and ardently desiring to preserve it, if it can be done consistently with the honor, self-respect, and independence of the people with whom, for good or ill, my lot is cast, I should have a serious responsibility to discharge to my constituents if I did not warn you of the Black Republican party on this floor; and if my humble voice could penetrate even the furthest extremity of the North, I would warn her people not to be deceived by those bold, bad men, who, to gratify their insatiate ambition, would subvert this Government and deluge this land in blood. The people of the South see the dangers that menace them, and they are ready to meet them as becomes the sons of noble sires.

The sentiment, the conviction of the South, is that its safety consists in its unity. Seeing how fiercely we are assailed; that our property, our equality, and independence are boldly threatened, we have, day by day, forgetful of past differences, been drawn more closely together, until the proud spectacle is now presented to the world of a free, intelligent people, all united as a band of brothers, in the unalterable determination to stand or fall together in defense of their rights. And this I may say, without boasting, that if the madness of fanaticism shall at last compel us, in defense of all we hold most dear, to imitate the example of our great forefathers, when chains and slavery were forged for them, we will so act our part that our future historians will not be ashamed to record our deeds.

By what standard do they judge us? by what examples in our past history, in that of the Anglo-Saxon race, do they conclude that the South will tamely submit to occupy, in this Union, the position of inferiority and degradation to which the Black Republicans would subject her? We are the descendants of that sturdy race of patriots who were willing to expose "their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor," rather than submit to so much as a tax of three pence per pound on tea. But you think, perhaps, that we are degenerated. It did not appear so in the war of 1812. It did not appear so with that little band of Texans, who, in defense of their rights and liberties, bravely dared to meet the powerful armies of Mexico. What though we be few in numbers, we still possess all the elements of strength to sustain ourselves in peace or in war; and profane as well as sacred history teaches us that the race is not always to the swift, nor the battle to the strong.

The North is as much, if not more interested in preserving this Union than are we of the South. Its destiny is in her hands. She now threatens to conquer and subdue us if we dare resist her encroachments. Remember that the same was done by Lord North and his minions towards our forefathers. See what that old Tory, Dr. Johnson, said in an article, "Taxation no Tyranny," written about that time:

"When subordinate committees oppose the decrees of the general Legislature with defiance, thus audacious, and malignity thus acrimonious, nothing remains but to conquer or yield; to allow their independence or reduce them by force." * * * "It seems determined by the Legislature that force shall be tried. I would wish that the rebels may be subdued by terror, rather than by violence; that such a force may be tried as might take away not only the power but the hope of resistance. Their obstinacy may perhaps be mollified by turning the soldiers to free quarters, forbidding any personal cruelty or hurt." * * * "Since the Americans have made it necessary to subdue them, may they be subdued with the least injury possible to their persons and possessions."

You of the North ridicule the idea of a dissolution for any cause. So did then the ministers of England. You presume upon your strength, and our supposed weakness. So did they with the colonies. The tyrants of old England sought to tax them while they had no voice, no representation in Parliament. Our brave forefathers determined to put all to the hazard rather than submit even to the smallest tax thus imposed. The Black Republican party proclaim their determination to rule the South by their overwhelming sectional majorities. We, it is true, might have a nominal participation in the legislation of the country, but would be powerless to protect ourselves, and the heaviest burdens might, and, judging by the past, would be imposed upon us. Would the South submit? Would freemen ever submit to occupy such a position?

We do not believe that the North would submit to this under similar circumstances. We have the declaration of Mr. Fillmore that they would not, and his opinion that they ought not. I have much mistaken the proud spirit of those with whom I dwell, if they shall prove themselves more submissive. Our fathers were loyal to the mother country—so have we ever proved to this Government, discharging all of our constitutional obligations.

The tyrants whom our fathers then opposed, sought to excite insurrection among our slaves—it is so declared in the Declaration of Independence. So do these Black Republicans. See what Dr. Johnson, in the same article from which I have already quoted, said:

"It has been proposed that the slaves should be set free, an act which the lovers of liberty surely cannot but commend. With fire-arms for their defense, utensils for husbandry, and settled in some simple form of government, they may be more grateful and honest than their masters."

Men of the North! remember, that these words were applied to your ancestors, as well as to ours! But again, says the same author:

"We are told that the subjection of America may tend to the diminution of our liberties, an event which none but very perspicacious politicians are able to foresee. If slavery be thus fatally contagious, how comes it that we hear the loudest yelps for liberty among the drivers of negroes?"

Our fathers bore long the oppressions of the mother country. The minions of power fondly dreamed that, as they had submitted so long, they would never resist. So think our enemies now. Says the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. FARNSWORTH,] why do not these braggarts put their threats in execution? It is all threat and gasconade. Sir, we make no threat—it is not our aim to frighten anybody; nor can you frighten or deter us from doing our duty.

In times like these, Mr. Chairman, when sectional feeling is so intensely excited, it is impossible to tell what a day may bring forth. And what does all this portend? Is it, or not, the beginning of revolution? We short-sighted mortals are not permitted to lift the veil and see what the future has in store for us. Could we do so now, it might serve to check those who are rushing headlong upon unseen dangers. If "coming events cast their shadows before"—if effects still follow causes—if history, that tells us how other republics have risen, flourished for a time, and then passed away; how empires, once hoary with age, and mighty in prowess, at last fell—if she teaches any lessons for our guidance in the story of the past, then ought not gentlemen to be warned?

Our fathers met to consult in the first American Congress in 1774. They separated with no movement made for independence. Again they met, consulted, and went to their several homes, and still no serious talk of independence. Blood had then been shed, too, at Concord, Lexington, and Bunker Hill. They met again in 1776, deliberated, and at last determined on that memorable Declaration of Independence. The Abolitionists and Black Republicans repeat in our ears every day one passage contained in that instrument, and affect to believe that it was intended to include the slaves as well as whites, and therefore sustains their nefarious purposes. I beg to call their attention to another passage, which has not, perhaps, wholly lost its significance:

"That whenever any form of government becomes destructive of these ends (for which it was created) it is the right of the people to alter or to abolish it, and to institute a new government, laying its foundation on such principles and organizing it in such form as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness."

Our forefathers were not unsustained in the trying times of the Revolution. They had friends in England who boldly and eloquently defended their cause, and warned the British ministers of the consequences of their rashness. Among them were Lord Chatham, Burke, Fox, Pownall, and Colonel Barré.

Said the latter gentleman, on the floor of Parliament:

"I prophesied, on passing the stamp act, in 1765, what would happen thereon; and I now, in March, 1769, fear I can prophesy further troubles; that if the whole people were madly desperate, finding no remedy from Parliament, the whole continent will be in arms immediately, and perhaps these provinces lost to England forever."

In February, 1769, said Governor Pownall, in Parliament:

"The Americans do universally, unitedly, and unalterably declare, as I have before told the House, that they ought not to submit. The slightest circumstance will now, in a moment, throw everything into confusion and bloodshed. That spirit which led their ancestors to break off everything which is near and dear to the human heart, has but a slight sacrifice to make at this time; they have not to quit their native country, but to defend it; not to forsake their friends and relations, but to unite with and stand by them in one common union. They will abominate as sincerely as they now love you. In one word, if this spirit of fanaticism should once arise upon the idea of persecuting these people, you will not, for the future, be able to govern with a rod of iron.

"If it be not the humor of the House to believe this at present, I only beg that they will remember that it has been said, and that they were forewarned of it."

How applicable to our own times!

Lord Chatham said:

"When the resolution was taken in this House to tax America, I was ill in bed; if I could have endured to have been carried in my bed, so great was the agitation of my mind for the consequences, I would have solicited some kind hand to have laid me down on this floor, to have borne my testimony against it."

Again spoke Lord Chatham:

"America, if she falls, will fall like the strong man. She would embrace the pillars of the State, and pull down the constitution along with her."

Again, when he spoke those words that made the tyrants tremble:

"America is almost in open rebellion. I rejoice that America has resisted."

But all these warnings were unheeded to the last.

I know not upon what to rest the hope that the North will at last yield to wiser and more moderate counsels. All the old national parties are broken up, save the Democratic party, and that is weakened by desertion and torn by divisions. I do yet fondly hope that this old party will be found strong enough, patriotic and self-sacrificing enough, to meet boldly this question, upon which its fate and the fate of the Union depend, and once more restore peace and quiet to a distracted country. It has received accessions of late from the old Whig and the American parties, and forms a nucleus around which the conservative men of the whole country may still rally. Though deserted by those once recognized as its leaders, a portion of the old guard—the true-hearted northern Democracy—still stands firm. Though their motives may be maligned, their names threatened to be cast out as despised, and public honors denied them, still, unmoved, they go on to the discharge of their duty to their country. I listened with delight to the manly and eloquent speech of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. BISHOP] the other day. While the spirit which he exhibited survives among the northern Democracy, though they may for a time be in the minority, we may yet have hope for the perpetuity of our institutions. All honor to them! They will yet be honored and sustained at home, cherished and respected at the South; while they will ever be cheered with the pleasing consciousness of having, like patriots, discharged their duty boldly, notwithstanding the desertion of the Douglasses, the Walkers, the Forneys, the Bancrofts, and others—once honored leaders. One of these was but yesterday the idol of every southern heart; the hero of many a forensic contest; the example first on the lips to refute the charge that the northern Democracy were not to be trusted. All remember how, like Saladin's, his keen Damascus blade shone so brightly on many a field in defense of the constitutional rights of the South. Admiring friends looked forward to the day when they could elevate him to the Presidency of the nation—an honor which had only been delayed yet a little while, as they deemed, for an older, though not, as they then knew, a better soldier. That he should so suddenly turn his back upon his ancient friends, and join his long embittered foes, is strange, unaccountable, unnatural.

A striking example in our early history is recalled to my mind. It is of one who was among the boldest and bravest in the early days of our Revolution—daring, resolute, and zealous in the cause of liberty. His blood was freely shed for the great cause. The Father of his Country trusted him, leaned upon him; and yet he, at last, from ambition or some secret griefs, proved himself a traitor to his country. Remembering the past as I do, I will not call him, to whom I have referred, by so harsh a name; but from present appearances, from his quick nomination in the West for the Presidency, with the faithless Robert J. Walker on the same ticket for Vice President; from the indications given out by his organ at Chicago, and from his late speech in opposition to the South, in which, to make friends, as it seemed, with the Black Republicans, he joins with them in grossly misrepresenting the positions of our section; it will not surprise me to see, very soon, the mask thrown off, and this unnamed chief fighting in the ranks of his late revilers.

We of the South are represented as desirous of extending slavery to the free territory of the North. This is not so. We claim the right to carry our slaves into territory belonging alike to all the States. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] says he admits this principle, as regards all property save that of slaves. He denies that slavery exists by the common law, but contends that it is by statute law only; and denies that this property should be taken to any of the Territories of the Union.

I tell that gentleman that this is no longer a question for dispute. It is the law of the land, so pronounced by the highest judicial tribunal in our country. It was also decided by twelve of the ablest judges in England, among whom was Lord Holt, "that negroes were merchandise." I refer the gentleman to Burges's Commentaries, vol. 1, page 735; Chalmers's Opinions of Eminent Lawyers, vol. 2, pages 262, 263, 364; and Colquhoun on Roman and Civil Law—not having time to read them now.

We do not ask you to regard slavery as we regard it. It is not suited to your northern clime, but it is suited to ours. We of the South believe that it is recognized and sanctioned by the Almighty in his revealed Word. We think its introduction into our country has been the efficient means of civilizing and Christianizing the African race. We know them to be happy and contented. Agriculture, commerce, and manufactures, have all derived benefits incalculable from this institution. By it the world has been clothed and fed. Think of it as you will, but deny to us none of our constitutional rights; cease to molest us, and we may yet live on in peace. We are content to assume all its responsibilities, both here and hereafter, and are willing to abide the enlightened public opinion of the world. And may we not hope that there is sufficient virtue, intelligence, and patriotism, at the North to correct this unsound public sentiment? or shall treason, folly, and fanaticism, be permitted to rule the day, and this Republic, with all its present greatness, and its glorious promises, be destroyed, merely to gratify the thirst for power of those Black Republican leaders, in whose hearts, as I believe, there lurks treason as dark as ever actuated the blood-bound associates of Catiline's conspiracy. They, too, meditated an insurrection of the slaves in the Roman territories, as one of their means of effecting their unholy purposes. Cicero, after detecting their plot and arresting their persons, boldly asked: if they deserve praise who laid the foundation of the Republic, do not we also who preserved it from its enemies? May not those now (and I allude particularly to those residing in the North) who unite to restore peace to this distracted country, by preventing the triumphs of treason and rebellion in Kansas, and by thwarting the designs of the enemies of the Constitution and the Union, ask in the same spirit if they, too, have not deserved well of their country?

AUXILIARY GUARD.

SPEECH OF HON. W. O. GOODE, OF VIRGINIA, IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, April 19, 1858.

[WRITTEN OUT BY HIMSELF.]*

The House being in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and having under consideration the bill to establish an Auxiliary Guard for the District of Columbia—

Mr. GOODE said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: The few suggestions which I propose to offer will be expressed briefly as I can. I have no essay to publish. If I had the weight of character or power of language to command the attention of the House, I should not indulge in inflammatory declamation. I should employ my strength to impress the House with a just perception of the measure on which we are called to decide.

Several days have passed since this question was opened for discussion. The debate has taken a wide range, and gentlemen have felt themselves called upon to go forth into the wide field of partisan warfare. I shall not follow their example. I shall endeavor to call back attention to the true pending question. It was just announced from the chair. The committee are called upon to pass on the comparative merits of the bill I have proposed, and the substitute for the Senate bill offered by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. DONO.] The general objects and provisions of these plans are nearly identical. They provide for the same force, the same number of officers, and for nearly the same expenditure of money; but the regular expenditure, under my bill, will require a sum smaller, by about $2,500, than the plan of the gentleman from New York—and to that extent I am entitled to the argument of economy, but I admit the advantage is inconsiderable. There are, however, important differences in the two propositions. My bill establishes a police court, by which offenders against the law and police regulations may be summarily tried and punished, which I regard as an actual necessity in the administration of justice in this city. At present, the prosecution of the most petty offenses is by a regular criminal prosecution, requiring an indictment by the grand jury—the minimum expense being about forty dollars, often ranging above one hundred dollars, and requiring from the Treasury an annual appropriation far exceeding one hundred thousand dollars for the prosecution of petty offenses in the District of Columbia. A large proportion of this would be saved by the provision of my bill—a sum, perhaps, equal to the whole cost of the contemplated police force.

But the distinguishing characteristics of the two propositions are to be found in the different modes of appointment. The gentleman from New York proposes to constitute a board of commissioners to organize this police force—the board to be elected by the qualified voters of the city of Washington. Not only to be elected, but chosen in equal numbers from contending political parties. The scheme contemplates the election of two Democrats and two Know Nothings or Americans. Thus will be introduced into the organization antagonistic elements, in equal forces. The nature of the service of a police force demands promptitude, secrecy, and energy. It is indispensable it should be directed by unity of will, and executed with concert of action. The plurality of will and antagonism of purpose or of object, are utterly inconsistent with the efficiency of the police. The discrepancy of views, the conflict of opinions, and consequent delay in the deliberations and decisions of the board must effectually destroy the usefulness of a police appointed under the scheme of the gentleman from New York. There would be no more probability of accord and agreement in the consultations and decisions of such a board, than if those functions were to be performed by the gentleman from New York and myself.

Mr. BURROUGHS. May I ask the gentleman from Virginia a question?

Mr. GOODE. Not many questions.

Mr. BURROUGHS. I desire to ask the gentleman from Virginia if he does not know that the best governed cities and villages in America, to-day, are governed by men chosen in this way from the two parties?

Mr. GOODE. I do not. I should deem it impracticable for such a board to agree on anything; and the whole scheme seems utterly inadmissible. It has been recommended as calculated to free the police from partisan influences. To accomplish this you provide, in the first instance, for a partisan election, which is to be repeated annually. You provide that Democrats and Americans shall vote together, and yet require that equal numbers of each party shall be chosen; and it is requisite that these equal numbers of unfriendly and hostile forces shall act in concert and harmoniously, to produce results at all beneficial. I can hope for nothing good or efficient from this discordant, double-headed monster. It is, verily, a double-headed monster, with no precedent in history, no prototype in nature, no similitude in the regions of fancy—except the triple-headed Cerberus, placed by mythologists as a guard at the gates of hell.

This nondescript board is obnoxious to the further objection of violating the spirit and principles of the Constitution. The power of appointment is undoubtedly executive in its very nature. And this scheme of the gentleman from New York provides for carrying into effect this executive power through the agency of a legislative commission.

With deference I submit that these objections to the plan of the gentleman from New York are unanswerable. They are entirely avoided by my plan, which I shall now proceed to explain.

My bill provides that the chief shall be appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; that the captains and lieutenants shall be appointed by the Secretary of the Interior, and the men by the chief of the auxiliary guard; which I hold to be in strict accordance with the principles of the Constitution. The Constitution provides that "The President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States, whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law. But Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of Departments."

If, then, these be officers of the United States, the Constitution determines the appointing power. But to avoid the force of this argument, gentlemen deny that these are Federal officers; but that proposition cannot be sustained. They are certainly officers. They certainly satisfy the definition of that term. But if officers, they must be Federal officers, because they are created by act of Congress. Their duties are prescribed by act of Congress, and they are paid from the Federal Treasury. It is therefore impossible to resist the conclusion that they are Federal officers, and therefore must be appointed by the Federal Executive—by the President—by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. It is true that Congress may by law provide that such inferior officers as they think proper may be appointed by the President alone, to avoid the necessity of applying for concurrence of the Senate in so vast a number of appointments, and we may provide that the courts may appoint their own officers; and still further to relieve the President, we may provide for the appointment of inferior officers by the heads of the Departments, which is accordingly proposed in my bill. With the exceptions thus enumerated, all Federal appointments must be made by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

The Constitution places all executive power in the President of the United States. The power of appointment is an executive power, and therefore vests in the President. In framing the Constitution, our ancestors adopted the British Constitution as their model. In England the appointing power vests in the executive Government. It is, indeed, a royal prerogative, and to attempt to usurp it, is to impinge on the prerogatives of the Crown. In this country, by the wisdom of our fathers, the appointing power is reposed in the Chief Executive of the Confederacy. Even if this be unwise, it is ordained by the founders of our system. It is not denied that the President must appoint the superior officers of Government, your military and naval commanders, the judges of the Supreme Court and of all the Federal courts; and yet it is held to be dangerous to confide to him the appointment of the chief of the police of Washington city!

Mr. MAYNARD. I want to know whether, under the act of 1850, the commissioners were appointed by the President, or by the courts of the District, in which they were to act?

Mr. GOODE. Did not the gentleman hear me say that Congress had power to provide by law for the appointment of inferior officers by the courts or by the heads of the Departments? It was precisely the proposition which I announced.

Mr. BLISS. I would like to be enlightened on one point, for it is an important one. I understand the gentleman to claim that the officers of this District are Federal officers under the Constitution.

Mr. GOODE. The officers of the corporation are municipal officers; but it is competent for Congress to create other officers in the District, who are not municipal officers, but who are, of necessity, Federal officers.

Mr. BLISS. I ask whether, under the Constitution, any difference was made between any of the local officers of the District, such as Mayor, and policemen, or any other officer?

Mr. GOODE. The office of Mayor, under the charter, is elective by the people. The office of chief of police is proposed to be regulated by this bill. If he could be deemed a municipal officer, he would be appointed by the Mayor, according to the terms of the city charter. If he be a Federal officer, as appears to me to be unquestionable, then, by the terms of the Federal Constitution, the appointment is vested in the Federal Executive. We may, by law, provide for the appointment by the Secretary of the Interior, or the head of any other Department, or in the courts; but if there be no such special provision, the appointment attaches, ex vi termini, in the President of the United States.

Gentlemen insist it is dangerous to invest the President with the alarming power of appointing the head of the police of a petty municipality. Under the genius of the Constitution they can trust him with the supreme power of negotiating treaties with foreign countries; they can confide to him the appointment of the whole diplomatic corps—consuls, ministers, envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary to represent the country at foreign Courts; they can trust him to appoint our Federal judges, the commanders of the Army and Navy of the United States, with the whole roll of their subordinates; they can trust him with the actual command of the Army and Navy of the United States and of the embodied militia of the several States when called into actual service; but they are thrown into a tremor when called to invest him with the dangerous and alarming power of appointing the chief of the police of the city of Washington! Verily, it seems a strong illustration of the proverb, that you "strain at a gnat and swallow a camel."

Sir, when gentlemen denounce this as an alarming usurpation; when they denounce the President of the United States as an unsafe and dangerous repository of the appointing power, I decline, myself, to offer the reply. I refuse to place my own authority, my own humble and unknown name, to be weighed in the balance against those distinguished gentlemen; but I call upon the framers of the Constitution to answer; I call upon James Madison to answer; I call upon Alexander Hamilton to answer; I call upon Gouverneur Morris, upon James Wilson, to answer; I call upon John Rutledge, upon Charles Pinkney, Charles Cotesworth Pinckney and Pierce Butler, to answer; and last, though not least, I call upon Benjamin Franklin and George Washington to answer. These, and all these, and such as these, if, indeed, there could be such, have placed it in the Constitution, have inscribed it upon the enduring records of their country, that they regard the President of the United States as the true and safe and wise and proper repository of the power of appointment. Such are the names which I bring forward to weigh in the balance against the authority of honorable gentlemen.

Sir, I pray the House to examine deliberately and dispassionately the nature of the objections urged against vesting this appointment in the President. It will be found that they rest in a great degree on personal hostility to the incumbent. Most of the Opposition have denounced him as corrupt. True, there are honorable exceptions, and among them I am happy to distinguish the honorable gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MAYNARD.] Sir, I have never professed myself the peculiar champion of James Buchanan; but I was pained to hear him the subject of these unjust and cruel attacks; I was pained to hear the denunciation of a man who has spent a long and honorable and distinguished life in the virtuous exercise of the social faculties, and the faithful discharge of his duty to his country—a man who has been borne by public favor through the regular gradations of public honors till he was eventually installed in the elevated and exalted position which he now adorns. I was pained to see him made the subject of attack and denunciation and vituperation, if not of slander.

Mr. BURROUGHS, again interrupting, was understood to remark, that it was not to the former life and bearing of Mr. Buchanan that exception had been taken, but to his present conduct and character.

Mr. GOODE. Let me say to the member from New York, that any man who brings himself into voluntary comparison with James Buchanan, as a man of virtue, honor, intelligence, distinction, and honorable bearing, will have occasion to deem himself fortunate if he should not suffer severely from the contrast. Sir, I call upon gentlemen to bear in mind it is now openly avowed that the objection to place the power of appointment in James Buchanan is, that he is unworthy the confidence of the country—that he is said to be the head of a rotten and repudiated Administration, to use the elegant and refined language of the member from Massachusetts, [Mr. COMINS.] Before Mr. Buchanan became the standard-bearer of Democracy, he was exempt from these unjust imputations. Since he was elevated to his present position he is made the shining mark for the poisoned arrows of his enemies. I demand it of the House to shield an honorable man and a faithful public functionary from these rude and unhalloved assaults. I ask no member of the House to support a measure which his judgment condemns; but, in arranging this power of appointment, I call upon the House, and especially the Democracy of the House, to shield the President from aspersion and obloquy. Gentlemen can vote for my proposition over that of the gentleman from New York without being committed to its provisions. Such vote will be a mere expression of preference, and not a declaration of approval.

It was argued by a gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MARSHALL,] that by the charter of the city the power of appointment is vested in the Mayor of Washington, and that it will be usurpation to exert it through the President. I confess I was surprised at such an argument from such a source. The charter of the city was designed to enable the people here to manage their own local interests, and regulate their own municipal affairs. It never could have been conceived that by its enactment the Government of the United States surrendered the right and power of self-protection and self-preservation, and the rights and power of eminent domain within the limits of the District. The authority of the corporation is concurrent with that of this Government, and only concurrent as to subjects affecting particular interests of the people here. There is no point in this broad Confederacy in which this Government does not exercise a jurisdiction, either concurrent or exclusive. The several States are sovereign and supreme. They exercise supreme authority on subjects confided to their charge in our scheme of polity. Yet this Government exerts its constitutional authority within the limits of the States, on all subjects intrusted to our charge, according to the provisions of the Constitution. I have seen the illustrious John Marshall dispensing law and justice, executing the powers of a Federal judge in the same room and from the same seat, which but a day or so before were occupied by a venerable chancellor of Virginia. The States are sovereign and supreme. We derive our powers from their grant. We exercise a divided and concurrent jurisdiction with them, within the limits of their several boundaries. The corporation is subordinate and municipal; all its powers are the gift of Congress. Yet it is gravely insisted that, by the creation of this petty municipality, Congress has deprived itself of the right to organize a police here for the purposes of self-protection and self-preservation. Thus, by this argument, are we reduced to dependence on the city for the power to exercise the functions of Government.

Sir, I deny that Congress has the right to deprive itself of the power to protect itself, to protect the Government, and persons and all things dependent on the Government, or connected with it. Government cannot divest itself of the power to accomplish the purposes of its creation. It cannot absolve itself from the obligation to protect itself, the Government, its members and employes, with the citizens of the Confederacy resorting lawfully to their seat of Government. Its obligation to protect the public property and the diplomatic representatives of foreign nations, the power to accomplish these high objects, the power to exert or to exercise the functions of government, the power to accomplish the purposes of its creation, are vested in Government by the Constitution, and imposes a binding obligation, from which Congress cannot be absolved by any act of legislation. If it had been designed by the charter of incorporation for the city of Washington to absolve the Federal Government from the force of its obligation, the act would have been simply nude.

Sir, it has been urged that Congress is under no obligation to support a police here, for the benefit and protection of the citizens of Washington, relieving them from the expense and necessity of providing a police for themselves. This argument must be respected, because it is urged by respectable gentlemen. In itself it is utterly untenable, and will be regarded by many enlightened men as founded on a very narrow and a very small prejudice. Might not the corporation retort that it is under no obligation to provide a police here for the protection of Government, and its numerous members, dependents and interests and connections? Sir, the police is not designed to secure any exclusive or even peculiar advantage to the citizens of Washington. It is intended to enable the Government well and faithfully and securely and conveniently to discharge its duties and redeem its obligations to the country. It is right the corporation should do this within its proper sphere. It is right the Government should accomplish this within its own proper sphere.

There is another view of this subject which must commend itself to every fair and candid mind. It is undeniably true that the lawlessness which prevails here is occasioned, for the most part, by the presence of the Federal Government. Our presence here congregates within the ten miles square the rowdies and ruffians who set society at defiance. I put it to the candor of every gentleman—does he not believe that if the seat of Government were removed, the city would subside into the quiet and repose of a country village? Is it not just we should provide the police, the necessity for which we create?

Mr. Chairman, I maintain it was the purpose of the framers of the Constitution to locate the seat of Government in a position to exercise exclusive jurisdiction, and to invest it with authority adequate to its own protection. It was intended to avoid the ills and avoid the possibility of conflicting jurisdiction.

Gentlemen are familiar with the history of establishing the seat of Government at Washington. At the close of the war of the Revolution, when our arms were triumphant, when the power of Britain was overthrown, and victory had perched upon our banner, the army which achieved this glorious triumph was left in a state of destitution. The time had come when that army was to be disbanded, and the veteran citizen soldier return to his long neglected home. But he was without pay—without a cent of money in his pocket—far away from his home; all tattered and torn—all wearied and worn—he was to be disbanded and turned loose upon the world, without even a settlement of his accounts. He knew not what allowance would be made for him by the country whose enemies he had conquered, and whose liberty he had achieved. Great and extensive discontent prevailed, and there was danger of a general mutiny. Never was the address of General Washington put to severer trial, but he firmly essayed the task, and his efforts were crowned with success. The spirit of patriotism was diffused through the army as an emanation from his soul. Order was restored, the army dispersed, the liberties of America established upon a lasting foundation.

At Lancaster, Pennsylvania, there was a canton of raw recruits, who refused to be appeased, and who refused to submit to be disbanded, on the terms which were rendered indispensable by the actual poverty of Government. And venting their rage, and vowing vengeance, they took up the line of march for Philadelphia, where the Continental Congress was in session. Their approach was known at Philadelphia. Congress called on the corporate authorities to provide the means of resistance and protection. The corporate authorities referred the question to the State authorities, and, pending the delay which intervened, the mutineers had reached the city. The house in which the sessions were held was surrounded by the enraged soldiery. The passways were blockaded with fixed bayonets, and a demand was made on the Council, who assembled in the same house, that the accounts should be settled in twenty minutes; and this message was accompanied with the threat that, unless their demands were satisfied, the soldiers would be turned loose, with arms in their hands, free from all the restraints of law.

By some means, of which I am not distinctly informed, the members effected their escape; and, before they dispersed in confusion, they agreed to reassemble in Princeton; and for some time their future sessions were held there. After this mortifying outrage and flagrant insult, Congress resolved that it was necessary to establish the seat of Government in a locality and under circumstances where they might exert a power and authority adequate to their own protection without dependence on municipal or State protection; and this determination seems very generally to have settled down in the public mind. At an early stage of the proceedings of the Federal convention which framed the Constitution of the United States, a resolution was adopted instructing the committee to insert a clause insuring an adequate authority in the Federal Government for all the purposes of self-protection, which resulted in the clause now found in the Constitution establishing an exclusive jurisdiction within this District.

This clause is the result of the deliberate judgment of the public mind; the deliberate purpose of the country to clothe the Federal Government with power to protect itself, and carry into effect the great purposes of its creation. And when this District was established as the seat of Government, Maryland and Virginia were severally required to surrender the rights of eminent domain, and invest Congress with power of exclusive legislation; and now it is gravely maintained that, by the chartering of the petty municipality of this city, we have created a rival authority here, with power superior to our own; depriving Congress of the indispensable power of self-protection, and reducing the Government of the United States to a condition of dependence on the city of Washington. Sir, I cannot believe that such an argument is of force to convince the mind of the House.

Sir, it seems to be generally agreed that the appointing power should be free from all partisan influences. All profess to desire this. Surely it is desirable; but how shall it be attained? In this free country every citizen is a politician; every public man is a partisan. Can you avoid partisan influences? Sir, to accomplish this desirable object of excluding partisan influences, the gentleman from New York provides, as the first step, to resort to a popular election for the choice of a commission, to consist of four partisan leaders—two to be chosen from each of the political parties of Washington—and this process to be continued from year to year; whilst the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LEITER,] in the eager pursuit of the same object of excluding partisan influences, proposes for our adoption a legislative commission, in which he names as commissioners the two partisan candidates for the mayoralty. The name of a third commissioner is quite providently inserted, whose political connection will insure the decision of every question on the side of the political party of which the honorable gentleman from Ohio is himself a distinguished, ornamental partisan leader. Other gentlemen insist that, notwithstanding the history of the past, the Mayor of the city is the best repository of the power of appointment. To this I reply the argument of a bitter experience. Through the future it will be as it has been through the past. The Mayor to select the officers and men—and they with power to elect the Mayor—remissness and relaxation of discipline will necessarily obtain, and inefficiency and worthlessness will mark the character of the police force. This is, of all the modes suggested, the most objectionable in practice.

And now, sir, I approach the close of the few remarks I proposed to offer. When I rose to explain the provisions of this bill, the House will bear me witness, I came forward coolly and deliberately, without passion or excitement. I made no appeal to party spirit or party prejudice. I confined myself strictly to a simple exposition of the provisions of the bill; and I was content to rely on the intelligence of Congress to give effect to the measure. My brief discourse was a passionless narrative. No sooner had I taken my seat than a member from Massachusetts rose in his place, and launched forth into the boisterous discussion of party politics. With slight allusion to the question of police, he felt it to be his duty to denounce the President of the United States; to arraign and denounce the Cabinet as rotten and unworthy of public confidence; to denounce and threaten the Supreme Court of the United States, and the venerable Chief Justice of this country.

Mr. COMINS. I beg to correct the gentleman from Virginia. In speaking against this bill, I made no allusion to the Supreme Court of the United States, or to the venerable Chief Justice of that court. I said justice was at fault in this city through the inefficiency of the criminal court of this District, more than from the remissness of the police in the discharge of their duties. I in no way assailed Judge Crawford; but I alluded to the inefficiency of his court. Neither did I allude to the Cabinet of the President; but I did allude to his Administration.

Mr. GOODE. I beg pardon; I thought it was he who alluded to the decision in the Dred Scott case. It may have been some one of his companions. I absolve the gentleman quo ad hoc; but only as to the Supreme Court and Chief Justice. By his own admission, he assailed the criminal court of this District; and it appears from his printed speech that he had the indelicacy to assail, by name, the honorable judge who presides in that court. I have no personal acquaintance with Judge Crawford. He has not approached me on this occasion to place me in possession of facts, on which to ground his defense here to-day. But honorable gentlemen of the legal profession—men of undoubted standing, whose good opinion is worthy to be coveted by the best of us frail human beings—men at the head of the Washington bar, distinguished ornaments of an honorable profession, and who stand opposed to Judge Crawford in his political association—have voluntarily come forward to defend him against this unjust and indelicate assault, and to authorize me to speak of him in the presence of the American Congress as an amiable man, an accomplished gentleman, a pure, a just, an able, and an upright judge, enjoying, in an eminent degree, the confidence and affection of the community in which he lives.

Gentlemen have objected particularly to the action of the court in the case of a member of Congress who was tried here for murder during the last Congress. It is painful to introduce into this discussion these delicate and distressing topics. No man could have regretted the occurrence more than did the unfortunate man himself. None more than his intimate friends. But, sir, what would gentlemen demand? The offender submitted himself to the laws of his country. He was subjected to rigorous criminal prosecution, tried and acquitted by a jury of his country, and of course discharged by the court. Would gentlemen require he should be hung by the court in defiance of the finding of the jury? But objections are taken to the opinion of the judge in expounding the law of the case. I understand the judge ruled the law to be, "that if, in a case of mutual combat, the jury believed the circumstances were such as to justify the prisoner in considering that his own life was in imminent peril, or that he was in danger of great bodily harm, at the moment when he struck the fatal blow, the jury would be justified in rendering a verdict of homicide se defendendo." Is the gentleman prepared to object to this ruling? and is he prepared to sustain such objection? I believe this has been adjudged to be law in most of the States of this Confederacy—and long, long years since, was adjudged to be law in Massachusetts.

Exception has been taken to the supposed opinions of Judge Crawford touching the abstract, speculative doctrine of capital punishment; and it has been objected that his opinions are supposed to encourage crime within the range of his jurisdiction. I have no knowledge of his speculative doctrines, and I am not at all authorized to speak in his behalf; but, in discredit of the alleged objection, I have been informed that he has always pronounced judgment of death, when justified by the finding of the jury; and in one case especially, when a pardon was granted by President Fillmore. And, after all, Mr. Chairman, the exception is founded in a ferocious and blood-thirsty spirit, demanding the relentless punishment of death. For myself, sir, I candidly admit I shall be ever willing that the capital code shall be administered in the spirit of humanity and clemency, and that its judgments may be tempered with mercy, as far as public safety will allow. I should far more admire the mild and gentle glories of a Hale than the ferocious notoriety of a Jeffreys.

Sir, some gentlemen have alluded to a painful topic, which I cannot be provoked to discuss. Even the fierce and bitter spirit of party might be expected to relent and to soften when the grave has closed upon its enemy. Let the green grass grow around the grave of one who has passed away from sublunary scenes. Let the sod remain untouched by the polluted tread of malice and revenge. Sir, I refuse to desecrate the sanctuary of the dead. I refuse to disturb the sanctity of the grave. Several gentlemen have fiercely mingled in this bitter war of party politics. I decline to follow their example. If they be content with the exhibition which they have made before the country, few can have occasion of regret.

And now, sir, in conclusion, I call upon the House to rise for once superior to the littleness of party prejudice, and adopt a measure demanded by the necessity of the times. For myself, sir, I have perhaps as little personal interest in the subject as any one member of this body. I am always safe and secure from violence. Secure in the fact that I am rarely abroad under circumstances of exposure. Always secure, and doubly secure in a firm reliance on myself. Doubly and triply secure in

ADMISSION OF KANSAS.

SPEECH OF HON. GEO. E. PUGH, OF OHIO,

IN THE SENATE, April 28, 1858,

[REVISED BY HIMSELF,]*

On the bill reported from the Committee of Conference for the admission of Kansas into the Union as a State.

Mr. PUGH said:

MR. PRESIDENT: I have already stated to the Senate that, in my judgment, the regular method of taking a vote on this question, is to wait until we receive a message from the House of Representatives inclosing the bill itself. Still, I have no objection to voting to concur in the report of the committee of conference; because that will be, as the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BENJAMIN] said on day before yesterday, an expression of my individual opinion. Nor do I mean to say that, if the Senate should take a different course, the bill would not be legally passed; for I suppose we have a right to prescribe our own forms of proceeding, although the regular form hitherto has been to vote on such a report only when the bill is in our possession. But, sir, as I intend, in some form and at some time, to give my support to the proposition submitted by the committee of conference, I shall now assign the reasons for that, in answer to several allegations made by Senators on this floor, and particularly by the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. STUART,] who has just taken his seat.

I shall pass over two considerations in a very few words. My colleague [Mr. WADE] yesterday arraigned the course of Senators from the slaveholding States, and imputed sinister motives to them. I shall engage in no crimination of that sort. If I believed what my colleague said, if those were my opinions and sentiments, instead of standing in the Senate of the United States, to beat the air and indulge in harsh epithets, I would go home to the people of Ohio and tell them to take arms in their hands for the redress of injuries. The fact that gentlemen restrain all their wrath for expression in the Senate, satisfies me there is no great sincerity in their complaints.

So with the Senator from Michigan. If I believed a thousandth part of what he has said here to-day; if I believed that a large majority of the representatives in Congress of the political party to which I have been attached were scoundrels and knaves and tricksters, that they would practice fraud and deceit and outrage; if I believed all that, or any of it, instead of insisting here, like the Senator from Michigan, upon my title to membership in the party, I would walk out of it, and congratulate myself on the loss of such associates.

Mr. STUART. Allow me to say to the Senator that I have said nothing of the kind. I have not said one word about any man in Congress being a scoundrel; nor have I said one word about any test being applied to me. I have never touched that subject, and never mean to do so.

Mr. PUGH. Let us see. The Senator coined a new word for the occasion, not to be found in our dictionaries, or any book on English grammar: he said this was a "scoundrelly" proposition; he said it was a trick; he said Congress was behaving in a trickish manner; he said Congress was practicing a fraud on the question and the people. Sir, there is no word of abuse, there is no harsh adjective or adverb in the English language which the Senator could apply to this proposition, that he did not apply to it. He slaps us in the face, but declares that he does not mean to insult us; he says to thirty or more of us, acting from the best lights of our judgments and our consciences, who have determined to give our votes for this measure, that he imputes nothing personal to us, but that, nevertheless, in his opinion, we propose to behave in a fraudulent and dishonest manner.

So with the subject of tests. When the Senator addressed us in December last, and again on a later occasion, he begged his political friends, as he called them, for conciliation. After listening to him, and doing all we felt authorized to do toward conciliating him and those who act with him, we yet hear, not alone from him, but from others, and throughout the country, one continued tirade against an alleged attempt of the Administration and the majority of the Democratic party in both Houses of Congress to establish a test. I agree with a celebrated gentleman who styled the Democratic party a free-love association. A man can drive himself out from it, but nobody else can drive him out; and I say again, whenever it is my opinion that a majority of the Democratic Senators on this floor give their adhesion to a fraudulent proposition, one which includes villainy and all the acts which base men commit, I give notice that I shall not wait to be expelled from the party: I shall go out of it.

I come now to the proposition. Of course every bill reported by a committee of conference is a compromise. Almost every bill which passes the two Houses of Congress is a compromise. Each of us cannot obtain what he thinks best; we must yield in matters of detail; we must surrender, if necessary, all but the vital principle involved. So the Senate has acted; and so, I imagine, the House of Representatives has acted. In my judgment, the best measure would have been the admission of Kansas into the Union by a bill in the usual form. That would have silenced all controversies. That would have left the people of Kansas to settle their own affairs; to revise or amend their constitution, or make a new one whenever they chose; have left them to their own pleasure, and clothed with the sovereignty of a State. We found that could not be accomplished. It was denied that, when admitted as a State under this constitution, Kansas could proceed to revise or amend it; and it was alleged that, after such an admission, Congress and the President would prevent any amendment. Then we adopted a provision to the effect that Congress and the President never should interfere. The bill passed this body, and went to the House of Representatives. The House, in lieu of our bill, sent us a proposition requiring the constitution of Kansas to be submitted to a direct vote of the people. I have said to the Senator from Michigan to-day, that I never will vote for such a bill, whether in the case of a slaveholding or a non-slaveholding State. I consider it a gross usurpation of power; a breaking down of the barriers which divide the Federal and State governments; ten times more disastrous in its consequences to the peace of the country and to the liberties of the people, than all the civil wars which have raged in Kansas. This was my objection to the House bill—my great objection. I believe it was the objection of those with whom I have heretofore acted on this floor.

The House of Representatives adhered to this proposition. A majority of the House entertained opinions adverse to our opinions. A committee of conference was therefore appointed, and we have now before us the agreement of that committee. What is it? I do not yet understand how the Senator from Michigan means to interpret the bill now proposed. If he understands it as submitting the constitution of Kansas to a vote of the people by act of Congress, I tell him that such is not my interpretation at all. We have not the power to make a constitution for Kansas; we have not the power to alter one which has been made; and how, therefore, can we prescribe after the people have acted, the manner in which their constitution shall be ratified? How can we change the method of its ratification? That is as much the act of the people as the constitution itself; and if Congress should change the method of ratification, it would assume the right to make or unmake the constitution. That, therefore, we cannot do.

But over what question have we ample and complete authority? Over the question of admission. That is our question; it is confided to us by the Constitution of the United States. And, consequently, when it was stated, at an early period of this debate, that Kansas came hither with a petition in her hands, I stated truly the prayer of the petition. Not that we should approve her constitution, or ratify her constitution, or amend her constitution. Such was not the petition. What was it? To be admitted into the Union as a State: that was her petition—nothing else. We can grant the petition, or we can refuse it. We could refuse it without any reference to her constitution. We may refuse it because she has not the requisite population. We may refuse it because the boundaries proposed are improper. We may refuse it because the admission of the Territory as a State would disturb the peaceable relations of the other States. Why, sir, we have on your table a proposed constitution for Utah; and if it were on its face entirely unobjectionable, I would not vote to admit that Territory into the Union as a State. I would vote on that question wholly regardless of what the constitution contains or omits. I would vote against Utah because I do not wish to admit into the Union as a sovereign community those who debase themselves to the level of the brutes. I would reject her without any reference to her constitution. The right of admission, or the power of admission, is reposed in Congress. It is a power not to be abused. It is a power to be used rightly, to be used with due discretion; and therefore, although I claim it as an absolute power reposed in us, I agree that to establish any test of discrimination between the States already in the Union, would be a gross abuse and outrage. At the formation of the Federal Constitution, some of the States were slaveholding and some non-slaveholding States; and I believe that to reject a new State because she is either a slaveholding or non-slaveholding State, would be to abuse the power vested in Congress by the Constitution.

This, however, is not alone my distinction. It is the distinction of the Senator from Michigan himself. I have before me an interesting document—"Speech of Hon. C. E. STUART, of Michigan, on Kansas affairs, delivered in the Senate of the United States, December 23, 1857," from which I propose to read a paragraph:

"The power of Congress to admit States into the Union is the question which, in my judgment, lies at the very foundation of this discussion. The Constitution of the United States, in the third section of the fourth article, provides that 'new States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union.' The only limitations to the exercise of the power are found in the language that follows: 'but no new State shall be formed or erected within the jurisdiction of any other State, nor any State be formed by the junction of two or more States, or parts of States, without the consent of the Legislatures of the States concerned, as well as of the Congress.' It was well said by Mr. Attorney General Butler, in the Arkansas case, that the power of Congress over this question is plenary. From the very nature of the question, it must be. It is subject only to the limitations provided in that article; and whenever a question is presented as to the admission of a State into this Union, it must necessarily be determined by the circumstances which surround and govern that particular case. Why, sir, it is a power which authorizes the admission of foreign States, as well as those carved out of our own dominion; and this single statement will show to the mind of any gentleman, at a glance, that precedents, former laws of Congress, never can, and never ought to be, resorted to for the purpose of determining the power or the propriety in a particular case. I use the term 'propriety' with a purpose. The power to admit a State necessarily carries with it the power to decline to admit; and when I hear gentlemen talking about the necessity, the imperative obligation that rests upon Congress to admit a State under a particular specified set of circumstances, I confess, sir, it is a doctrine that is not in accordance with my views of the Constitution. It may be very proper, for instance, to refuse to admit a State to-day, and it may be quite the reverse one year from to-day. Congress, and Congress alone, under the power conferred upon it by the Constitution, is to determine, not only the question whether a State shall be admitted at all, but it is equally clothed with authority to determine when it shall be admitted."

Here is another paragraph:

"The power of Congress is to 'admit' a State into the Union, not to coerce it. Congress would be but the veriest tyrant that ever existed on the face of the globe if it had a power to coerce a State into the Union contrary to the will of the people comprising that State. It lies, then, at the foundation of the question, as it does at the foundation of personal liberty, that Congress shall be satisfied—satisfied beyond a reasonable dispute—that the people composing the State ask to be admitted. It should never be forgotten that it is a mere consent on our part—nothing more. The State proposes admission and Congress gives its consent."

Not a word about the constitution of the proposed State from the beginning to the end of that. Yet another paragraph from the same speech:

"That we have the power to admit, or refuse to admit, a State, according to our sound discretion, cannot be denied. Having that power, if there be a doubt as to whether you are proposing to admit a State into the Union, or to coerce it into the Union; nothing can be lost by taking time to ask the people in a plain, safe, unmistakable manner, whether they desire it or not. The people of a Territory, which is about to be formed into a State, have a right—and, so far as my examination has gone, Congress has never violated this right—to say, in the first place, whether they desire to form a State Constitution now, or not. They have a right to say whether they will take upon themselves the burdens and expenses of a State government. Where Congress has passed enabling acts, as in the cases of Ohio, Indiana, and other States, and in the celebrated Toombs bill, which has been so much talked of, an express provision was incorporated, that when the convention was assembled, it should vote, in the first instance, whether it is expedient and proper to proceed to form a State constitution at this time. The people of Kansas have never had a chance to say this, and although they might say 'we are willing to live under this Lecompton constitution, when we get ready to be a State; we are not ready to become a State now.' That is a right, a sacred and inviolable right, which belongs to the people of a Territory when they are invited to become a State."

Now, that is my opinion. It was so before the Senator spoke, and he aided to fasten conviction upon my mind. I have already said that we pass no judgment upon the constitution of Kansas except to declare that it is republican in form. Our act is the admission of the State; and we could admit her without any constitution if she had only a form of government in actual operation. What did the Senator affirm to be our duty in the case? He said if there was any dispute as to the desire of the people of Kansas to be admitted into the Union, to be admitted now, it was our duty to refer that question—the question of admission—to a plain, safe, unmistakable manner of decision by the people of Kansas themselves. The committee of conference, therefore, has answered the Senator's own demand when he spoke on the 23d of December last. The question of fact disputed, the only question is, whether the people of Kansas desire to be admitted now. That is the question referred to them by this bill.

In a very able argument delivered by one of my colleagues in the other House, [Mr. GROESBECK,] it was suggested that the people of Kansas might have been desirous, in June last, to come into the Union, but still had a right to change their opinions and vote otherwise. He said that, as they had a right to present us a petition, they had a right to withdraw it at any time before acceptance.

Well, sir, I concur in that. Admission is the act of both parties. They must ask, and we are to grant. And when we were about to grant, the Senator from Michigan said we ought to be sure that the people desired admission now. He expressed it as strongly as I have said. He declared that although the people might say, "we are willing to live under this Lecompton constitution when we get ready to be a State," they had also a right to say, "we are not ready to become a State now." The House bill proceeds on the same idea. It provides that when a new convention shall be assembled in Kansas, the first question decided shall be whether they will come into the Union at that time. Let me read it:

"When so assembled, the convention shall first determine by a vote whether it is the wish of the proposed State to be admitted into the Union at that time; and if so, shall proceed to form a constitution, and take all necessary steps for the establishment of a State government," &c.

I relate this to show that the question of admission has no necessary connection, so far as Congress is concerned, with the constitution of the State, and to show that the Senator from Michigan himself drew the distinction; that he insisted upon it; that it expressed the burden of his objection to the Senate bill.

The constitution of Kansas had been formed when she applied for admission. In the case of an enabling act that specifies the terms of admission before the constitution is made; but, in the present case, the constitution was first made. The constitution was brought to us, and the Senator, by the terms of his argument, acknowledged that the constitution might be perfectly acceptable, and yet the people of Kansas might not desire to be admitted; and, therefore, he insisted, and I agreed with him, that the question of admitting the State was a proper one for Congress, and totally different from the question of referring the constitution to the people for ratification.

Now, I say the bill reported by the committee of conference is a bill to ascertain, in a plain and unmistakable manner, according to the Senator's own demand, whether the people of Kansas desire to come into the Union now. I read from the first part of its first section:

"That the question of admission, with the following propositions in lieu of the ordinance framed at Lecompton, be submitted to a vote of the people of Kansas, and assented to by them, or a majority of the voters, voting at an election to be held for that purpose."

That the question of admission be submitted to the people of Kansas. Again, let me read in reference to the vote upon this question:

"At the said election the voting shall be by ballot, and by indorsing on his ballot, as each voter may please, 'proposition accepted,' or 'proposition rejected.' Should a majority of the votes cast be for 'proposition accepted,' the President of the United States, as soon as the fact is duly made known to him, shall announce the same by proclamation, and thereafter and without any further proceedings on the part of Congress, the admission of the State of Kansas into the Union upon an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever, shall be complete and absolute."

And again:

"But should a majority of the votes cast be for 'proposition rejected,' it shall be deemed and held that the people of Kansas do not desire admission into the Union with said constitution under the conditions set forth in said proposition, and in that event the people of said Territory are hereby authorized and empowered to form for themselves a constitution and State government."

So in reference to the convention to be called hereafter under the conference bill. That convention when assembled, is first to determine by a vote whether it is the wish of the people of Kansas to be admitted into the Union at that time. So in the preamble:

"Whereas, The said constitution and ordinance have been presented to Congress by order of said convention, and admission of said Territory into the Union thereon, as a State, requested; and whereas, said ordinance is not acceptable to Congress, and it is desirable to ascertain whether the people of Kansas concur in the changes in said ordinance hereinafter stated, and desire admission into the Union as a State as herein proposed."

The bill provides no submission of the constitution—no submission of any part of it. We have no power to submit it; but we have the right to pass on the question of admission, and without any reference to the constitution, as the Senator himself has claimed. Inasmuch, therefore, as it is denied, as the Senator has denied, that the people of Kansas desire to be admitted now, we remit that question, and that only, to a vote of the people of Kansas. To be sure, the question of admission thus submitted will necessarily involve, in the mind of every voter, the question whether he approves or disapproves the constitution. Nobody can object to that. I never heard a man in this Congress, who objected to the people of Kansas voting for or against their own constitution, if they wished; but our ground was, that, speaking by their representatives in the Legislature, in the passage of the convention act, and by their delegates in convention, elected by themselves, the people had forborne to vote upon any part of the constitution except the seventh article. We said that was the expressed will of the people through all their representatives in the Legislature, and in the convention, and that we could not alter it; that if these delegates or representatives had not truly expressed the will of the people, it was unfortunate, but that we could apply no remedy, because we had no power. We never objected—certainly, at least, I never did, for a moment—to any claim that the people should have a right to vote for or against their constitution. We denied that Congress had the power to require it. That was our position, and it is so plain that he who runs may read.

Although we cannot, and do not, remit the constitution to a vote of the people, because that would be to violate its own terms, I never heard it denied, that, in voting upon the question of admission, which we had a right to remit, they might, or might not, be governed by the terms of the constitution itself. That is their own question; that is not our question; and, therefore, it is no objection that they can themselves, if they choose, pass upon the whole of their constitution, whilst voting upon a question which we have the power to submit. That is the reason why I declare this bill a fair and honest compromise between the Senate bill and the House bill; preserving what is essential in each, the Senate declaring that Congress has no power to remit the constitution to a direct vote, and the House of Representatives insisting that the people ought to be enabled to vote for, or against it, in some form. By the bill now before us the people can have that advantage, although we do not submit the constitution to them in terms. We give them the right to vote whether they will be admitted or not. I say, then, this proposition, while it avoids a great constitutional objection to the House bill, contains all that is material in it.

Nor is the question relative to the grants of public land more than one element, and that very insignificant, in the question actually submitted. We reject the ordinance passed at Lecompton, November 7, 1857; we might have left the matter thus, and admitted the State, retaining all the public lands, and allowing her, when admitted, to assert her power of taxation over them. I say we might have done that, and we did it in the Senate bill. But here we have proposed, not a bribe of any sort, but the usual grants in the case of every new State—the same which were made to Minnesota—as a mere incident, a collateral element in the question of admission. That, however, as my colleague has said, is no part of the controversy; and so says the Senator from Michigan. Well, if it be no part of the controversy, it will exercise no influence in determining the question. I agree to that. It is wholly immaterial. Wherefore, then, do these Senators declare that it is a bribe? Was it a bribe in the case of Minnesota? Did we not provide in the Minnesota act that if her convention of delegates would vote to come into the Union, she should have these very grants; but if they voted otherwise, she should not have them? Was that a bribe? I imagine no man ever thought so. This certainly cannot be a bribe; for it is much less than the convention at Lecompton asked, and much less than the late convention at Leavenworth asked.

Of course, sir, if the people vote in favor of admission upon the question now submitted, the constitution framed at Lecompton will be the constitution of the State of Kansas. Undoubtedly that will be the case; and why not? It was framed by a convention of delegates of the people, chosen in due form of law, delegates chosen fairly, delegates chosen unanimously; and its seventh article was ratified by an almost unanimous vote of the people—of all who chose to vote. Is that not a sufficient ratification? Why, sir, let us see how circumstances alter cases. On the 9th of April, 1856, the Senator from New York [Mr. SEWARD] urged us to admit this Territory of Kansas as a State under the Topeka constitution; and here is what he said:

"The President objects that the past proceedings by which the new State of Kansas was organized, were irregular in three respects: first, that they were instituted, conducted, and completed, without a previous permission by Congress, or by the local authorities within the Territory. Secondly, that they were instituted, conducted, and completed by a party, and not by the whole people of Kansas; and thirdly, that the new State holds an attitude of defiance and insubordination towards the territorial authorities, and the Federal Union. I reply first, that if the proceedings in question were irregular and partisan-like and factious, the exigencies of the case would at least excuse the faults, and Congress has unlimited discretion to waive them. Secondly, the proceedings were not thus irregular, partisan-like, and factious, because no act of Congress forbade them; no act of the Territorial Legislature forbade them directly or by implication; nor had the Territorial Legislature power either to authorize or to prohibit them. The proceedings were, indeed, instituted by a party who favored them; but they were prosecuted and consummated in the customary forms of popular elections, which were open to all the inhabitants of the Territory qualified to vote by the organic law, and to no others; and they have in no case come into conflict, nor does the new State now act or assume to engage in conflict with either the territorial authorities, or the Government of the Union. Thirdly, there can be no irregularity where there is no law prescribing what shall be regular. Congress has passed no law establishing regulations for the organization or admission of new States. Precedents in such cases, being without foundation in law, are without authority. This is a country whose Government is regulated, not by precedent, but by constitutions."

That applies to every objection urged here, by the Senator from New York and others, to the Lecompton constitution, with this addition: that the election, in which everybody could have participated, was called in due form of law, and had an authority which the Topeka movement never had. Besides, the people of Kansas by voting for admission, will have voted that the Lecompton constitution shall be ratified, not because that is the question submitted, but because it is necessarily involved; and if they ratify the constitution, by what right does the Senator from Michigan protest against it? What more does "popular sovereignty" require? And the whole Free-Soil phalanx are foreclosed forever and a day, as to the objection that Kansas may be a slaveholding State; because they waived that in voting for the House bill. If the constitution be objectionable in any feature, if it require revision or perfection, let the people amend it hereafter. They might vote for admission, knowing that Lecompton would be their constitution, but with the express purpose of altering it. They might say, "Here is an opportunity for us to enter the Union; we do not admire all the features of our constitution, but once enfranchised as a State, we shall have absolute control of our own affairs; and, therefore, we vote in the affirmative." If they choose to do thus, whose business is it to call them to account? They have a right to amend their constitution. I shall not debate that question; a majority of the Senate has said so; a majority of the House of Representatives has said so; the President of the United States has said so. So far at least as the Federal Government is concerned, in both branches of the Legislature, and in the executive department, there can be no obstacle to any amendment which the people of Kansas may desire.

The Senator from Vermont, [Mr. COLLAMER,] said, however, that the Supreme Court of the United States might interfere. I say, as I said before, the Supreme Court of the United States has solemnly determined that it has not power to decide which of two instruments is the constitution of a State, and it has no such power.

Now, sir, when Senators talk about approving or disapproving the Lecompton constitution, they fall into an old blunder. They forget that Kansas has no other constitution. She must have a constitution or form of government. All that is absolutely required is, that she shall have a republican form of government; that is the phrase of the Federal Constitution. That form of government may be expressed in a constitution or an ordinance, or, what they call in Mexico a plan, or it may rest in usage; but to rest in usage, requires, perforce, that it shall have been in actual operation. Such was the case of Rhode Island. Her government was in actual operation; and, although it stood entirely upon usage, yet that was deemed sufficient, and she was admitted into the Union; but Kansas has no State government in operation; we cannot stand on usage in her case; and, therefore, she must present us a constitution, or a fundamental law, or a plan, or something of that sort, containing her form of government. She has presented none to us but the constitution framed at Lecompton. She makes no other application as a State. The people of Kansas ask to be admitted with the distinct understanding that this is their form of government; and, therefore, it is a mere perversion of language—for there can be no mistake in such a distinction—to say that Congress, in admitting the State of Kansas, approves or ratifies the constitution framed at Lecompton, or forces it upon the people of Kansas, in any sense or to any extent. She has no other constitution; she asks admission knowing the fact that she has no other; and, therefore, if you admit her, you admit her with that; and if you reject her, that falls, of course, for there can be no constitution without a State.

But my colleague asks: why not remit the question of the admission of Kansas into the Union, with the understanding that the Topeka constitution may be in force? The answer is, that Topeka is no constitution; it is a mere pretense—illegal, revolutionary—made by the authority of no law at any stage, neither in the election of delegates, nor in the alleged submission to the vote of the people. There is nothing to distinguish the delegate; nothing to distinguish the voter. It is a baseless, unsubstantial vision which can rest nowhere. It is dead, and ought to be buried; only its ghost stalks. There is nobody but my colleague so poor as to do it reverence.

Mr. WADE. The Topeka constitution received the unqualified acceptance of one branch of Congress, and was rejected by the other, in the same way that Lecompton has been admitted by one and rejected by the other.

Mr. PUGH. If the bill for the admission of Kansas should not now pass both Houses, Lecompton will be dead, also.

Mr. WADE. The Senator did not understand me. I did not ask the question, why not accept the Topeka constitution? I merely asked the question why, when both these constitutions had been acted upon and received equal countenance from Congress, and there was a dispute about the validity of them, did not this committee, meeting with full power to make a just conclusion of the whole matter that should be satisfactory to everybody, agree to submit them all, or to lay both aside and do what was right?

Mr. PUGH. I do not wish to misrepresent my colleague. I attach no importance to the fact that Lecompton has been recognized by the one House or the other. I am willing to treat it as a proposition to which neither House has ever agreed. I attach no importance to the fact that one House passed a bill for admission, and the other did not. That does not make a law; nor do I admit that Congress could give any validity to one constitution more than another. My objection to the Topeka constitution is, that it was never formed by the people of Kansas; that there was no law authorizing the election of the delegates who framed it; that there was no law authorizing a convention to be assembled; that there was no law authorizing anybody to vote for or against it; that there was no law to secure the protection of the ballot-box. It is idle to talk of that as a constitution. It is no more a constitution than if my colleague had written it with his own hand, and offered it to Congress—not a whit.

So as to the constitution lately proposed by the convention at Leavenworth. I say that was an illegal proceeding. The bill for calling that convention never passed the Legislature of Kansas. Legislatures must pass bills according to the form prescribed in the organic act; and yet this Legislature, which is said to have been the representative of the friends of peace, sat sixty days, and took good care not to pass the most important bill proposed. The law requires, for the protection of the Legislature, and the protection of the people themselves, to secure deliberation, that every bill which has passed both Houses shall be presented to the Governor for approval or rejection, and that the Governor shall have three days to consider it; to consider before he approves or rejects it, and returns it to the Legislature. Well, sir, they took good care to send the bill to the Governor at so late a period of the session that the Legislature had dissolved, and expired, and was dead by the provisions of the organic act before the expiration of the period during which the Governor could examine it. He is allowed three days by the organic act. I know it is pretended that by counting the day on which the bill was presented to the Governor, three days could be eked out; but it is too late to make any such question. It was settled during the first Administration of this Government, in the most solemn and decisive manner, that the day on which a bill is presented to the President of the United States shall not be counted. The question arose in the case of the first Bank of the United States I have the decision here, and ask the Secretary to relieve me by reading two letters which I send to his desk.

The Secretary read the following letters:

WEDNESDAY NOON, February 23, 1791.

SIR: I have this moment received your sentiments with respect to the constitutionality of the bill to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States.

This bill was presented to me by the joint committee of Congress, at twelve o'clock on Monday, the 14th instant. To what precise period, by legal interpretation of the Constitution, can the President retain it in his possession, before it becomes a law by the lapse of ten days?

GEORGE WASHINGTON.

TO THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

FEBRUARY 23, 1791.

SIR: In answer to your note of this morning, just delivered to me, I give it as my opinion that you have ten days, exclusive of that on which the bill was delivered to you, and Sundays; hence, in the present case, if it is returned on Friday, at any time while Congress are sitting, it will be in time.

It might be a question, if returned after their adjournment on Friday.

I have the honor to be, with perfect respect, sir, your most obedient servant,

A. HAMILTON.

TO THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. PUGH. It appears that the bill to incorporate the Bank of the United States was presented to General Washington on the 14th day of February. It was approved on the 25th day of February, as the statute-book will show, ten days afterward, excluding the day of presentation, and excluding a Sunday which intervened. Is that a precedent of any authority? The first President of the United States, himself the president of the convention which framed the Constitution of the United States; and Mr. Hamilton, then Secretary of the Treasury, and one of the authors of the Constitution; these are the persons who made the decision. Thus, at the earliest period at which the Federal Constitution could receive an interpretation, it was interpreted; for General Washington retained that bill during the full term of eleven days, one of them being a Sunday, exclusive of the day on which it was presented. It is idle to pretend that the bill calling the Leavenworth convention ever passed the Territorial Legislature. It was not a law. There was no authority to prescribe the alleged vote to be given upon the constitution by the people. It is all void—no more respectable than the Topeka movement. I say, then, there is no constitution from Kansas but that framed at Lecompton.

But even if the Leavenworth constitution were legal, it is worse than either of the others. Even if the bill had passed, it was not complied with. It expressly provides that the constitution shall not take effect until it has been ratified by the people. These delegates have not been elected, as the Lecompton delegates were, with authority to form a constitution themselves. They were elected with authority to propose one to the people; and the law requires that it shall be submitted to the people, and be voted on by the people. But, sir, to whom has it been submitted? To the people? Not at all. It is submitted to the negroes of the Territory.

I admit that any State of this Union can authorize negro suffrage. If the constitution of Kansas had been once legally established, and she had become a State, indubitably her people, by an amendment of the constitution, or in any other proper form, might enfranchise the negro, the woman, the alien, or even the idiot. Once admitted, once elevated to the dignity of a sovereign, any State has the right to define its elective franchise; but it cannot make citizens of the United States. That was the distinction recognized in the Dred Scott case.

Mr. WILSON. Will the Senator allow me a word?

Mr. PUGH. Certainly.

Mr. WILSON. The Senator from Ohio is altogether mistaken in regard to this matter. The Leavenworth constitution in this respect, is exactly like the Lecompton constitution, word for word, and comma for comma.

Mr. PUGH. Except the word "white," in the schedule of the Lecompton constitution.

Mr. WILSON. The word "white" is not there. It is a precise and exact copy of the Lecompton constitution in this respect—nothing more, nothing else.

Mr. PUGH. Does the Senator from Massachusetts mean to say that under this new constitution negro suffrage is not to be admitted?

Mr. WILSON. I mean to say that so far as negroes are concerned, the Lecompton and Leavenworth constitutions are, word for word, comma for comma, precisely, exactly alike, Leavenworth being a copy of Lecompton.

Mr. PUGH. I will show that the Senator is incorrect in that, but I propose to show it after a while. Whatever the language of one particular clause, the other clauses of the Lecompton constitution exclude slaves and free negroes—exclude free negroes from the State; but the Leavenworth constitution, as I shall show, makes provision for them to become voters. I wish, however, to dispose of the other question first. I admit that a State once formed and erected into a sovereignty may enfranchise the negro; it is a question to be decided by each State for itself. I am no enemy of the negro. I would not abuse him. I have always voted for what I thought would benefit him. I voted to repeal the black laws of Ohio, and have always been proud of the vote. I would not oppress the negro; but I never intend that he shall be elevated to the rank of citizenship, or enjoy the right of suffrage; and the people of Ohio entertain the same sentiments.

But, sir, when you come to gather citizens of various States into a Territory, and to form a political organization for the first time, the negro finds no place of entrance. I said that was decided in the Dred Scott case; and here is the language:

"The words 'people of the United States' and 'citizens' are synonymous terms, and mean the same thing. They both describe the political body who, according to our republican institutions, form the sovereignty, and who hold the power and conduct the Government through their representatives. They are what we familiarly call the 'sovereign people,' and every citizen is one of this people, and a constituent member of this sovereignty. The question before us is, whether the class of persons described in the plea in abatement compose a portion of this people, and are constituent members of this sovereignty? We think they are not, and that they are not included, and were not intended to be included, under the word 'citizens' in the Constitution, and can therefore claim none of the rights and privileges which that instrument provides for and secures to citizens of the United States. On the contrary, they were at that time considered as a subordinate and inferior class of beings, who had been subjugated by the dominant race, and, whether emancipated or not, yet remained subject to their authority, and had no rights or privileges but such as those who held the power and the Government might choose to grant them."

"It is not the province of this court to decide upon the justice or injustice; the policy or impolicy; of these laws. The decision of that question belonged to the political or law-making power; to those who formed the sovereignty and framed the Constitution. The duty of the court is, to interpret the instrument they have framed, with the best lights we can obtain on the subject, and to administer it as we find it, according to its true intent and meaning, when it was adopted."

"In discussing this question, we must not confound the rights of citizenship which a State may confer within its own limits and the rights of citizenship as a member of the Union. It does not by any means follow, because he has all the rights and privileges of a citizen of a State, that he must be a citizen of the United States. He may have all of the rights and privileges of the citizen of a State, and yet not be entitled to the rights and privileges of a citizen in any other State. For, previous to the adoption of the Constitution of the United States, every State had the undoubted right to confer on whomsoever it pleased the character of citizen, and to endow him with all its rights. But this character of course was confined to the boundaries of the State, and gave him no rights or privileges in other States beyond those secured to him by the laws of nations and the comity of States. Nor have the several States surrendered the power of conferring these rights and privileges by adopting the Constitution of the United States. Each State may still confer them upon an alien, or any one it thinks proper, or upon any class or description of persons; yet he would not be a citizen in the sense in which that word is used in the Constitution of the United States, nor entitled to sue as such in one of its courts, nor to the privileges and immunities of a citizen in the other States. The rights which he would acquire would be restricted to the State which gave them. The Constitution has conferred on Congress the right to establish a uniform rule of naturalization, and this right is evidently exclusive, and has always been held by this court to be so. Consequently no State, since the adoption of the Constitution, can by naturalizing an alien invest him with the rights and privileges secured to a citizen of a State under the Federal Government, although, so far as the State alone was concerned, he would undoubtedly be entitled to the rights of a citizen, and clothed with all the rights and immunities which the constitution and laws of the State attached to that character."

"It is very clear, therefore, that no State can, by any act or law of its own, passed since the adoption of the Constitution, introduce a new member into the political community created by the Constitution of the United States. It cannot make him a member of this community by making him a member of its own. And for the same reason it cannot introduce any person, or description of persons, who were not intended to be embraced in this new political family, which the Constitution brought into existence, but were intended to be excluded from it."

The court acknowledges that any State may authorize a negro to vote; but he cannot be made a voter otherwise, nor do his rights of citizenship and suffrage extend beyond the limits of that State.

The Senator from Massachusetts contradicted me in regard to the Leavenworth constitution. I say the constitution formed at Leavenworth is not submitted to the people. It is submitted to the ordeal of negro votes. It is not even required that the negroes shall be free; they may be slaves. It submits to the slave whether he will emancipate himself by his own vote, by adopting the constitution; and to the free negro the question whether he will raise himself to the rank of citizenship; and all this contrary to the good old rule that no man shall be allowed to vote in his own case. Thus the white men of Kansas are to have a government made for them, not through popular sovereignty, but through negro sovereignty. That is the last invention.

Now, did I tell the truth about this Leavenworth constitution? I do not see the Senator from Massachusetts in his seat any longer. If he were here, I should like to inquire of him as to the authenticity of this document. I find it in what is called "The Quindaro Chindowan." Who can tell me what sort of a paper that is?

Mr. WILSON. It is a free-State paper in the Territory of Kansas.

Mr. PUGH. The editor appears to have been one of the delegates at Leavenworth, and chairman of the committee which drafted the address of the convention. That address is here, but I shall not read it. Let us see how the constitution is to be ratified. The second section of the schedule provides:

"Sec. 2. This constitution shall be submitted to a vote of the people for approval or rejection, on the third Tuesday of May, 1858. The vote shall be by ballot; and those in favor of the constitution shall write or print upon their ballots the words: 'For the constitution;' and those opposed to the constitution, shall write or print upon their ballots the words: 'Against the constitution.'"

You observe there is no definition of the right of suffrage here. But, in the first section of article second, on the elective franchise, they provide:

"Sec. 1. In all elections not otherwise provided for by the constitution, every male citizen of the United States, of the age of twenty-one years or upwards, who shall have resided in the State six months next preceding said election, and ten days in the precinct in which he may offer to vote, and every male person of foreign birth, of the age of twenty-one years or upwards, and who shall have resided in the United States one year, in this State six months, and in the precinct in which he may offer to vote ten days next preceding such election, and who shall have declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States conformably to the laws of the United States, ten days preceding such election, shall be deemed a qualified elector."

Here are negro suffrage and alien suffrage together.

Mr. HARLAN. It seems to me that provision excludes negro suffrage.

Mr. PUGH. Wherein?

Mr. HARLAN. Under the Dred Scott decision negroes are decided not to be citizens of the United States. As I understand this provision in the Leavenworth constitution, it is that all male citizens of the United States over the age of twenty-one years may vote. Then, if negroes are not citizens of the United States they are not enfranchised by this provision.

Mr. PUGH. I agree with the Senator that negroes are not citizens of the United States; but the question is, whether it was intended that they should vote for or against this constitution; and to determine that it is necessary to inquire whether the convention recognized or overruled the Dred Scott decision. I say the Leavenworth convention determined to overrule it. I find under the editorial head of this paper—

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. PUGH. Certainly.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I beg leave to read from the Lecompton constitution precisely the same words:

"Every male citizen of the United States above the age of twenty-one years, having resided in this State one year, and in the county, city, or town, in which he may offer to vote, three months, next preceding any election, shall have the qualifications of an elector, and be entitled to vote at all elections."

Mr. PUGH. Where does the Senator find that?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. In the Lecompton constitution.

Mr. PUGH. What article and section?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. In section one of article eight, the title of which is, "elections and right of suffrage."

Mr. PUGH. That is the definition of suffrage after Kansas shall have been admitted into the Union.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. You read from the same provision in the Leavenworth constitution.

Mr. PUGH. The distinction is obvious. The schedule of the Lecompton constitution only allows "white male inhabitants" to vote upon its adoption or rejection. The Leavenworth constitution refers to itself (article second, section first) for the qualification of voters at the election by which it is to be ratified or rejected. Besides, as I have said, the Lecompton constitution excludes free negroes from the State.

But, sir, I ask, in what form was the Leavenworth constitution intended to be ratified? Did the convention mean, in point of fact, to allow negro suffrage at the election for or against the constitution? My allegation is, that, knowing themselves to be a minority; knowing that most of the free-State men in Kansas abhorred them as much as the pro-slavery men, these Leavenworth delegates invented a scheme to secure the adoption of their pretended constitution by the aid of ballot-boxes stuffed with negro votes.

It must be observed that the Legislature and State officers are to be chosen at the same election with the vote upon the constitution. I can see no difference in principle between this scheme and the alleged attempt of certain people in Missouri to impose a constitution and State officers upon Kansas. I confess, for one, as a matter of personal taste, I would rather have a constitution imposed on me by white men, than by negroes, as the Leavenworth scheme proposes. The last section of the schedule provides:

"Sec. 12. The first General Assembly shall provide by law for the submission of the question of universal suffrage"—that is, negro suffrage——to a vote of the people at the first general election of the members of the General Assembly: Provided, That the qualifications of voters at that election shall be the same as at the vote on the submission of the constitution."

The delegates have not even obeyed their own pretended convention act; they have not remitted their constitution to the people; and after all that has been alleged here and elsewhere, on the subject of votes from Missouri, given under the Lecompton constitution, the very worst does not equal this deliberate attempt to palm a constitution on the people of Kansas by the aid of negro votes.

Admission of Kansas—Mr. Pugh.

I repeat, therefore, when we remit the question of the admission of Kansas to her people, inasmuch as she has no constitution except the one formed at Leecompton, such admission, perforce, recognizes that as the organic law. We are not responsible for this juxtaposition and intimate connection of the questions. We, as I have said, cannot remit the constitution to a popular vote, but we do submit the question of admission by this bill, as we have a right to submit it. That does involve in the mind of every voter, and in a manner wholly unobjectionable, so far as we are concerned, the question whether he is or is not satisfied with the Leecompton constitution.

But the honorable Senator from Vermont, and my colleague, complained that there would be fraud practiced at this election; they said there would be false returns, there would be fictitious votes, and thus the people would be cheated.

Mr. COLLAMER. I hope the Senator will do me the justice to say that I spoke entirely from history. Having been done before, and encouraged, have we not a right to suppose that it may be done again?

Mr. PUGH. I must hold the Senator to what he has done. Admit all the frauds alleged heretofore: what new provision did he adopt in order to prevent false votes and false returns? Where did his wisdom culminate? It culminated in the fourth section of the House bill, and that section is copied into this bill. We have adopted his own remedy.

Mr. COLLAMER. I said on that occasion that our security was founded in the appointment of the board who were to conduct the election, being composed of an equal number of officers chosen by the people and by the President.

Mr. PUGH. I shall come to that directly. I say the Senator's wisdom and the wisdom of those who voted for the House amendment, is expressed in its fourth section. That section is in these words:

"SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That in the elections hereby authorized, all white male inhabitants of said Territory over the age of twenty-one years, who are legal voters under the laws of the Territory of Kansas, and none others, shall be allowed to vote; and this shall be the only qualification required to entitle the voter to the right of suffrage in said elections. And if any person not so qualified shall vote or offer to vote, or if any person shall vote more than once at either of said elections, or shall make or cause to be made any false, fictitious, or fraudulent returns, or shall alter or change any returns of either of said elections, such person shall, upon conviction thereof before any court of competent jurisdiction, be kept at hard labor not less than six months, and not more than three years."

The conferees copied that section literally into their bill. They have taken the safeguard proposed in the House bill for the punishment of illegal voting and false returns.

Mr. COLLAMER. Did I not state that our great security was founded on the construction of the board?

Mr. PUGH. Yes, sir, I understand that. I have become acquainted of late years with the tactics of the party with which the honorable Senator acts. Whenever they are defeated at any election, they affirm that it was done by fraud. They never admit themselves fairly beaten; they are defrauded, forsooth, in some manner. What is the difference between one board and the other—between the board constituted by this bill and the board constituted by the House bill, for which the Senator voted? By the House bill, the Governor and Secretary of the Territory, with the President of the Council and the Speaker of the House of Representatives in the Territorial Legislature, constituted the board to receive the returns and publish the result of the election. This bill adds the district attorney to those four officers. How can that make any difference? The Senator must have relied on the Governor and Secretary before, because he could not have a majority of the board without one of them. The utmost he could expect otherwise would be an equal division of the board, and then nothing is decided. The Governor and Secretary remain as members of the board; and as to the district attorney, he is an officer confirmed by our votes, and whose successor must needs be confirmed by our votes. It is too late to pretend that, merely because the district attorney is nominated by the President and confirmed by the Senate, he cannot be trusted. You have already agreed to trust two officers nominated by the President and confirmed by the Senate, to wit: the Governor and Secretary. My colleague asks, why is the district attorney introduced? I answer, that there shall be a majority in case of division; because, under the House bill, if there should be an equal division, the board would be powerless, and nothing accomplished.

But my colleague says that the Governor and Secretary are appointed by the President of the United States, whereas the President of the Council and the Speaker of the House represent the people. Indeed! They can be trusted, he affirms, because they represent the people! How do they represent the people? Each of them was chosen Councillor or Representative, as the case may be, by the people of his county; and his associates in the Council or the House chose him to the chair. My colleague thinks that a man who derives his title in that way can be trusted; that a man who has been elected by the people to represent a district of country, and then chosen to the chair, is the proper man to receive and count the votes and declare the result. Why, sir, that is the case of John Calhoun. He was elected almost unanimously a delegate to the Leecompton convention from the county of Douglas; he was elected president of the convention; and yet, from the first day of the session, this Chamber has been filled with denunciations against him. At last, however, we are told that the safety of the House bill consisted in two John Calhouns. Was ever an excuse more preposterous?

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HALE] made a suggestion yesterday which has been repeated to-day in a diluted form by the Senator from Michigan. He said that if Kansas has a population sufficient to be admitted as a slaveholding State now, she has a population sufficient to be admitted as a non-slaveholding State. Undoubtedly; nobody denies that; but the difficulty is that she has only applied for admission as a slaveholding State; and the Senator, with all his friends, stands committed to that; for they received her, by the House bill, as a slaveholding State—just as we now do.

And so, sir, the opponents of this bill have answered themselves at every stage, in regard to every complaint, every pretense which they make here. It is a measure which, while it preserves the constitutional limits of the Federal Government, and forbears to invade the rights of the States, does, in an unobjectionable manner, by submitting the question of admission to the people, enable them, if they do not like the Leecompton constitution, to prevent it from taking effect.

But it is asked why, in case the people of Kansas vote in the negative, we do not offer them the alternative of another constitution? Well, sir, they have no other, and therefore cannot be admitted. What is the question submitted? As I stated, under this bill, the question to the people of Kansas is, "will you come into the Union now?" If they answer in the affirmative, well; if in the negative, why ask them the same question again? Since they do not choose to be admitted at present, and have no other constitution, there is an end of the case.

But the Senator from Michigan, and the rest of these Senators, declare that if the people of Kansas do not accept this proposition, they cannot be admitted for an indefinite time. Well, sir, where is the injustice of that? Kansas is to remain a Territory until she has a population sufficient, according to the ratio, for a Representative in Congress. The Senator from Michigan affirms that she has now forty thousand inhabitants. I believe the Senator from New Hampshire said so yesterday; and all these Senators are now eager to proclaim the fact. I suspect they speak the truth, and fear that we committed a great mistake, in July, 1856, when we so far yielded to their clamor as to introduce and adopt the Toombs bill. Having so yielded, however, on the report of these Senators, as to the population of Kansas at that time, and having consented that a constitution might be formed upon the basis of the Toombs bill, I stand here to-day, in redemption of my promise, to vote for the admission of Kansas under the Leecompton constitution. But I never agreed to vote for her admission otherwise; and if she has no more than forty thousand inhabitants I will not vote that two Senators shall come hither to represent a less population than eight wards of Cincinnati contain.

But, sir, with what face can those Senators now say that Kansas has not ninety-three thousand inhabitants? Does the Senator from New York [Mr. SEWARD] say so? If he does, it ought to admonish us all that no dependence can be placed in his statements of fact relative to Kansas. On the 9th of April, 1856, the Senator addressed us in support of the Topeka bill; and on that occasion said:

"The constitution does not prescribe ninety-three thousand seven hundred, or any other number of people, as necessary to constitute a State. Besides, under the present ratio of increase, Kansas, whose population now is forty thousand, will number one hundred thousand in a few months. The point made concerning numbers is, therefore, practically unimportant and frivolous."

This was on the 9th of April, 1856, two years since. Where are the one hundred thousand inhabitants of Kansas? The Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER,] on the 20th of May, 1856, delivered a speech on the same subject; and here is his statement:

"It is objected that the population of Kansas is not sufficient for a State; and this objection is sustained by under-reckoning their numbers there, and exaggerating the numbers required by precedent. In the absence of any recent census, it is impossible to do more than approximate to the actual population; but, from careful inquiry of the best sources, I am led to place it now at fifty thousand"—it was forty thousand on the 9th of April, and, before the 20th of May, had increased to fifty thousand—

"—though I observe that a prudent authority, the Boston Daily Advertiser, puts it as high as sixty thousand; and while I speak, this remarkable population, fed by fresh immigration, is outstripping even these calculations. Nor can there be a doubt that, before the assent of Congress can be perfected in the ordinary course of legislation, this population will swell to the large number of ninety-three thousand four hundred and twenty, required in the bill of the Senator from Illinois."

That was said two years ago. Well, sir, where are all these inhabitants? Such was the pretext made for the admission of Kansas under the Topeka constitution. There was then no limit to the Senators from New York and Massachusetts in their assertions of fact, or their prophecies. Then Kansas had forty, fifty, or sixty thousand inhabitants; she was to have ninety-three thousand before the bill could even be passed in Congress, and one hundred thousand in a few months. But now, sir, when the Leecompton constitution is before us, two years after these statements and prophecies, we are assured that Kansas contains not more than forty thousand inhabitants. Had she forty thousand? Has she ever had those magnificent numbers promised us by the Senators from Massachusetts and New York two years ago? If so, she has been decreasing in population of late, and at such a ratio of decrease, unless soon admitted, never can become a State.

This shows that whenever an assertion of fact is necessary for political purposes, there will be somebody to manufacture it, and that even Senators, representing the sovereign constituencies of this Union, will be so far misled as to affirm here, solemnly, what is, after all, a mere and gross falsehood. If Kansas has but forty thousand people, she ought not to come into the Union; and I excuse my vote solely on the ground that the Leecompton constitution was formed under the provisions of the Toombs bill. We agreed on those provisions. It was no question whether the bill should pass Congress or pass the Legislature. The question was whether, if, under the safeguards and upon the principles developed in that bill, a convention of delegates should be chosen by the people, we would abide by the result? I said that I would. I made no condition to the effect that all the qualified electors should attend the polls. I supposed that those who absented themselves would be bound by the action of those who voted. I will follow the Toombs bill to the end; but I will follow no other. If it be true, in spite of representations made here in April and May, 1856, on the faith of which I voted for the Toombs bill, as others did, that Kansas has not now more than forty thousand inhabitants, I will not authorize her to make any other constitution with a view to her admission as a State.

Who is to complain of this? We inquire of Kansas, "will you come into the Union now?"

35TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Admission of Kansas—Mr. Pugh.

SENATE.

Suppose she says, "no; I will not. I will not come in because I do not like my present constitution;" or "because I demand the thirty millions of public lands claimed in my ordinance;" or "because I have not enough population to bear the expenses of a State government;" or for any other reason: then why authorize her at once to form a new constitution, or seek admission into the Union? I will authorize her to do that whenever she has a sufficient population. We should have required it in the first place. From that, in my opinion, most of the troubles in Kansas have arisen. I said here two years ago that I did not believe the question of slavery could account for all those troubles: they result from the conduct of mere speculators and rival aspirants to office in the Territory, who have been anxious to stimulate a small community into the proportions of a full-grown State. It is quite remarkable that free-State partisans, so called, should be so industrious in voting whenever there is an election for officers. They could vote at the election for members of the Territorial Legislature in October, 1857, and for members of the Legislature and State officers in January, 1858; but whenever the question of slavery was involved, whether at the election of delegates to the constitutional convention, or the vote upon the seventh article of the constitution in December last, they were industriously absent.

But, sir, does my honorable friend, the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DOUGLAS,] complain of the population required by this bill? I have before me another bill:

"In the Senate of the United States, March 17, 1856:

"Mr. DOUGLAS, from the Committee on Territories, reported the following bill: 'A bill to authorize the people of the Territory of Kansas to form a constitution and State government, preparatory to their admission into the Union when they have the requisite population.'"

This bill of the Senator from Illinois provides—

"That whenever it shall appear, by a census to be taken under the direction of the Governor, by the authority of the Legislature, that there shall be ninety-three thousand four hundred and twenty inhabitants (that being the number required by the present ratio of representation for a member of Congress) within the limits hereinafter described in the Territory of Kansas, the Legislature of said Territory shall be, and is hereby, authorized to provide by law for the election of delegates by the people of said Territory to assemble in convention and form a constitution and State government, preparatory to their admission into the Union on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatsoever."

That is the very provision of this bill. We have taken his own proposition, as reported from the Committee on Territories. If this be too ancient, let us read the amendment to the Arizona bill, presented on the 8th of April, 1858, by the Senator from Illinois, from the Committee on Territories. The fourth section of that amendment or substitute is:

"Sec. 4. And he it further enacted, That whenever said Territories [New Mexico and Arizona] shall contain a sufficient population to constitute a State—to wit: the number required by the then ratio or representation for a member of Congress, to be ascertained by a census taken in pursuance of law—the Legislature of said Territory may proceed to call a convention for the purpose of forming a constitution of State government; which constitution shall be submitted to the people for ratification or rejection; and if ratified by a majority of the legal voters, in the limits of the proposed State, but not otherwise, may be sent to Congress in the form of an application for admission into the Union on an equal footing with the other States, with such boundaries as Congress shall prescribe. This section shall be, and is hereby, incorporated into and made a part of the organic law of each of the Territories of the United States, except the Territory of Utah."

So that if we should strike out the alternative proposed by the committee of conference and leave this a bill for submitting the question of present admission to the people of Kansas, the Senator's bill for Arizona would supply the rest.

Mr. DOUGLAS. My friend from Ohio is under some slight misapprehension in regard to my views upon that question. I say to him now that if he will strike out all about the Lecompton constitution, and provide that neither Kansas nor any other Territory of the United States shall form a constitution and State government and come into the Union until it has the requisite population for a Representative to Congress, I will vote for it. My objection is to saying to Kansas, "you may come in with forty thousand if you take a constitution you do not like; but you shall wait until you have one hundred thousand unless you vote for that particular constitution." If you will make the rule general, apply it to Kansas and all other Territories, I will vote for it to-day or any other day.

Mr. PUGH. Mr. President, I have said before that the Lecompton constitution is not submitted to a popular vote; we do not propose to "force" the people of Kansas one way or another. Every Senator knows that these grants of public lands, which are said to be bribes, are grants made in the case of every new State, and that they will as certainly be made when Kansas comes into the Union two, six, or ten years hence, as if it were so provided now. She must be a State before we can give them to her, and that is the only reason why we do not now give them in any event; and hence I say that is an immaterial element in the question. The real question is as the Senator from Michigan stated it at the beginning of the session. He said the people of Kansas might not desire to come into the Union, and this without the least reference to the Lecompton constitution. That question we now propound to the people: do you desire to come in? If so, as you have no other constitution but that formed at Lecompton, we must recognize that or none.

I bound myself—and so did my friend from Illinois—by voting for the Toombs bill, that upon any constitution framed under the provisions of that bill, I would waive the question of population; but I never agreed to that waiver in any other event; and now, since the Toombs bill has been executed, all its force spent; now that it has failed, if you please, by reason of the fact that some of the people of Kansas would not vote at an election where they could have fairly and truly expressed their wishes; now that every argument of peace and conciliation and compromise has been made and rejected; now when another opportunity is given for the people of Kansas to become a State, with full power and authority to rectify and amend all their institutions in their own way; if they refuse that, I throw aside the Toombs bill, and follow the lead of my honorable friend from Illinois in his bill to authorize a constitution and State government when Kansas shall have the requisite population. That is my position; and I state it to the Senate in defense of the report of the committee of conference. I stated, when the House bill was before us, that I was willing to give the people of Kansas, in any form in which I could constitutionally do it, a right to vote for or against Lecompton. I cannot remit the constitution to them directly; but I will do whatever else I can. If they reject this bill, let them wait until they have a right to admission, and then demand it.

The Senator from Michigan declares that we do not settle the question, and all these Senators have prophesied civil war. Mr. President, I am tired of such prophecies. I can only declare this, in my opinion, a fair and honest proposition; and if the people of Kansas consult their own interests, they will at once silence all agitation. If they are sufficiently numerous to take upon themselves the burdens of a State government, they should come into the Union, and, if there be anything amiss in their constitution, proceed, in a regular, orderly manner, to reform it. If they have not the numbers sufficient to justify admission, they should peaceably go about their business, tilling their farms, until they have a population sufficient to bear such burdens.

But, sir, how much do circumstances alter cases! When the Topeka constitution was before us, in April, 1856, we were urged to admit Kansas at any hazard, no matter what her constitution, no matter how irregular, no matter how formed. We were told that her case was so urgent, her distress so great, that the mere admission of her as a State, the mere elevation of her to sovereign dignity, without anything else, would heal all her wounds and infirmities. The Senator from New York said so in his speech of April 9, 1856, from which I before quoted:

"Congress has power to admit new States thus organized. The favorable exercise of that power will terminate and crown the revolution. Once a State, the people of Kansas can preserve internal order, and defend themselves against invasion. Thus, the constitutional remedy is as effectual as it is peaceful and simple."

"This is the remedy for the evils existing in the Territory of Kansas, which I propose. Happily, there is no need to prove it to be either a lawful one or a proper one, or the only possible one."

He urged the immediate admission of Kansas upon a constitution acknowledged to be irregular. He contended that the urgency was so great we should overlook all the requisites of law. He said that, once a State, Kansas would instantly be relieved from all her troubles. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] took up the wondrous tale. In his speech of May 20, 1856, that Senator said:

"Next, and lastly, comes the remedy of justice and peace, proposed by the Senator from New York, [Mr. SEWARD,] and embodied in his bill for the immediate admission of Kansas as a State of this Union, now pending as a substitute for the bill of the Senator from Illinois."

Not the admission of Kansas as a free State—not the admission of Kansas with any particular constitution—but the mere admission of Kansas in any form. He continued:

"Rarely has any proposition, so simple in character, so entirely practicable, so absolutely within your power, been presented, which promised at once such beneficent results. In its adoption, the crime against Kansas will all be happily absolved, the usurpation which it established will be peacefully suppressed, and order will be permanently secured. By a joyful metamorphosis, this fair Territory may be saved from outrage."

Sir, the Senator ascended into rhyme, and here it is:

"Oh, help," she cries, "in this extremest need,
If you who hear are deities indeed;
Gape, earth, and make for this dread for a tomb,
Or change my form, whence all my sorrows come."

Two years ago, admission, in any form, in any circumstances, would relieve Kansas at once. It was her territorial form which caused all the trouble; and if she could be relieved of that by Congress, she would be instantly quiet. Well, sir, we now offer the boon—that which can lift from the earth her pale and bleeding form, heal every wound, hide her nakedness and shame. We offer it with a declaration by the President and both Houses of Congress, that her people shall henceforth, if admitted into the Union, be their own masters, make and unmake their constitution at will, retain Lecompton, or amend or abolish it, as they please. But, withal, the Senator from Michigan warns us—perhaps in behalf of his new allies—that this controversy will enter into the next presidential election. Be it so. If the people of the United States—the people of the northern States and the people of the southern States—have not the virtue, the self-command, the patriotism, to restrain so disgraceful an exhibition as we have seen for the last three years, one which sacrifices everything to the aggrandizement of mere partisan leaders, they have not the virtue longer to maintain a republican form of government; and it can make little difference what ensues.

Here is a Government, formed by wise and patriotic statesmen, who established its foundations on a principle of equality as between the States and the people of the States. They believed that non-slaveholding and slaveholding States could remain together in union, upon terms of equality, peace, and justice, under the protection of a common Government. From a few feeble colonies on the Atlantic, we have risen to be the mightiest empire in the history of time. Our emigration has crossed the Alleghenies, and new communities, new sovereignties, are gathered along the Mississippi, from its sources near the lakes to its mouth in the Gulf of Mexico. This Government has protected us in the days of our youth and until now. It has been full of blessing to us and to all our constituents. If it is to be sacrificed, if this Kansas game of foot-ball is to be played every four years, at the expense of all our peace and safety, and as a means whereby this man or that man or the other man shall be elevated to the presidential chair and have the disposition of office and patronage, then our liberties are lost, and the form of our Government is immaterial.

But, sir, I hope otherwise. The people of Kansas may act unwisely now as heretofore. Experience is a hard master, and they have learned his discipline. I trust they will seek redress in this peaceable manner; but if not, if they persist in a disturbance so causeless in subjugating the vital necessities of thirty millions of people to their miserable disputes and quarrels, I believe we have yet wisdom enough, outside of Kansas, to let them alone, and turn our attention to other and more important affairs. I am sorry to have taxed the indulgence of the Senate at such length.

Legislative, etc., Appropriation Bill—Mr. Mason.

SENATE.

LEGISLATIVE, &c., APPROPRIATION BILL.

DEBATE IN THE SENATE.

THURSDAY, May 13, 1858.

The Senate having passed the bill (H. R. No. 201) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1859, and having proceeded to consider the bill to repeal the laws allowing bounties to vessels engaged in the cod fisheries, on which Mr. HARLAN was speaking,

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, if the Senator from Iowa will yield me the floor, I desire to make a motion to reconsider the vote on the appropriation bill which has just been passed. I do so for this reason: on examining the bill, I find that there is an appropriation made in relation to the reporters of the House of Representatives, and no appropriation made in relation to the reporters of the Senate.

Mr. HUNTER. I suggest to the Senator, if he wishes to move on that subject, he had better wait until the miscellaneous bill comes up, and move on that. We have got through with this bill now. He will have another chance when the miscellaneous bill comes up.

Mr. HARLAN. I give way.
The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. Foor.) Does the Senator from Wisconsin insist on the motion to reconsider?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I will enter the motion.
Mr. HUNTER. I hope the Senator will not enter the motion, because we had better go through with it. I think, though, he had better accept the suggestion, and wait until the miscellaneous bill comes up. It cannot be more than ten or twelve days.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I think the matter might as well be settled now, and put the reporters on a footing of equality. That is the best mode of sending the subject to the House of Representatives.

Mr. HUNTER. I hope that, as the reconsideration is a question which has precedence, it will be taken up; but I trust the bill will not be reconsidered, because, if anybody desires to accomplish the purpose of the Senator who moves to reconsider, it can be done in the miscellaneous bill. I hope the Senate will not reconsider it. We had better let it go.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senate reconsider the vote by which they passed the appropriation bill making appropriations for certain legislative, executive, and judicial expenses?

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is so manifestly proper that our own reporters should be on the same footing as those of the other House, that it seems to me this motion ought not to be objected to. We passed a deficiency bill the other day, by which we paid the reporters of the House of Representatives an additional compensation. That compensation was not paid to our own reporters; and if there are any men connected with this Government, of whom I have any knowledge, that earn their money, it is the men who do the reporting for the Senate. So long as we employ them we ought to pay them. I know I heard it suggested on one occasion, by the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. TOOMBS,] that he did not want any reporting. Very well; if we adopt that plan, then we get rid of them; but the Senator from Georgia does not wish to have them employed, and work all night without paying them, of course. If he employs them, he will pay them—no doubt about that; we all agree to that, the work being done. Now, I see in this bill an appropriation in these words:

"For the usual additional compensation to the reporters for the Congressional Globe for reporting the proceedings of the House of Representatives for the next regular session of the Thirty-Fifth Congress, $800 to each reporter, $4,000."

Certainly, we ought to place the reporters of the Senate upon the same footing. As I said, there are no men connected with the Government, of whom I have any knowledge, that work so many hours and perform so much labor—and so faithfully, too, I will add—as the reporters of the Senate. I have been astonished to see the accuracy with which our proceedings are reported. I think it is improper to suffer an appropriation bill of this kind to pass without providing for our own officers; and I trust the vote by which the bill was passed will be reconsidered.

Mr. TOOMBS. The Senator from Illinois makes a very strange statement of this case, which I think must arise entirely from his not having examined it. He says, if we employ these people, we ought to pay them. I say so, too. That is the case he states. But we do not employ them, they never have been employed by the Senate of the United States, or by the House of Representatives. They are not officers of this House—not one particle more than they are officers of the executive department. We made a contract with Mr. John C. Rives to report and to publish the proceedings of the Senate. We first agreed to pay him for that, $7 50 a column; then we threw him the binding; and then we gave him a cent for every five pages, which is fifty per cent. more than his contract price; and there have been two or three additions to it. We have no more right, and no more business, to pay his reporters, as we do not employ them, than we have to pay the men who set up the types.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Move to strike out the House reporters.

Mr. TOOMBS. That is not up. These bills are pressed so closely that I have not time to examine them thoroughly, and I generally have to rely on the Finance Committee in regard to them; for no human being can look through all the appropriations of this Government in the time allowed us. We have to rely on our committees. I had not supposed an abuse of this kind would have escaped the vigilance of the Committee on Finance of the Senate. It ought not to have done so, because it is paying persons not employed by the two Houses at all, and that never have been employed by the two Houses. You are paying money that ought to be paid by the man whom you engage to do this business. You pay about one hundred and thirty thousand dollars a year for this business to your Public Printer; and then, under the pretext that these persons are your officers, you are asked to pay those whom you have employed him to pay. Is there one man in this Senate who considers it just and right, or dealing fairly by the public Treasury?

I speak nothing of the merits of these men; they may be the best reporters in the world; they may be entitled to $8,000, for all I know or care; but is this job to be given to the Public Printer any longer? I consider it infamous. That is my judgment of it. You ought to dismiss your Public Printer, or else make him comply with his contract. Why do you not go and pay his printers? They work at night, too. Why do you not pay other people? Why should you pay the employees of a person whom you employ? You might just as well, when you employ a man to build an extension to your Patent Office and Post Office, go and pay every one of his workmen. You are to pay these men because they happen to have access to Senators, and probably write out speeches for them, and do little jobs of that sort for those who are unable or unfit to do it themselves. These poor devils who go along here and work for $1 50 a day, and are at work on the public buildings, are employees of your employe—and they are doing your work as much as these people. Is not Mr. Rives's compensation enough? It is nearly twice as much as you first employed him at; throwing in the binding, certainly fifty per cent. more. You gave him, at first, $7 50 a column, and have increased it one cent for every five pages; and you have added to the number of copies allowed each Senator from twelve to ninety-three, to give an additional profit. You have made three specific departures from the original contract, giving great and permanent additions to it; and he now calls on you to pay the workmen that he undertook to pay himself, and for which you appropriate to him in this very appropriation bill. They are not our workmen.

Mr. SEWARD. It strikes me that the argument of the honorable Senator from Georgia is a very effective argument in favor of this motion, which, as I understand, is to reconsider the appropriation bill which we have just passed. The object, to be sure, of the mover of the proceeding for reconsideration, is that he may procure to be inserted in this bill an appropriation to pay the reporters of the Senate, so that they shall stand enjoying the same compensation which the bill gives to the reporters of the House of Representatives. The honorable Senator from Georgia argues that the compensation given by the bill to the reporters of the House of Representatives, and proposed to be given here, is unjust. If so, the bill ought certainly to be reconsidered, for the purpose of striking out the appropriation which has been wrongfully made. If the Senator who moves the reconsideration is right, then the bill ought to be reconsidered, for the purpose of making a right appropriation for the reporters of the Senate. I hope we may have the question; and I do not know whether there will ever be a more appropriate time to consider this question than now.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Before the vote is taken I wish to say a word. This matter escaped my attention before the bill passed. The chairman of the Finance Committee will recollect that when we went over the bill in committee, the first time, we marked this item for consideration afterwards; but I do not remember that it was called up afterwards at all. I know that at the time the bill was before the committee, and we were reading it over, I proposed to amend the bill as proposed now by the gentleman who has moved the reconsideration, for the purpose of putting in the reporters of the Senate. It is certainly nothing more than reasonable that it should be done. As suggested by the Senator from New York, if this appropriation ought not to be made at all, the Finance Committee should have stricken out the clause for the House reporters. There are four in the Senate—I understand that is the number—and the reason why it was not considered at first in committee, was that we did not know what the exact number of reporters was in the Senate, and it was postponed for the purpose of ascertaining; and, if I recollect aright, the chairman was himself to ascertain what the number was before we acted upon it. I understood it so. If not, at any rate, I undertook to ascertain; but when the bill came up the second time it escaped my notice; for the reason that my copy of the bill, on the margin of which I had made some memoranda, was lost, in some way or other. As I before said, and as was suggested by the Senator from New York, either this clause ought to be stricken out, as it stands in the bill, or else we ought to put in something for our own reporters.

Mr. TOOMBS. I am for the reconsideration to strike that out.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then I have only to say in addition, that I have myself come to the conclusion, on examination of the subject, that we ought to pay our reporters, under the circumstances, the sum which they have asked for, and which we have paid heretofore; and I shall vote for it if I have an opportunity to do so. I believe they had no pay from us for the last session, while the reporters of the House had their $800 apiece. If they did not get it then, we provided for it in the deficiency bill at this session; and when the deficiency bill was up, it was suggested, as a reason for not putting on our reporters at that time, that soon the appropriation bill would come up, on which they had been usually placed. We then passed it over, to be considered at some future period. If the appropriation for the House reporters had not been put into this bill, I would not move to put the Senate reporters in this bill, but let it go to the omnibus bill finally. I think now it should come in here; we should either strike the House reporters out or put in ours—put them on an equality.

Mr. MASON. If we are to have the debates of the Senate reported at all, it is certainly a matter interesting to the Senate, and to the country, that they should be reported accurately. I recollect that amongst the first measures of interest presented, when I came into the Senate, now some years ago, was a proposition, that was then new for the Senate, to appropriate for a corps of reporters. My opinions, at that time, were adverse to it. I thought it was a matter that should be left altogether to private enterprise, to the newspapers who were to diffuse the reports, and that it would be an improvident and unnecessary interference with private enterprise for the Senate to take part in the matter at all. But it was done; a contract was made for reporting upon certain terms—I do not remember what. That contract was thrown up at the end of two years, upon an experience that the contractor did not comply with its provisions, and that his reporters were very inferior. It has gone on by a system of contract and engagements, from that time up to the present. I am sure I have the concurrence of all Senators who have looked at it, in the opinion which I am now to express, that there are at this time to be found in the Senate as efficient, laborious, and accurate a corps of reporters as can be found anywhere. None can look at the paper which we get daily, and see there the amount of reporting, and the accuracy of reporting, given to us the day after a debate transpires, without being impressed with the perfect organization of that corps; and yet I am not satisfied with it. I confirm altogether what came from the Senator from Georgia, that we commenced by paying the contractor a certain amount per column, and we have gone on adding sops, and more sops, from time to time, until the amount of the original engagement has been very much increased—how much I do not know, for it has been done in various ways, and amongst the latest was a provision that was passed here a few years ago making his paper transmissible, free of postage, through the mails.

My attention was drawn to this during the present session, and very recently by having read a circular note that was addressed by the editor of the paper which is the reporting paper, the Daily Globe, I suppose to all Senators, which impressed me with the idea that he in some way presumed upon his position here, as the official reporter of the Senate, to indulge in a license to write a note impudent, intrusive, and insolent. The substance of it was, that Senators had taken the liberty, after their remarks had been made, to correct the report of them before it went to press—a liberty which he would not thereafter indulge them in; and coupled with this was the intimation that they had not only availed themselves of the privilege which he had extended to them to correct their own remarks, but that they had at the same time perverted remarks made by other Senators, interrupting them in the course of the debate. I laid the note by for future use. I have it not here, but I dare say other Senators—

Mr. SEWARD. Will the honorable Senator allow me to ask him, as I suppose he desires to be very accurate, whether he is not in error on one point—whether the intimation was, not that Senators had perverted the remarks of others, but that, by altering their own, they deprived the remarks of others of effect?

Mr. MASON. I have not read the note since it was first sent to us. I laid it by—and I have no doubt I could find it again—intending to produce it to the Senate when this question came up. It has come up incidentally on an appropriation bill, and therefore I have not an opportunity of referring to it. I do not think the Senator from New York is correct in his recollection, though he may be, ("He is!") but it is perfectly immaterial. The idea conveyed by it was, that a Senator availed himself of the opportunity to correct his remarks, to pervert the meaning of the remarks of others connected with his, by altering the report of others, or altering his own—perfectly immaterial which. It was ascribing to a Senator the idea of an evasion, an escape from a committal which he might have made, by availing himself of the privilege of a revival of the notes to alter his own remarks or those of the interjector—I care not which.

This struck me at the time as evidence of the fact that, if the Senate were to have a reporter of the debates, which I believe is useful and proper, the system must be changed in some way; and I became impressed with this, (which I am rather disposed to think is the fact,) that this system of reporting, originating at first some ten or eleven years ago, with a purpose of the Senate to have their debates reported for general information and for future history, has degenerated into the abuse of making it the mere support of a newspaper—I ought not to say a newspaper, for there is very little news in it, but the support of a daily press. I see no reason for that whatever; and I am free to say that I think the time has come when, in some way, the Senate should avail itself of the great improvement—almost perfection—which has been attained in reporting; for it has been attained here, without having the incubus of a press to be carried by it. I have no grievance with that press, none whatever, that induces me to make these remarks; but I make them from a consciousness that it has degenerated into an abuse that has carried that paper free through the mails—a provision against which I voted some three or four years ago. I do not recollect the amount of the subscription to this register of debates which the public pays, but it is very large on the part of each Senator. I think the time has arrived when we shall find it desirable to avail ourselves of the skill which has been attained by the reporting corps, for the advantage of the Senate and of the country; but at the same time to rid us of the abuse of making that skill sustain a press without value of any kind whatever.

Mr. HAMLIN. I have a distinct recollection of the circular letter to which the Senator from Virginia refers, but my memory of its contents is very different from that which he has stated. I think the contract which is made with Mr. Rives provides in terms for an accurate and correct report of the daily proceedings of the Senate. That was the design and object when this system was entered into. I know many instances—I could refer to them; I presume there is hardly a Senator who will not call to his own mind frequent occasions; where words had been uttered upon this floor, and had been successfully answered, and then the Senator, whose argument had thus been refuted, under the old system, went to the press and changed entirely the substance of what purported to have been said here. That was the state of things in existence. It was the object of the publisher, first to comply literally with the contract that he had made with the Senate, to report truly and accurately what Senators did say; and if a proposition was advanced by any gentleman, the scope of that letter was to prevent his changing it entirely, so that what had been said in reply should be inappropriate.

Now, I understand that circular to have been intended and designed to remedy that evil—for it was an evil. I know very well that I so understood it; and I recollect distinctly saying to him, one day, after I had received that circular, that I, as a Senator, rejoiced that he had adopted that rule; because what a Senator says deliberately here he ought to be responsible for, and he ought not to be allowed to say one thing here, and then go to the press and say an entirely different thing in the printed report. That, I think, was the object. I cannot doubt it; because I apprehend the recollection of every Senator will agree with mine, that we received still another circular letter, stating to us that we could have the opportunity of correcting, and revising, and changing, in any way we pleased, whatever was transferred from the Daily Globe to the Congressional Globe. By that arrangement, then, the contract was carried out. We were reported precisely as we spoke; and if we saw fit to change it afterwards, on our own responsibility, and make another thing of it, we had the opportunity of so doing; and certain times in the second circular letter were prescribed within which we were to do it, so as not to delay the publication in the Congressional Globe. So I understand it.

Well, sir, I have never had occasion to correct, in any material manner, what the reporters have reported me as having said. It is a marvel to me this day, how these young men sitting here can, after long hours of toil, report with that accuracy which is almost mathematical. Still, under that arrangement, and under the contract made, I do not understand now that we are precluded from making any correction of the matter as it first appears, provided we do not change the sense. I take it, no man, certainly very few, speaks with that accuracy which does not sometimes require the change of a word for the purpose of better expressing the idea without varying at all the sense; and there are few men who speak so accurately as always to select precisely the very best word to convey the idea. All these changes, as I understand these circular letters, may be made; all immaterial changes that do not vary the sense, may be made in the first instance; and all that the circular to which the Senator refers contained, and all that it designed, was to prevent a Senator from changing what he did say into what he did not say. That is my impression, and I am stating from recollection.

Now, sir, I pass to say one word in relation to these reporters. If I am not wrong, the first compensation that was ever made to them by the Senate, was made on my own motion. I never made a motion more cheerfully in my life. I believed it was right then; I believe it is right to-day. Your Constitution provides that you shall keep a journal of your proceedings. The framers of our Government thought it of so much importance to have our proceedings made known, that they incorporated that provision into our fundamental law; and yet how little of our proceedings is known, when we read the simple journal of our daily transactions! Of how much more importance vastly are the debates relating to those proceedings, giving the views of the various Senators upon them! I think what takes place in the Senate outside of its mere Journal, is indeed more important in many particulars than the Journal itself. I would not separate them; we cannot separate them. We ought not to do away with the Journal; but still the motives which control the action of the Senate, you must learn from the debates. These debates should be accurately reported; and I think I hazard nothing in saying, that in the whole world, in England, in this country, or anywhere else, a more efficient, a more accomplished, a more accurate set of reporters cannot be found; and they are gentlemanly in their deportment besides.

I think they are just as much the employés of this body as very many others to whom we have for a long period of time made compensation. It has been an old practice to give twenty per cent. and other allowances to your employés. You say that they are not in the employment of the Government. Grant it; they may not be directly; you make your contract with Mr. Rives, and he employs the reporters. So you appoint your Superintendent of Public Buildings, and he engages his employés. They are just as much in the employment of the Government in the one case as they are in the other. But, for the purpose of preserving such a good corps of reporters as we have here, I shall, if we can have the opportunity, vote to give them the same compensation the reporters have in the House of Representatives. If, however, it shall be the sense of the Senate that they ought not to receive it, then I shall most cheerfully vote with the Senator from Georgia to strike out the provision for the House reporters, and put them upon precisely the same footing in that way. I do not want to see the reporters of the House of Representatives receive this compensation while it is denied to ours, who, I know, do vastly more labor and service than the House reporters do.

Mr. BROWN. I listened to the speech of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. TOOMBS] with interest and some instruction, but he failed to convince me that this additional pay ought not to be granted to the Senate reporters. It is true that we employ Mr. Rives to have the reporting done, and that he engages the reporters for the Senate; but it is also true that, when we entered into that engagement with him, we did it upon terms that were stated, upon a calculation, that it would cost him so much to have the reporting done, so much to have the printing done, and there would be a certain amount of profit left. We know very well that wages have been increasing in every department of labor for several years past. In reference to this precise matter of reporting, I think the compensation for such reporters as we have has always been too small. The labor is vastly increased; and the accuracy of the reports is vastly greater than formerly. When I first came to the House of Representatives, I never dared to allow a motion made by me to go upon the record without casting my eye over it after it was taken down by the reporters, lest there should be some mistake. In the last two winters I have never consulted the notes of any speech that I have made in the Senate, except twice; and I think my experience is that of every Senator. The reports are almost verbatim. Where there are slips of the tongue, as we all know occur here every day, the reporters correct them; they have the intelligence and the skill to do it, and they relieve us of a vast amount of labor. During this winter I am sure that, but in a single instance, I have never seen the report of any remarks made by me.

For such labor, I think the present compensation is inadequate. Can Mr. Rives, under his contract, afford to pay more? I think he cannot, because if he pays more, he pays it out of his own pocket. When we entered into the engagement with him, it was on condition that he would pay so much to his reporters; that the paper would cost him so much; that the printing would cost him so much; that the binding would cost him so much; and, therefore, that he would execute the whole job at a particular price. It is true, that we have, from time to time, added to his pay, as the Senator from Georgia says; but it is equally true that we have, from time to time, been having the work improved. The style of reporting is better, the style of binding is better, and if you get a better article you must expect to pay a better price. That is all there is of it.

Now, for such reporting as we had in the House of Representatives when I was a member of it, I think the present compensation is quite high enough—too high; for if the reporters be so inefficient that you cannot allow a single remark to go to press without casting your eye over it, I think a moderate compensation is quite enough; but if they report with so much accuracy that you can allow a speech of three or four or five hours to go to press without casting your eye over it, it is evidence of a high degree of skill, and I would no more think of putting such a reporter on a par with a mere bungler than I would put an artist—one of the masters in sculpture or in painting—upon a footing with a mere pretender. If you want the highest order of skill, you must pay the highest price for it. You have that skill here in the reporting corps, and I want to compensate it; and I do not want to siphon the money from the pocket of Mr. Rives. You have got a higher order of skill than was proposed in the beginning. He has brought it and tendered it to the Senate. He is unable to pay it without taking money out of his own pocket. He ought not to be required to do that. The Government ought to pay for it.

I should have been glad in the beginning if the Senator who moved this reconsideration had adopted the suggestion of my friend from Virginia, and let the subject pass over, and moved this amendment to what we sometimes call the omnibus bill—the miscellaneous bill; but since the question is up, I suppose we might just as well settle it here. When we had up the deficiency bill, I moved a proposition to pay our reporters—to put them on an equal footing with the reporters of the House. It was objected to there, because it was said we had better pass it over until we took up one of the regular bills. It was not done then. The House insisted, brought it to a conference, and they finally succeeded in having their reporters paid some eight hundred dollars a year more than we pay ours. Our reporters will necessarily feel degraded if the Senate consents that the House reporters shall be paid $800 more than they get themselves. How would Senators like to have it said that members of the House were paid so much more than they get? I do not stand upon a point of honor. The Senate consented to that to save the deficiency bill; you consented to allow the House reporters to be paid $800 more than the Senate reporters are receiving; and I do not think any one who will look over the reports will pretend that they were not less entitled to it than our own reporters. I think the reporters here are entitled to a higher compensation. I do not think it ought to be exacted from Mr. Rives, because, as I stated before, he agreed to do your reporting upon a calculation. He has given you a higher degree of service, and is entitled to higher compensation. I shall vote for the reconsideration with a view to putting this amendment in here; though, if, upon the suggestion of the Senator from Virginia, the Senator who moved it had withdrawn the motion, I should have preferred that course in the beginning; but the discussion has gone on, and I think we might as well settle it right now, and be done with it. I was, in the beginning, have continued to be, and shall be now, in favor of this increased compensation to our reporters.

Mr. MASON. I do not think it is a matter of sufficient importance to reconsider the appropriation bill to put this provision in, whether it be right or wrong; but I want to bring to the notice of the Senate the fact to which I first alluded. I have been unable to get the circular, but I may take it for granted that the substance of the circular is what was put out by the publisher of this paper in an editorial, at the commencement of this session. It is the paper of Monday morning, December 7, headed "Debates in Congress."

"It is our intention to publish the debates and proceedings of Congress henceforth in the Daily Globe, as delivered, without permitting any material alterations; and therefore we shall not send the manuscript copy to members for revision, as has been our custom heretofore. We shall be glad, however, if members will call at our office, and make such verbal corrections of their own remarks as they may think proper. Experience has taught us that when we have sent out copy for revision, some members have withheld it, and thus left our report incomplete, while others have so altered what they have said as to make those who have relied to them appear ridiculous to readers of the debates."

That is the account this man, who is employed to report the debates in Congress, gives of the members of Congress whose debates he reports. Now, I do not know whether he is right in his facts or not. It has never come within my observation that any member of Congress has availed himself of the opportunity to revise his remarks to change them or to pervert them in such a manner as to make those who differ with him appear ridiculous, or to take away the point of the reply. But if it be so, I utterly deny that the reporter is the party to intervene, that he can say "I will not permit this, or I will permit that;" it is a question between the members concerned; let them settle it. If any member of the Senate should avail himself of the opportunity to revise his remarks to do it in such a manner as to take away the effect or destroy the point of the reply, it is a question between the interlocutors; but for the reporter of the Senate to undertake to say "I will permit this, and I will not permit that," is to place the Senate under the control and the supervision of the reporter. I presume that the circular which he addressed to all Senators was of a like character. I know it struck me as of the most offensive kind, because he undertook to place me under his surveillance and tutelage in my intercourse with my fellow-members of the Senate. I do not know the fact, it never came within my knowledge, but if it be true that any members have availed themselves of the privilege of revising what they have said, in the mode complained of, it is a question between the Senators concerned. But the reporter says they are amenable to him, and that he will not permit it, because either it interferes with his interest in publishing the debates, or because he is the supervising and controlling power to regulate this matter between Senators.

Now, I see no reason in the world why, in paying a corps of reporters, we should be at the same time conducting a public press. I know this editor has said—for I have seen it from time to time in his columns—that, notwithstanding the gratuities—for they are gratuities—which have been given to him in addition to his pay, the permission—and a most extraordinary one it was—allowing his paper, of all others, to go free of postage, and the very large subscription that has been made to the book of the reports from time to time, he has said very recently, that, take it altogether, he is a continual loser by the reporting. It may be true; I do not mean to controvert that fact, for I know nothing about it; but, if it be true, it still goes to confirm the position that it does not become the Senate—certainly it does not become Congress—to support a newspaper; and, if his newspaper cannot be supported without larger gratuities, I should be, as I am, decidedly of opinion something should be done for reforming the whole system.

I make no attack upon the reporters. I am more conversant with the reports in the Senate than in the House, and I do not know whether the same corps of reporters have charge of the debates in the two Houses; but I repeat with great pleasure, that I could not have conceived that reporting could have been brought to the perfection to which it has been brought, under the existing engagements with these reporters; and I should be very sorry to part with them. I think, however, we might have a reorganization by which we should have a corps of reporters who would understand their place. They are employed by the Senate to report the debates; and if improprieties occur amongst members of the Senate, it is a question to be settled by the Senators inter se, not by the reporter.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I have listened to the remarks of the Senator from Virginia with not a little regret. That Senator takes offense at a regulation which has been made by the publisher of the reports of this body, and he presumes that it is a surveillance which is exercised over him. He does not seem to be certain that all the Senators received the same notice. I can tell him that I received it, and I have no question that every other Senator did. The reason why this regulation is made is plainly stated. It is sensible in its character, and the reason for it seems to me to be conclusive. It is not only for the protection of members of this body, but it is for his own protection too. The Senator speaks of surveillance over him, and intimates that the printer of our reports has got above his business—that is the sense of his remarks.

Now, sir, it is notorious to those who have looked into the matter, that in no land under the shining sun have the published reports of any deliberative body ever been so perfectly executed and delivered to the world. It is equally notorious, and within the knowledge of members of the Senate, that heretofore it has been the practice of some gentlemen to make tolerably long speeches, then get hold of the manuscript, keep it for days and days, and sometimes for as long a period as three weeks, thus arresting the steady regularity of the publication of the debates. Some have added to what has been spoken, that which, perhaps, they desired to say, but had not an opportunity of saying when they were upon the floor. Others have stricken out what they did say in such a way as to render absurd the intelligent answers that were given to them on this floor. These things were apparent and well known; and because it is proposed to restrict gentlemen so that what they say here shall go before the public as it is said, and thus injustice be done to no man, and the whole of the reports be brought out consecutively in order and in due time, the Senator takes offense. I think that is hardly proper.

By additions to speeches, pages have been thrown on the congressional reports at the expense of the publisher, who has been complaining all the while, at least for the last two Congresses, that the pay he receives is lower than that allowed for any other public printing done in the whole United States. From a long investigation that I made some years ago, I came to the conclusion that such is the fact, that this printing is done for a lower sum than any other public printing in the United States, or any private contract service. The publisher complains that he has had to bear the burden of all those additions, and besides, by them injustice has been done to members who have participated in debates upon the floors of Congress, and they have been placed in an absurd attitude on account of the alterations made by others.

Another good reason is given in the letter. At the first glance in reading it over at the commencement of the session, my first construction before I got through with it was that it had not been pleasantly put; but by the time I read it through, the reasons for the regulation were so apparent that I could not find it within myself to say that the publisher had gone beyond his province in the exercise of his own rights and duties, and I could not feel that in any respect it was or could have been done with a spirit of predominance, of dictation, or of orders to the Senate, as the language of the Senator seems to imply. It has not struck me as it has the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. MASON. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. MASON. The position I take is simply this: if a Senator makes remarks in debate on this floor, he is responsible for them to his constituents, to the country, and to his brother Senators; he is not responsible to the reporter. If afterwards he modifies or strikes out what he says, alters, changes, or perverts it, he is responsible to those who are injured by him upon the floor, not to the reporter; and I say it is intrusive and insolent for the reporter to undertake to say what he will permit a Senator to do, and what he will not; and if that is to be the relation, I am for destroying it.

Legislative, etc., Appropriation Bill—Mr. Gwin.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I do not dispute part of the Senator's proposition, that a member here is responsible only to his constituency and to his brother Senators for what he may say on this floor; but I dispute his right to make long and extraordinary changes in his speech before it is published, putting in words that he did not say, arguments that he did not use, or striking out those which he did use, and which were satisfactorily answered by others, thus leaving those who replied to him in a false attitude. Neither do I think there is any insolence in the declaration that a Senator has no right afterwards to alter his speech in the respects named. I can see no power that should properly exist to do that; but on the contrary, so far from anything like insult, he says that he will not send the copy from the office, which the law does not require of him, but in place of that, he will be glad if Senators will come to his office and make such verbal corrections as they think proper; and he offers the opportunity to do so—to make such verbal corrections as the amenities of this body and the proprieties of the place would seem to require, in the opinion of the Senator who makes the remarks. Is there anything dictatorial or insolent in that? I do not know what the Senator's idea of insolence may be; but if the exercise of those rights which are our own, and the proper fulfillment of all the duties which are required at our hands by the law, constitute insolence in the opinion of a lofty Senator, if I would exercise it towards him, and it would make no difference to me where the Senator came from, or how lofty his position, I would exercise it, and the American people would. I do not regard that as the proper spirit in which to meet this matter at all. I do not concur with the Senator; I see no justice in his remark on that point; and I think it bears hard upon as faithful an officer as this body ever had in the discharge of his duty, and I trust it will have no weight with the Senate.

In reference to the reporters themselves, I will make a single remark before taking my seat. I certainly think that the reporters of the House ought not to have this pay unless the Senate reporters also have it; and I have no question that the matter escaped the attention of the Senators on the Finance Committee, or else they would have moved to strike out the clause to pay the House reporters, or moved to insert a similar clause for the Senate reporters. I have no question that it was an oversight on their part, and I regret that it should have occurred; but I am not disposed to go back now, and reconsider the bill which has been passed, when there is a hope that it can be provided for in another place, as the chairman of the committee urges us to go on; but if we do not now reconsider this bill, and strike out this clause, I shall, at the proper time, when an occasion shall present itself, undoubtedly vote to give the Senate reporters the same character and standing which are given to those of the other House. The language used in argument by every member of this body is dependent on the service rendered by these men; and it is arduous and faithful. Not a single man in this body, in my opinion, does one tenth part, certainly not one half, of the hard labor they constantly perform. I believe they ought to be upon the same footing with the reporters of the other House, and I shall not be a party to make a distinction against those who serve us so faithfully, as all acknowledge; a distinction which, to my mind, very strongly conveys something like a reflection.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, the Congress of the United States employs Mr. John C. Rives to publish a true and accurate account of our debates. Mr. Rives chose, at the commencement of the present session, to send to the members of Congress the circular which has been referred to by the Senator from Virginia. I read that circular. I approved of it then; I approve of it now. I take it that Mr. Rives is a very frank, plain, direct, business man, and that he stated in that circular what he knew, and what we knew to be absolutely and unqualifiedly true. The records of Congress for years show this fact to be true; that speeches have been made on the floors of both Houses of Congress, and those speeches have been replied to, and then they have been changed and modified so as to make other persons who have referred to them, appear ridiculous. It is a fact well known that great changes and modifications in past years have taken place in the reports of the debates in the Senate and House of Representatives. This has been to a considerable extent corrected by Mr. Rives at the present session of Congress, and I think the published debates now are a more accurate transcript of the doings of the Senate and House of Representatives, than in any year past. I look upon the reports under this rule adopted by Mr. Rives as a great improvement over those of past years. They are now more accurate, more lifelike, and more correct.

I differ from the Senator from Virginia in this respect. Sir, when a Senator makes a speech on this floor, I believe, under the rules, it is the duty of the reporters to report that speech as delivered; and they have a right to publish it as delivered, and it is due to the Senate and the country that they should publish it as delivered, and not as the Senator afterwards chooses to change or to modify it. That is the true and proper sense in which to speak of the debates in this body. Now, sir, I do not see any reason to complain of Mr. Rives for this circular or for this practice.

Mr. MASON. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. WILSON. Certainly.

Mr. MASON. I do not mean to say at all that it is not the duty of the reporter to report what is said; but if the speaker has a difficulty with the reporter, let the reporter present the fact to the Senate, and not undertake to control the Senate—that is all.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I understood the Senator to take this ground: that it was not a question for the reporter to decide, but that if a Senator chose to alter, modify, or change his remarks, it was a question between him and his brother Senators. I think the reports should not be changed by any Senator. I think no Senator has a right to change his remarks so as in any way to affect the sense as understood in this body by others who engaged in the debate. If he chooses to change a word or add a word to his remarks that does not concern in any way other Senators, I do not think any one would have a right to complain; but any Senator has a right to complain if remarks are changed or modified so as in any degree to affect the sense of the debate or to affect what is said by other Senators.

I shall vote for this reconsideration, and I am not only in favor of paying these reporters now, but of going back and paying them in the past. I believe that our corps of reporters is the best organized corps of reporters on this continent. We have the proof before us. Why, sir, yesterday we spent six hours here in debate—not in prepared written speeches, but in a running discussion—and to-day has been laid upon our tables that entire debate; and I happened to know that these reporters were employed until an early hour this morning in preparing that long debate of yesterday for publication. They perform an amount of labor that is not appreciated in the Senate or in the country, and I think that if they do not, under the present arrangement with Mr. Rives, receive an adequate compensation, we owe it to them before the Senate adjourns, to adopt a policy that shall give them an ample compensation for the severe labors they are compelled to perform.

The House of Representatives propose to give their reporters $800 apiece. The reporters of the Senate perform double the amount of labor of the reporters of the House. Why, sir, the discussions in this body, and especially during the present session, have been debates, not written essays prepared and written out, that save a great deal of labor to the reporters, but actual debates; and we all know that the Senate during the present session has sat more hours than probably at any session in the history of the country. In the House of Representatives, nearly all the speeches made upon public questions of importance are written speeches. The members are forced to this by the one hour rule; and it saves the reporters of that body an immense amount of labor.

Then the yeas and nays are often taken in that body, occupying nearly half an hour for each call, and relieving them in that way. It is my opinion, and I think it will be sustained by an examination of the facts, that the reporters of the Senate perform double the amount of labor performed by the reporters of the House of Representatives; therefore, I shall vote to reconsider, and to place these reporters on at least the same footing with those of the House of Representatives.

The Senator from Georgia says that we do not employ them; they are employed by Mr. Rives. I believe they are inadequately paid. I do not know whether Mr. Rives be to blame, or whether we have driven a hard bargain with him, or whether it is an implied understanding with him that we are to make up a sort of compensation to these gentlemen. It ought to be changed; it is not right as it now stands. These reporters ought to be paid an ample compensation. They ought to be employed by the Senate directly, or the arrangement with Mr. Rives should be such that they shall be adequately compensated for the immense labors which they are compelled to perform—labors that are performed, I think, to the general satisfaction of the Senate and the country.

Mr. GWIN. I am of opinion that these reporters do very heavy service, and that the proposed amendment would not more than pay them for the service they perform; but I cannot understand how it is possible for them—and, I believe, they are as good reporters as any in this country or any other country—to take down a running debate without occasionally making a mistake. Now, I am scarcely ever taken down exactly as I intend to speak; I have no doubt it is my own fault—not theirs. The objection I have to this plan of publishing precisely what the reporters take down is, that they may make a mistake, or a Senator may make a mistake himself, and thus the ideas he intends to convey may be wrongly presented to the country. If the editor were my neighbor, as he used to be, it would be very convenient for me to go to his office and correct the report of my remarks; but I live a long way off. I stated six years ago in this body, and so did the then Senator from Michigan, General Cass, that it was our misfortune, on account of our mode of speaking, the manner in which we addressed the Senate, that the ideas we intended to convey were scarcely ever reported exactly. I have ceased to correct these matters, and I think that the best plan; but I will give you an instance: I am reported as having said, yesterday, that when the Senator from Mississippi was Secretary of War, an estimate was sent in for the purchase of the property at Lime Point, California, at the price now asked. What I said, or meant to say, was that an estimate had been sent in, and that the parties claimed that price. I was on one occasion reported as saying that I was in favor of repealing the duty on iron—it was railroad iron that I said. I did not see the error until a year afterwards, when I was looking over the debates.

I think there is an error in the system. The reports are too minute. There is a vast deal of useless matter put into these books that is never read even by members. I think there ought to be a system devised by which we should have a compendium of the debates, leaving out a great deal of immaterial and useless matter now published. Frequently remarks here are made without any kind of preparation, and if a member corrects the report for the Congressional Globe after it appears in the daily paper, it is not seen perhaps for six months afterwards. I believe we have as good reporters as there are in this or any other country, but there is an error in the system, and I confess that I feel a great delicacy in speaking on any question of importance unless I write down my views in advance. I do not blame the reporters. I believe the difficulty arises from my mode of address: other Senators have said the same thing heretofore. I am in favor of the provision that is sought to be made for our reporters, but I would prefer that it should come in the miscellaneous bill hereafter. I do not want to touch the bill which has been passed. I want our reporters to get as much as those of the other House, but I think the system ought to be partially changed.

Mr. BELL. I shall vote this compensation to the reporters of the Senate with great pleasure; but, after all that has been said, I shall not dwell any farther on their merits, or their claims upon the generosity of the Senate. I rise for the purpose of interposing a word in defense of the printer of the debates of Congress against what has been said by the honorable Senator from Virginia. I shall not call it an attack, because, if I have not misunderstood that Senator altogether in his general principles and feelings as a public man and a Senator, he did not intend any such thing. I cannot suppose that he intended to convey an idea which the course of his remarks would tend to convey. The Senator has spoken of the apparently offensive and dictatorial manner the printer of the debates has assumed in penning the circular of which he complains. He is a plain, blunt man, and does not employ very courtier-like language; and I know the Senator from Virginia is capable of understanding that, and appreciating it; and there may not be a great deal in that point. As I understand the honorable Senator, however, he intends to convey the idea that there is an error which ought to be corrected in the policy of the Senate itself, with reference to the patronage we had given for the purpose of securing the printing of the debates of the Senate, and that it should not extend to the support of a newspaper. I do not know that I understood the exact impression my honorable friend had in his mind as to this paper. Is it understood that it is a party press which is supported, or a neutral press, or what is the specific objection?

The honorable Senator from Virginia says, that having, as it is admitted by all gentlemen, a very competent corps of reporters, sound policy requires that we should devise some plan by which their reports should go to the country, without making the money expended for the reports subsidiary or auxiliary to the publication of a mere newspaper. I have not been in the habit of reading the Daily Globe very attentively, but I have sometimes cast my eyes over the editorial portion, and I have generally regarded it as giving heads of information that all parties in the country might be interested in knowing, particularly the readers of the paper in which the daily proceedings of Congress are published. If the printer of the reports has availed himself of the patronage given by the majority in both Houses, (no matter what their politics may be), to maintain a newspaper for the propagation and support of the principles of the party to which he professes to belong, or has in any way made an improper use of the patronage bestowed upon him, I should think it objectionable; but I do not understand the Daily Globe to be a paper of that kind.

If I comprehend the drift of the remarks of the honorable Senator from Virginia, it is that, by paying directly a corps of reporters, we might have the proceedings of this body published without giving support to a newspaper. I do not perceive how such a policy could be put into operation. If we employ a corps of reporters to report the proceedings of the Senate, and want them printed for daily circulation in the country, how can it be done but in the sheets of some publication? And it must be in a daily journal. Would my friend from Virginia order them to be printed in a Government, or quasi Government, organ—the press, in this city, which receives the patronage of whatever party may be in power, through the Executive? I know that could not have been his idea, and yet that is the tendency of his remarks. This is not a great commercial city, and no party newspaper can be adequately maintained here without receiving some support from the Government. They usually become so impotent for the want of that sort of patronage, or become so dependent on getting some degree of support from one or the other House of Congress, or from the Executive, that they cease to be of any great value to the country. In my opinion, the policy which has been adopted by Congress, of patronizing the publication of such a journal as the Globe, not regarding it as a party journal at all—and I have never considered it so—sending to the country daily reports of the proceedings and debates in the two Houses of Congress, is worthy of being denominated a national institution. If I had the power, if I had the means, or if it was proper or constitutional, I should be happy to give my vote for sending that journal to every man in the United States who can read English, because it conveys information that he cannot get through the party press. If my friend from Virginia should succeed in carrying out his policy, and putting down this publication of the debates of the Senate and House of Representatives through the Globe, he would necessarily, I think, be compelled to resort to the columns of whatever paper might be the organ of the existing executive Government, to whatever political party it might belong. Thus, when the debates went out to the country, containing the expression of sentiments on both sides of every question, they would be accompanied by partial comments calculated to destroy the effect of unwelcome truths which might otherwise be made to tell powerfully against the party in power. It is of the greatest importance that the truth shall go to the whole country if possible; and some of the misfortunes under which we are laboring result from the fact that the truth does not go to the whole country. When party spirit runs as high as it does now, and as it has for many years past, prejudices are deeply excited, and the minds of the zealous followers of party can scarcely be said to be rational in regard to party questions, and they will not regard as of the slightest consequence statements coming from a journal which is opposed to their own feelings; at all events they do not patronize such journals.

On these grounds, I consider such a publication as that of Mr. Rives as of the greatest interest and importance to the public to be maintained. It gives to the country daily information of the proceedings of Congress—the views of all parties. Why, sir, if the time shall ever come when one party shall have the predominance for a long period of time, it will naturally not only grow corrupt, but tyrannical and oppressive; and a few individuals, patriotic, independent members of the party, have not the power to correct and control it. The light that goes from this quarter is, more or less, under the control of the Government, in the way I have stated. It may be said the press is free in the country everywhere, and in all the principal cities displays great talent, spirit, and independence. That is true of individual journals; but, if they take sides in politics, they enlighten their own side alone; they mislead their own side; they abuse the relations they occupy to their readers. Thus the truth does not reach the country generally through the party press. Here we have a press which conveys the truth to all sides. Now, one party has the Executive patronage, has the control of a powerful corps of newspapers, diffused over the United States, given to it by a law which, according to the practice of all parties, it is understood may be properly wielded according to their subserviency. In many quarters light is shed only through the organs of the party that may be dominant. One party is dominant to-day; soon it may be a different party; and they may use their power with less discretion, less judgment, and less patriotism. I do not speak in reference to any particular party, but as a great question of principle. The fact is that, in its practical operation, our Government is departing very far from the theory of our fathers—their expectation, their hope, their confidence, as to the manner in which this Government would operate. I think one of the greatest checks upon the abuse, tyranny, and excessive corruption likely to arise in a Government of this kind, is to be found in maintaining among all parties throughout the whole reading community the circulation of such a journal as the Globe.

I do not enter into the objections which have been taken to the Globe on account of the circular which has been alluded to. I think its language is just such language as John C. Rives would be likely to use. I know him personally, though not very intimately, to be sure. He is no courtier. I am certain he did not intend to presume on his position to use language offensive to Senators; but he is a very plain, blunt man. I do not know whether he is overpaid or underpaid for his services. I happened to have a conversation with him in regard to that very circular; for I am a speaker who rise almost always, as I now do, without any preparation, and proceed off-hand, without much order or method, to state my sentiments, and I am liable to be misunderstood, and I feared that I might not be able to correct the grossest blunder which might perhaps be made by the reporters. I suffered a little; because, when the report of some remarks made by me, in the early part of the session, got home to my State, they were capable of the very opposite interpretation from what I intended.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. If the Senator will allow me, I wish to point him to a little matter that has been touched upon, and that it will be of service to us all to have understood. It is the contract under which this work is done. It is contained in a very short resolution, which was offered by Mr. Norris, of New Hampshire, and adopted by the Senate, in these words:

“Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized and instructed to audit, and from time to time to settle, the accounts of John C. Rives, for the reports of the Senate proceedings and debates published in the Daily Globe, at $7 50 a column: Provided, however, That, in auditing and settling such accounts, nothing shall be allowed for the publication of revised speeches, a report of which has once been published, nor for messages and reports from executive officers of the Government, nor for reports from committees of the Senate.”

There is the whole law under which our reporting is now done; and I will also state to the Senator and the Senate that of the $7 50, $4 50 is paid for reporting, and $3 a column is all that is paid for printing.

Mr. BELL. I do not know how that is. I have never entered into these details; my friend from Arkansas, I know, understands them much better than I do, and I should be guided very much by the expression of his sentiments. I did not mean, however, to go into these questions. I rose for the purpose of suggesting something in reply to the honorable Senator from Virginia, lest his remarks might prejudice the Senate, and those who may read this debate in the country, against the Globe. I do not see any objection to it, unless it be a party press, either insidiously or directly taking sides on public questions; and I am sure the honorable Senator from Virginia cannot take this exception on the ground that he supposes it to be hostile to his own political bias or feelings. I meant merely to advocate the idea that it was a matter of great importance that, from some impartial source, a printed sheet, containing the debates and proceedings of both Houses of Congress, should go to every section of the country, and I would sustain the policy of letting it go free; and if it did not exceed an amount that was unreasonable, I should like to have it go to every reader in every State of the Union. I do not know that even that would be unconstitutional; but it might be an unreasonable demand upon the Treasury. It is carrying out the great idea that while the press is free, we may trust the sense and intelligence and judgment and patriotism of the country to keep this Government steadily in the track in which it was intended to move by the Constitution. But, sir, it seems to me that from the excessive party spirit by which the party press has been actuated repeatedly in my time—I do not speak of it as existing now to a greater extent than I have known it to be many times before—the Government is liable to be driven from the track in which our fathers, the founders of the Constitution, intended it should move. Such a journal as this I consider important to keep it there.

As to the provision for these reporters, I shall vote for it with great pleasure; not knowing, and not having any ground on which to found a satisfactory belief, whether Mr. Rives can afford to give them the amount they ought to have or not. As I understand the resolution under which these reports are published, which has been read by the Senator from Arkansas, he gives just what was intended should be given; and if we give them something more, by way of expressing our liberal feelings towards them, or adding, by a separate vote, to what we consider an inadequate compensation, I do not see that it affects Mr. Rives one way or the other. If we do not pay Mr. Rives enough, I should be willing to vote an additional allowance to him, if it were necessary to sustain his publication in a proper form.

Mr. MASON. I can assure the Senator from Tennessee, that, in speaking of this newspaper,

35TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Legislative, etc., Appropriation Bill—Mr. Fessenden.

SENATE.

I did not mean to characterize it at all. I do not look upon it as a party press, so far as I have observed it, in any way. It seems to me, with very little incidental matter, during the session at least, to be only the vehicle for conveying to the country the debates in Congress. I do not look upon it as a party press; but what I said was this: that it would appear that the burden of sustaining a daily paper was thrown upon the reporting of the Senate, without saying anything of the merits of the paper, one way or the other. I have never looked at the paper except as the vehicle of conveying the debates of Congress.

Mr. BELL. I ask the Senator how we could get these reports to the country unless in a printed sheet. They must go in some form of that character?

Mr. MASON. I make no attack on the paper; but what I mean is, that, according to my judgment, the conductor of that paper, on whom is thrown the responsibility for these debates, does not know, or does not appreciate, the relation that I say subsists between the reporter and the Senate; that he undertakes to prescribe to the Senate what the Senate has a right to prescribe to itself; and none outside of the Senate can do it. The contract read just now by the Senator from Arkansas I had looked at some time ago; for my attention was drawn to it by this circular, and it is nothing in the world but an order of the Senate that $7 50 a column should be paid to this newspaper for printing the debates; and he obtains the debates by having them reported. I think the same price was paid for a time to two other papers here—the Intelligencer and the Union. After a year or two years' experience, those papers threw up the arrangement with a very respectful letter to the Senate, stating the fact that they found they could not support the burden, and that, with every disposition in the world to publish the debates, they found they were not compensated for it, and were obliged to throw it up. Now, it may be—I do not mean to controvert that fact, and have not controverted it—that the editor of this paper is not compensated sufficiently for procuring the debates and afterwards publishing them. That may be true for all that I know—I do not mean to controvert it; but I mean to say that, as long as the present contractor understands the relations which subsist between him and the Senate, as imparted by this circular, I am for changing the contractor in some way. I have got the circular since the debate arose, and, as it strikes me, it is more subject to the remarks I made upon it than the introductory matter in his newspaper. The language of it, in one of his paragraphs, is this—it is dated the 18th of February:

"Sir: Several times this session I have published in the Daily Globe my plan for reporting and publishing the debates of Congress; but my articles on this subject seem to have been overlooked or forgotten by members; and I now resort to this printed letter to imprint on their minds the course I intend to pursue in publishing their speeches, as long as I shall continue to publish them."

And then he lays down his rules. One of them is this:

"If a member shall desire to look over and revise his remarks as taken down by my reporters, before they are published in the Daily Globe, he may call at my printing office at any time between seven and ten o'clock, p. m., of the day they were made, and do so; but he must not do anything more than make a fair revision. It has been my custom, until this session, to send out the manuscript report to those members who have requested it; but the liberties that some have taken with the copy, in altering it materially, and thereby making nonsense of the speeches of others who have replied to them in the debate, or in withholding it for days, weeks, and sometimes altogether, and thus making the debates imperfect or unintelligible, have caused me to come to the resolution that such a course shall not be permitted in future, so long as I may continue to publish them. It is due to fairness, to a large majority of members, and to the whole community, that such a practice should be arrested and put down."

And then he has other rules, to which I think it unnecessary to advert, for his own government; and he concludes in this way:

"I ask the favor of members to keep this letter in their desks, so that they can readily refer to it in case of doubt; for it is worse than useless to have rules and not conform to them."

Now, what I mean to say is—that, unless I am very much mistaken, the writer of this letter does not understand the relations that subsist between the reporter and the Senate, certainly not as I understand them. I have never had any difficulty with this editor in my life. So far as my intercourse has been conducted with his press, it has been of the most conciliatory and kind character. I never had any difficulty with reference to any remarks I have made, or to the revision of any speech of any kind; but, on the contrary, I have noted with great pleasure that, in revising them, which I have sometimes thought it right to do, I have found the report universally and extraordinarily accurate. I am, therefore, not objecting to the reports; but I say he assumes to say that he can prescribe to the Senate the rules by which they are to be governed in their official intercourse with him. He says, in conclusion, keep this letter by you, because it is idle to have rules unless they are conformed to. I spoke of that, also, in reference to what fell from the Senator from Tennessee and the Senator from Arkansas, who thought that my remarks had been of a harsh character towards this man. I certainly do not mean them in this light. He stands as any other gentleman in society, as far as I know, a fair, and honest, and honorable man. I have very little personal acquaintance with him; and there is nothing in our relations which would lead me to say anything that could justly be taken as an offense. I spoke of it as insolent. I think I used the true and correct term. It is haughty, overbearing, and out of place. That I understand to be the true meaning of the word insolent—haughty, overbearing, and out of place. It is a departure from the relations that subsist between him and the Senate who have employed him to do this work; and, if these are to be the relations, I should insist on having them severed.

The duty of reporting is one like any other occupation for which men are employed. He is to report the remarks of the Senators. He undertakes here to charge them with taking liberties. Liberties with whom? With him, or with his business? If he looks at it in that light, I should say that he does not understand the relations in which a reporter stands to the Senate. He is employed to report the speeches; and if liberties are taken in the light he means, they are liberties with the other Senators, not with the reporter; and if the fact be as he alleges that there is an unfairness, and that members sometimes change or alter or modify their language in such a way as to make the remarks of others senseless, then the offense is to the party who is thus treated, but the reporter has nothing to do with it. I should be for reforming the whole system in some way in order that we may have, I hope, the same corps of reporters, for I am satisfied we could not have better, but to have them in different hands.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I wish to add a word, though I am very sorry to do so. I disagree totally with the honorable Senator from Virginia, except in relation to the phraseology of that paper which he has read. As to the newspaper part of it, it is perfectly manifest, that if we desire to publish our debates at all, it is a very important matter to give them as wide a circulation as possible. Now, then, if we publish them separate from the idea of a newspaper, which is to be paid for, of course it creates very much greater expense for the country than it does to conduct matters in their present shape. The way that Mr. Rives manages it now, I understand, is, that he puts them in the shape of a newspaper, and that newspaper is subscribed for and paid for, and in that way the debates have a very wide circulation—I wish it was much wider. If it were not for the newspaper, or something in the shape of a newspaper, connected with it, of course we should have to make an appropriation for the purpose of giving as large a circulation as possible to our debates, and that would bring a much larger expense on the Government. It is one part of the process by which the reporter, Mr. Rives, obtains his pay, that he has the ability to send out a newspaper to subscribers which subscribers pay for what they get. If it was not for that, we should have to send it out gratis to such persons as we might select, and the number, of course, would be very much lessened, and besides, the expense of the Government would be much greater.

It is certainly not exactly the right view of it to say that it is a newspaper press, although it assumes that shape, for we all know there is very seldom anything in it except our debates. Only on those occasions when the debates are so meager that it is impossible for him to fill up his paper with the debates, does he put in some of the current news of the day to make up a paper. Ordinarily there is nothing at all there. In my apprehension, the mode we have adopted in order to circulate the debates of Congress is the best one in the world, because the result is that a large portion of the community who subscribe to the paper, pay a portion of the expense of reporting our debates, and if it is not done in that way the Government would have to pay it altogether, or we should have to abandon the system.

Now as to the rule Mr. Rives has laid down. I differ there from the Senator, and from anybody who objects to them. When a speech is made on this floor, it ceases to be the property of the individual who made it. He has no right to change it. He has no right to change an idea in it, substantially. It is spoken to the Senate, for the country, for the purpose, as we arrange things now, of being circulated. It becomes the property of the Senate, and the property of the country; and when a gentleman replies to that speech, it becomes, also, his property so far as to entitle him to the right of having it accurately represented. I hold that no man here, whose speech is replied to, or whose speech is not replied to, has a right to alter it in any substantial particular; and that it is not for me, when I have made any remarks here which have been replied to, to say that the remarks I made are exclusively mine, and that I may change them. Mr. Rives, or whoever the reporter may be, is perfectly right in saying that he, being employed to report the debates for the Senate, will not allow one Senator to do injustice to another. That is the simple principle which he goes upon. I have just as much right to say that a speech which I have replied to shall not be changed essentially, as the person who made it has to say it shall be; and I have as full right to complain if it is done; and more, for—

Mr. TOOMBS. I will ask the Senator, suppose the reporter of the Senate reports you as saying what you did not, who is right then?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then the right is unquestionable to have it corrected.

Mr. TOOMBS. Who judges of it? Is it judged by you or the reporter?

Mr. FESSENDEN. As all other questions.

Mr. TOOMBS. How will you settle it?

Mr. FESSENDEN. If I can convince the reporter that I am misrepresented—

Mr. TOOMBS. Is he the final arbiter?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Certainly, the reporter who has taken down my remarks is the arbiter. He takes them down, and there is the record. Otherwise there would be no rule by which to settle these matters. If we employ a man to report the debates of the Senate, and he takes down the words from my mouth, he must, if they are important, report them as he understands them to be given; and if I say he is wrong, all I have to do is to come into the Senate the next day and put myself on record, by declaring "I have been reported as saying so and so; I did not intend to say it; it is a misapprehension." The reporter certainly is the person to settle it in a contest between him and me in relation to the matter; but where a speech is replied to and commented upon, there can be no mistake in such a case as that, because the thing appears on the face of it.

I understand also from the reporter that some gentlemen were in the habit of keeping their speeches a very considerable time, sometimes not returning them at all; and in that way he was deprived of so much of his pay—so much of his profits. When he reports a speech and has written it out, it is his property; he has a right to be paid for it. He is paid so much a column, and he has as much right to that speech, and more, than the person who made it; because, having made it, there is an end of it so far as he is concerned, except to set himself right on the record if he is misrepresented. That is my understanding, and therefore I think there is no complaint to be made in this particular.

The only complaint that is to be made, in my judgment, is in reference to the language in which Mr. Rives has chosen to make his communication to Senators. I do not think that that is in the most respectful terms in the world; that is to say, it is rather peremptory. I do not believe he meant any sort of insult or disrespect to anybody; but he is a plain-spoken man, and he might have spoken in what seems to Senators rather a peremptory tone and manner. For my part I read the circular, and I did not take the slightest exception in the world to it. I am not easily insulted; I do not conceive myself to be insulted at anything; I wait until I am satisfied that somebody means it in reality, before taking any particular exception to the language; but I think after all that is not a matter to take any great exception to. So much for that.

Legislative, etc., Appropriation Bill—Mr. Toombs.

I hope, really, that those who are disposed to vote this allowance to these reporters will vote it now. Let us reconsider this bill and provide for them, and I say so simply for this reason, that we have more time now, and more leisure to do it understandingly, than we shall have by and by. If this matter is put off to the last of the session, on the last night or two, there is no knowing how much debate we shall have then, and how it will be hurried over. We can consider it more understandingly, more coolly, more deliberately now, to better effect and purpose, than we can in the hurry of the last moments of the session. This bill is before us and we have time. At any rate we are not pressed as we shall be; and if there is any justice to be done to these men, if they have a claim which we ought to consider—I mean a claim in equity, in good conscience, in fairness, and good nature if the Senator pleases—any ground on which he pleases to put it—then let us take it now while we are all in the mood for it and have sufficient time.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. In regard to the last remarks made by the Senator from Maine, I have a word to say, and that is, as to there being more time now to settle this matter, I do not think that is so. We have an appropriation bill which has already been passed, and the motion is to reconsider it. I hope very much that the Senator from Wisconsin will not urge the matter at this time; I do not feel that I can consent, now that the appropriation bill has passed, to vote for a reconsideration. It is opening the bill for too much, and I do not see that this will be an end to it at all, when it is opened, and I do not know when we shall get clear of this bill. I hope very much that the Senator will withdraw his motion for reconsideration. I shall certainly, myself, vote for the compensation, when the time comes, upon a separate bill, but I cannot vote to support a movement now, as I stated in the first remarks I made, which calls for a reconsideration of the bill. I trust very much that the Senator will withdraw it, and let this bill be passed.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. As the appeal is made to me to withdraw the motion to reconsider, perhaps a word is due from me to explain the reasons why I do not feel constrained to yield to the request. I dislike very much, indeed, not to yield to the request of my friends—those who are disposed to favor the object which I desire to accomplish myself; but I fear that if this provision be not put in this bill, which embraces an appropriation for the House reporters, it being upon a kindred subject, and necessarily connected with it, and it be deferred until the last appropriation bill—the omnibus bill—which may pass among the very last bills in the session, a debate may arise, and the result may be that it would not be put in that bill, and then we should be placed in this position: that we should have consented to pay the House reporters this extra compensation, and the Senate reporters would not be paid it at all. For my own part, I desire to see them put upon a footing of equality and justice. I have no other desire in the matter.

Now, I beg leave to say to the honorable Senator from Virginia, [Mr. MASON,] that it seems to me—with all due deference to that Senator—that the remarks which he makes in relation to the language that has been used by Mr. Rives, the publisher of the debates, furnishes no reason why we should not do justice to the reporters, who sit here and take down these debates. That is a question with Mr. Rives, in reference to the publication of the debates, and not a question with those persons who actually report the debates, and are to receive this compensation.

Mr. HUNTER. I hope we shall have a vote.

Mr. TOOMBS. I will tell my honorable friend from Virginia that I am not inclined at all to yield even to his impatience, for all I shall get on this question is to have it discussed—I understand that perfectly well—and as the remarks I have made have been subject to a good deal of observation, I prefer replying on the spot. I did not make the remarks I did in the opening with the view to prevent a reconsideration, but in reply to the speech of the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. TRUMBULL,] and to what we heard all around us everywhere, “do justice to these gentlemen.” Since then, this debate has branched out into the propriety of this mode of reporting, and as to the good manners of the person whom we employ to report and print our proceedings. I do not intend to follow it there; but I wish to say that I entirely agree with my honorable friend from Virginia [Mr. MASON] in the manner in which he has so properly characterized the course pursued by this public printer; and I wish to enter my dissent altogether from the observation of the Senator from Maine, [Mr. FESSENDEN,] who holds that the reporters of this body have got a right to report any Senator as they please, and to print his remarks as they please. The contract is to print what he said, and nobody contends for anything else. No one has contended for the right, as the Senator from Maine intimates, of making one speech here and going and putting another in print.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It has been done.

Mr. TOOMBS. Yes; and it is done now, and it has been done since that circular was issued—done within my knowledge—done almost every day. I have heard gentlemen make observations, of which I have taken notes at my desk in order to reply to them; but on looking into the Globe the next morning, I found they were not there. Those who choose to go to the office, alter their remarks as it suits them. I recollect hearing an important debate in the House of Representatives a few weeks ago, between two gentlemen of that House, in which I felt some solicitude and some interest; but any human being who read the report of the debate next morning would not have recognized it; and that is under the new circular. I heard the debate with interest, and there was a very good reason why it was altered. One of the parties got badly worsted in the scrape, and he made his speech to fit. That ought to have been denounced.

I recollect making a speech some days ago, in regard to the Army, and said you might as well set a Highland cooter—a terrapin in my country—to catch an antelope, as set a regular soldier to catch an Indian; and these reporters, who are good ones, made me say that you might as well set a colt after an antelope; but I suppose I am bound by it.

Gentlemen have spoken about speeches being retained. Well, I suppose I have a trunk full of them now. In the variety of my engagements in the Senate here, in my office, at home, attending to my duties in this body, attending to the public interest, and trying to prevent this very thing of plundering the Treasury, I had not time frequently, especially at the latter part of a session, to read over and correct the inaccurate reports of my remarks, and so they were laid aside for some other time. I think that complaint is just as to me. I suppose there are in my document-room now at least a dozen unprinted speeches. I found it took so much time to revise them that I had not it to spare.

Now, one half the debates here are of no consequence to the country or to anybody. A great deal of them is on questions of order, and a great deal as to the priority of business. There are necessary to be said for the occasion, but there is no use in putting them in a big book to be sent through the mails. Why, sir, you would have to give a great many persons in this country ten dollars a day to read the Globe. Nobody reads it. I think it is a good burial place. I do not know a more private place on the face of the earth to put anything than one corner of the Washington Globe, and that is the security of many of the outrages and abuses of Congress. If there was a different system, if the newspapers circulated abroad the views taken on prominent questions before the country as they formerly did, the real business of Congress would be before the people, and they would decide on it; but now we bury all in the Globe, and from there there is no resurrection. It is harmless I admit, but expensive; and that is my objection to it.

But, sir, the point I made in this case was not whether the reporting was good or bad. So far as I am concerned, it is bad; and I enter now a general disclaimer with reference to my speeches that I do not report myself—they are not accurate. It may be—I dare say it is—my fault; but such is the fact. One man may be slow of speech, like Moses; another may have the facility of speaking with clearness and distinctness; and others may be very different in their style; so that it may not be the fault of the reporters. The question I made here, is one which no Senator has thought proper to meet, except the honorable Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. BROWN,] and he has taken a very curious view of it. He almost charges me with filching money from Mr. Rives's pocket because I will not pay his workmen, when I pay him to pay them; in fact, he used that term. We employ John C. Rives at an enormous sum. We commenced with paying him $750 a column, and we have since added a cent for five pages, which nearly doubles the printing part of it, and then an extra pay for binding and various other allowances, until it has got up to a sum between one hundred and thirty and one hundred and sixty thousand dollars a year, which we pay him to report and print, find the paper, and bind, and furnish the books as printed. Now, because we do not pay the workmen who do the work, forsooth, we are filching money out of his pocket. I say it is filching money out of the public Treasury, contrary to law and justice—I use the term of the Senator from Mississippi; I do not coin it or put it here, but I think it appropriate to say that you filch money from the public Treasury against justice and against right. I do not suppose there is a man in this body who would do it with his own money. Suppose you employ a man to build a house for you, and his workmen come to you and complain, “we only get a dollar a day, we work hard, and are entitled to two:” what would you say to them, if it was your own case? “Go to my contractor, settle the business with him; if he does not pay you enough, quit him.” “Well,” but they say, “we are excellent workmen, and it is very hard business.” That has nothing to do with it, and I undertake to say there is not a man in this body, who, if it were his own individual case, would not turn them over to the contractor, whom he employed.

It is very different, however, when you come to deal with public money—the money of those poor devils, the people, whose praises we hear so much, and yet who are so outrageously plundered. They bear the burdens; they are the asses who are to be satisfied with the compliments to the laborer which we hear frequently all around me—the nobleness of labor, the grandeur of labor, the rights of labor, free labor or slave labor, or whatever other kind of labor you please; but when it comes to voting public money, what does labor gain? Sir, you wring pence out of poverty, out of this very labor, in order to pamper wealth and insolence. You have employed this man at hundreds of thousands of dollars a year to do this work, and now you come here and say he does not pay his workmen enough, and therefore you will do it for him. That is all there is in it, and no man on this floor has denied that that is the case. Go and tell the honest laborer of Vermont, tell it to the laborer of Maine, tell it to the laborer of Mississippi, tell it to the laborer of Ohio, tell it everywhere, that you have employed a man who has been fattening and living on the public purse for a quarter of a century, bloating in wealth, that you have made a contract with him, that you have doubled it, and trebled it, and added to it, again and again, and that he comes to you—no, he does not; he is too proud for that, and I honor him for it; he does not say a word in this business; he leaves that to you and to other persons to come here and say this man does not pay his laborers enough, and therefore the Senate of the United States must pay them $500 apiece more? Why not say $2,000? Why put it at $800? You say the House of Representatives give that to the men there, and therefore the Senate ought to give it here. Because the House of Representatives violate their public duty, and pay Rives's workmen, you are to do the same! I suppose, then, that if the House of Representatives were to pay all his workmen, and pay for his type, and pay for his paper, and for his binding, it would become the honor of the Senate to pay it too. If they take money out of the Treasury to pay those who set his type, and to pay his house rent, the honor of the Senate is concerned, that this honorable body must not be excelled in profligacy by their brothers in the House of Representatives, and therefore ours ought to be on the same basis—those who report here. That is all the argument. You do not even show that he does not pay them enough. Who knows what is paid to them?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Four dollars and fifty cents a column.

Mr. TOOMBS. How much does that amount to by the day, or week, or month? Do not come at me with columns, or ems, or picas. You had better come at me with Greek or Latin, for I could brush up on them a little. You had better come at me even with Hebrew, for I believe I looked at that when I was at college. Anything but ems and picas. Whenever you come at me with that, you might as well talk Choctaw to me. Nobody here understands it, and it is not intended that we shall understand it. I take it that Mr. Rives, who has been bred to this business, and has made a fortune by it, knew what he was about when he agreed to do this reporting and printing for $7 50 a column. He knew what he was about when he got us to give him a cent for five pages. He did not make any mistake then. I do not know what it amounted to by counting his ems and ens; but I find, on looking at the items of expenditure reported to us by the proper officer, that that gave him an increase of fifty per cent. on his old terms. I could not work it out in ems, but I can in dimes. He knew how many dimes it would bring.

Now, without knowing whether his pay is sufficient or not, whether it is a good contract or a bad contract, whether he pays these people half enough or three times too much, you say it concerns the honor of this assembly of conscript fathers to pay as much as the House of Representatives pays to Mr. Rives's servants and employes—that they are not to exceed you in what you choose to call liberality, but what is really squandering the public money. Perhaps here, in accordance with the history of the world in all ages and all countries, the people will take pay in the lip service of which I have before spoken; but I am inclined to think that public extravagance is a self-limiting disease, though it oftentimes kills the patient. We speak of the corruptions of Mexico, of Spain, of France, and of other Governments, with a great deal of truth, according to all accounts; but from my experience and observations, which have been somewhat extensive, I do not believe to-day there is as corrupt a Government under the heavens as that of these United States.

Mr. HALE. Nor I either.

Several other SENATORS. I agree to that.

Mr. TOOMBS. And most of all its corruption is in the legislative department.

Mr. CAMERON. Is not the majority responsible?

Mr. TOOMBS. No, sir; the man who gives the vote is responsible; and if the people ever come to understand that, we shall have a reform, but not till then. I am responsible for my vote, and not for another's. Every tub should stand on its own bottom. If the people want to put an end to extravagance, let them punish the men who give the votes—and my whole object is to bring the subject to the attention of the country. It is my deliberate judgment, that this is a wrongful expenditure of the public money; I think it is a wasteful one. It will go out to the people, and they will take hold of it. Perhaps, if I have time, I shall write out this speech, and put it in a newspaper, or have it printed, and sent to my constituents. In that way it will get before them; but I have no idea that it will get anywhere, in the Globe, except the cellars and garrets about here. One of the complaints of this printer is, that nobody will take his books; and that when new members come in, to whom he is authorized to sell a set, our younger brethren of the House of Representatives—Young America—knowing that they are worth nothing, commute rather than take the trash. That is one of his grievances, and I think we ought to make that up to him. By law he says he is entitled to furnish sets to new members of the House of Representatives; and that of one hundred and thirty-one new members, there was not one who appreciated his learning, or your wisdom, and therefore he says the dogs commuted and took money, or got another set somewhere else. You can make nobody take his paper except by law; it requires an act of Congress to make any human being take the Globe at all. That is one of his complaints, and it is true. I am not surprised at it. Our people are too sharp for that. Even the young members of Congress who come here are too sharp for that, and they take half the money instead of the books. I would sell you mine to-day for half the contract price. My constituents are tired of them. Nearly all the little mail carriers in my country curse me for sending these books, which break down their horses, and I lose ten votes where I make one by circulating them. I should be glad to sell them for half price, but I have no idea that I shall find a purchaser. I do not want to pay anything more than I have agreed. I will do that, but I am not willing to pay Mr. Rives's workmen in order to enable him to complete the job. If he could not print, it would be one of God's mercies, as Cromwell said after the battle of Naseby; it would be a crowning mercy if he was to break down in this printing; but I have no such hope as that. I will, then, put all the weight I legitimately can on him; I will make him comply with his contract, and pay his own men; and I will not put my hand in the public Treasury to filch money, to use the ugly word of the Senator from Mississippi, to pay his men. I am for making him to stand up to his bargain. The Senator from Mississippi intimated that I was filching money from Rives's pocket, but I think the filching is the other way.

Mr. BROWN. I want to say, in the outset, a word in reply to the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. MASON,] in reference to Mr. Rives's note. The note struck me, in the beginning, as it did the Senator from Virginia, as being a little impertinent; but never having known the author of it to say or do a palpably foolish or absurd thing, I read it again and again, and the more I read it and studied it, the more it impressed itself on my mind as proper. The conclusion to which I came in the end was this: Mr. Rives had entered into an agreement with the Government to publish the debates of Congress. He represents that he had no agreement, no engagement with you to publish what was not said here. He had no engagement to publish, at the public expense, essays and things written outside. He had no engagement with you which obliged him to publish a speech which never was delivered in Congress, nor to allow a gentleman to take back all which he had said, and publish something which he never had said. He had no engagement to make one Senator ridiculous, in replying to a speech which apparently never had been made.

He waited some six or seven years for Congress to apply the corrective. Congress did not do it. Speech after speech was published, as all of us know, which never had been delivered, and parts were thrown in which never had been made. Not only did it happen once or twice, or thrice, but very often, that Senators not only published new speeches for themselves, but published such speeches as they would like to reply to for other people. Mr. Rives interposed. His proposition was this: "If you simply want me to print what you send me as printer, I will print the manuscript you send me; but if I am employed to print the debates of Congress, and am authorized to employ men to report them, I will publish the reports, and nothing else, simply allowing verbal corrections."

That commended itself to my judgment; it does now; because otherwise the reports make great nonsense. If one man may go and alter his speech another may go and alter his; the right of one is the right of another; and you make a sort of hotch-potch—a jumble of nonsense of the debates. It is better to take them down as they are said here, allowing members to do what Mr. Rives, in his circular, said he would allow—make simple verbal corrections; not to go beyond that point; not to alter the sense; but if you go beyond that, nobody can see the point at which it is to stop.

But it has been complained, in the course of this debate, that this is an extravagant and wasteful expenditure. How? If gentlemen will but take the pains to investigate, they will see this to be true: that the Congressional Globe and Appendix is published at a smaller price than any book that ever was printed. There is not a stereotyped edition of the Bible itself published in the world so cheap per word as the Congressional Globe. I undertake to say that the volumes are bought, counting the words, for less money than any book ever was printed for, in this or any other country. I dare say Mr. Rives makes money out of it; but how, I cannot understand. I know the fact to be, upon a critical examination, as I stated, that, counting the number of words in the Congressional Globe, it is printed at a less price than the Bible was ever printed for; and that, I believe, is considered the cheapest book in the world; it has become the object of the whole Christian world to print it at the least possible price. How the publisher makes money out of the Globe I cannot understand; but I know that his profits must necessarily be small; and that he can afford to add to the pay of the corps of reporters is not true. As I said in the beginning of this debate, he submitted his estimates, when he first undertook this job, that it would cost him so much to have the reporting done, so much for paper, so much for the composition, so much for press-work, so much for binding; and that the profits would be thus and so. Now, are we to demand from him that he shall take from his meager profits $4,000 per annum to add to the pay of the corps of reporters? It was in that sense that I used the phrase; it would be filching by the Government from the pockets of the man whom you employ, to pay the persons who must necessarily do the work.

It has been suggested, in the course of this debate, that we had better employ our own reporters; and, if they were our reporters, then there would be no objection to paying them this extra compensation. Sir, you undertook that. Who does not recollect—I was not a member of this body, but I was in the other House—when you had a man named Houston to report for you; and a wretched job he made of it! Who ever consults his book? It is hid away in your cellars. There may be a copy in your library; but does any Senator think of sending for Houston's Debates of the Senate as a book of reference? Does anybody have the least respect for it? That was a senatorial job. You employed Mr. Houston to make a book. He made it; and when he made it, and you had paid for it, that was the end of it. You adopted this last plan—that of getting some competent man to have the reports made, to have them made accurately, to have them published by him, and then to pay him for the whole in bulk. I think the reports under this new system are better than they have ever been before. So far as I am concerned, I am in favor of continuing them.

Mr. Rives has never taken the ground, as has been charged in this debate, that he would allow no corrections. He took the ground which I stated before—that verbal corrections might be made; that sentences might be recast; that grammatical construction might be changed or altered or corrected; but that he would not allow a new speech to be substituted for one which was made in the Senate; and in that I maintain he was exactly right. Your contract was for him to report what was said, and to print the report; not to permit anybody and everybody who thought proper to write speeches out of doors to bring them in, and have them published under the sanction of senatorial and House of Representatives reports, and printed at the public cost. I have had no difficulty—I doubt if there is a Senator on the floor during the whole winter who has ever had any difficulty—on this score. As I said in the outset, I seldom ever look at the reports of what little I do say here; but when I do, I find that, while they may not be precisely accurate in all respects, they so nearly approach accuracy that there is no just reason to complain. I think I have not had occasion but once to change the phraseology in the report of what I have said at this session.

Legislative, etc., Appropriation Bill—Mr. Doolittle.

SENATE.

Therefore, I think these charges that Mr. Rives has improperly and impertinently interfered are not just. He is doing what you employed him to do, reporting what is said, and printing the reports. You never employed him, I repeat again, to print what was not reported, and if he does that, where is he to stop? Is everything that every Senator and member of Congress thinks proper to write out at his leisure, to be drawn into the reports and published as part of the proceedings of Congress? Are speeches in the House of Representatives, which we all know must be confined to an hour, to be drawn out to three, four, and five hours in length and published in the reports? Must Senators and Representatives be allowed to suppress proceedings entirely, to break off the whole current of debate? Who does not know that that has been done, that a speech has been abstracted out of the middle of a debate by the Senator or Representative who made it, thus breaking the chain? Somebody is reported as having replied to this speech, but you cannot tell whether the reply is just or unjust. A man gets overturned in debate, and to recover his position, takes out his speech entirely, does not allow it to appear. Some, still bolder, make new speeches, write out something they never said, never thought of saying, and have that published as part of the debate. That was done heretofore. I protest that Mr. Rives was not employed by Congress to publish any such stuff as that. He was employed, I repeat again, to report what was said, and when the report was made to print it. He has, in the proceedings of this session, undertaken, and has, to a very great extent fulfilled his contract to the very letter, and I honor him for it.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I desire to read two or three extracts from the Globe of 1853 on this question. I observe here, on looking into the Globe of 1853, that Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, in the House of Representatives, moved this amendment to one of the appropriation bills:

"I move this additional section: To enable the said John C. Rives to pay the reporters of this House for this session the sum of seven dollars per column instead of four dollars, for the reports of the Congressional Globe, the sum of $3,000, or so much as may be necessary for that purpose, and the Clerk of this House be authorized to pay the same to the said Rives for that purpose."

Mr. STEPHENS then, in a very brief speech, stated the object of the amendment. He said:

"The committee can perfectly understand what it means from the reading of it. I will state that the object of the amendment is to increase the compensation of the reporters of the Congressional Globe in this House, three or four hundred dollars, it may be five hundred dollars, for the session. We pay them under the arrangement with Mr. Rives for reporting in the Globe at the rate of four dollars per column. The object of the amendment is to make it seven dollars per column, and simply to increase their compensation for this session."

Mr. CLINGMAN, of North Carolina, stated that he intended to support the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia. Mr. McMullin, of Virginia, however, following very much the line of argument which the honorable Senator from Georgia to-day has pursued, used this language:

"Mr. Chairman, I dislike very much to make opposition to this amendment, but really it does seem to me that if this committee design to deal even-handed justice to all portions of this Government, and unless they mean to interfere with private contracts, they ought not to pass this amendment. I understand that these gentlemen have been employed by Mr. Rives by contract, and here is an amendment proposing to pay them more than Mr. Rives has contracted to pay them. If I am misinformed as to the facts of the case, I desire to be corrected. If it is the policy of Congress to pay these gentlemen more than they have heretofore received, why do so. But when these gentlemen have come forward voluntarily and made a contract with Mr. Rives—"

Then interferes Mr. TOOMBS, of Georgia:

"This amendment [says Mr. TOOMBS] gives Mr. Rives an additional amount to enable him to pay his reporters a larger sum. It does not interfere with his contract at all."

Mr. McMullin says again:

"I desire information. Is it contemplated that this provision shall have a retrospective effect?"

"Mr. TOOMBS. It provides for this session only."

Now, I have but a single word to say. The speech of the honorable Senator from Georgia to-day was a very earnest speech, an amusing speech, and but for the fact that it is not altogether original, it might be regarded as a very able speech; but Mr. McMullin, it seems, gave the original of this speech when the honorable Senator, then in the House of Representatives, took precisely the other ground: that the object was not to break up the contract with Mr. Rives in paying the reporters, but to enable Mr. Rives to pay the reporters a larger sum, and upon the simple ground that the reporters earned the money, and that is the simple question here. I know it is unfortunate for us who are engaged in the practice of law, that in the argument of legal points we are sometimes brought there on different sides of the same question. I simply desired to read these extracts.

Mr. TOOMBS. It seems that I am called upon to answer the reporters; for, doubtless, they have been speaking through the Senator from Wisconsin. I suppose that is the reporters' speech, and the Senator has not a word to say. My answer is, that since that time from fifty to seventy-five per cent. has been given to Mr. Rives to carry on this work. The Senator, however, is entirely mistaken as to the date; for I was not in the House of Representatives in 1853. It seems he cannot even read a report correctly when the reporters give it to him.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Will you be kind enough to read the book yourself?

Mr. TOOMBS. I know that it is not true, for I sat in this body in March, 1853.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I read from the proceedings of the House of Representatives of the 28th of February, 1853.

Mr. TOOMBS. Oh, I was there then. I came into this body in March, 1853. Since that time, however, double compensation has been given to Mr. Rives. The object then was—and it was an open object—to increase the compensation; and I supported it. You have gone further since that time, by making his paper free, for the reason I stated before, that nobody would read it unless by act of Congress; and you have given him one cent for every five pages, which is fifty per cent. on his printing. Now, I suppose the reporters sit here to prompt just such Senators as he is on these subjects, and good work they do; for the reporters have agents here. They have had them in both Houses. They keep them here. They know the men to get hold of. They know the men who suit them; and they never miss their man. There is never any mistake with them—never.

Mr. SIMMONS. They made a very good hit in 1853; did they not? [Laughter.]

Mr. TOOMBS. Then the proposition openly was to pay Mr. Rives on the ground that $7 50 a column was inadequate; and for some time, on the various representations which were made, I believed it; but since then we have added from fifty to seventy-five per cent. to his contract price. What have the reporters to say to that argument? I hope the Senator from Wisconsin will go behind the bar and get their answer. We have added to Mr. Rives's compensation since that time sixty or seventy-five per cent. to pay the reporters. We have given him one cent for five pages; we have made his paper free through the mails; we have taken ninety-three copies of his book for each Senator, instead of twelve, the number we formerly took. We have increased him sixty or seventy-five thousand dollars on a contract of $137,000 since that, and now you want to "enable" him again. Where are you going to stop? Because you "enabled" him when his compensation was not one half what it is now, is that a reason for doing it to-day?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I understood the Senator from Arkansas to state that the compensation of the reporters of the Senate was $4 50 a column—the same price that has existed ever since the contract was made.

Mr. TOOMBS. I am going to state another fact. The statement there was no doubt made by a reporter. I have no doubt now that Mr. STEPHENS's statement was inaccurate. No doubt it was just such an imposition as probably has been practiced on the Senator now, because the $7 50 was for reporting and printing. There was no division of it in the law, and it is not there now. It was supposed, doubtless, by my honorable colleague in the other House, that Rives and his men had reported truly that the law only allowed so much to pay them, but there was not a word of truth in it, and that is a sufficient reason for the vote, because the law shows that there is not any such thing in it. My colleague stated that, by the law, he was allowed so much to pay his reporters, whereas he was allowed $7 50 for reporting and printing. So far as I am concerned, I believed then he was entitled to more, and since I have been in the Senate, I think, on the representation of my honorable friends from Arkansas and Mississippi, (who have uniformly stood, and do now, I am sorry to see, backing this man in every claim he makes on the Treasury,) I have voted for increasing his compensation. I am not certain that I did not vote for the cent on five pages, and one Senator here to-day, my honorable friend from Connecticut, told me that, at the time, he did not suppose it would amount to $100, but it has turned out it amounts to thousands. It is upon these cents for pages, and ems, and picas, and unknown quantities, that the Senate and the House have been defrauded. The difference between the honorable Senator and myself is, that when I get light and truth, I no longer aid in plundering the public Treasury, and he continues it when the facts are before the public.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. The Senator from Georgia has a very strong way of speaking. He knows very well that the personal relations between myself and him are certainly of the most friendly character. The Senator now talks of ems and picas. There is nothing in the law in regard to them, nor has anybody intruded them here but himself. The Senator perhaps aimed at a matter which has passed from this body, and I should be exceedingly sorry to hear it debated over again.

Mr. TOOMBS. I alluded to the various accounts that have appeared from time to time in the Globe showing that he lost money. I read them. Whenever the printer of Congress comes to us as he has repeatedly, and made expositions of printing, I believe every year since he has been printer, he goes on and shows how much he has lost, how much he gets by ems, how much ems are worth, and so on. What I allude to is the representations by which many persons were misled, and are now.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I thought the Senator was referring to the bill that passed here recently in regard to the prices of public printing. I concluded his reference was in that direction. I was sorry to suppose so, and I therefore asked this correction. In reference to the price of printing in the Globe, there is nothing of that character whatever. The resolution simply says:

There is a great deal to be said about this subject. There is a great deal that can be said. I must say, however, that it appears to me I have never known the Senator from Georgia, for whose extraordinarily strong and excellent intellect I have so high respect, to involve himself in so much unreasonable denunciation, and so much denunciation that is without just foundation whatever, in so short a space of time, in the course of my service in this body, as he has to-day.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The honorable Senator from Georgia has been pleased to make some allusion to myself personally—that the reporter seemed to know his man. The reporter and the Globe seem to know the honorable Senator from Georgia; and I have no doubt that the correctness of the Globe in reference to the reports which were made, will stand, notwithstanding the impeachment which the honorable Senator seeks to make in the judgment of the country. In relation to all this denunciation against profligacy, which we hear from that honorable Senator upon this floor, I wish to say to him, once for all, that I do not take his dictation to me on the score of profligacy, or profligate appropriations. Sir, the history of that Senator is known upon various public measures; and it may be well for him not to push that matter too far.

Mr. TOOMBS. Any extent whatever, sir. I defy all scrutiny.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Has the honorable Senator ever heard of Galphimism?

Mr. TOOMBS. I have.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, I do not desire to enter into a personal controversy here.

with this Senator. It is not my purpose to do it. But I give him to understand that I do not receive these lectures as addressed to myself personally. I arose simply to read the extracts from the Congressional Globe, which I supposed were correct, and to call the attention of the Senator and of the Senate to the fact that on this very question the Senator, on a former occasion, if this is the correct language he used, took a different ground from what he does now. If the honorable Senator has become satisfied since that the ground then taken was not correct, and chooses now to take a different ground, I have no fault to find with him. I simply say that, so far as I am concerned, I desire to do nothing more than to do justice to these reporters here; and I understand that, from the first commencement of this system of reporting, this has been the usual compensation which has been given, both in the other House and in the Senate; and being the usual compensation, I say that if it is to be paid to the House reporters, I insist it should be paid to the Senate reporters. I had not intended to take up the time of the Senate at any length. My purpose was simply to read the extracts.

Mr. TOOMBS. The Senator from Wisconsin asks me if I have heard of Galphinism. I desire an explanation from him on that subject. If he charges me, in connection with any branch of public service, now or at any time, with any improper action on any public transaction whatever, I wish to know it.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. In relation to the subject of Galphinism, and the claim from which that name was derived, I understand that the honorable Senator—I may be misinformed as to the fact—in the House of Representatives advocated that claim, about which so much was said at the time. I do not impugn the motives of the Senator in doing it; but if I am misinformed as to the fact, I am willing to be corrected.

Mr. TOOMBS. This is rather an extraordinary way of dealing with questions, for a Senator to make an allusion without intending an imputation. I do not understand it that way. So far as the claim of George Galphin for revolutionary services was concerned, I say that it received a unanimous vote in the House of Representatives. There are many members upon this floor who sat as members in that House with me at the time, and voted that it was just, that it was right; and the denouncers of it were miserable slanderers and cowards. The gentleman connected with it was every way one of the most honorable men in the Republic; and I undertake to say that he who assails the justice of it or the motives of my friend, then Secretary of War, cannot maintain as a gentleman what he will say as a Senator. That is all I intend to say on that point. I have said before, that claim received, so far as I know, the unanimous support of the Senate again and again; when it passed, it received the unanimous support of the other House, and the signature of the President of the United States; it was a just claim, founded upon revolutionary service. That it was assailed in the newspapers is true; but it seems that Senator now does not choose to intimate or know on what point the clamor was made. The clamor was made upon the allowance of interest by the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, at the instance of another distinguished friend of mine, then a member of General Taylor's administration—the Hon. Reverdy Johnson. The complaint was as to the departmental decision allowing interest. The integrity and validity of the claim have never been assailed, in my judgment, by anybody; but, if there is any, I should like to hear from the Senator from Wisconsin what fact he knows against it.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I will say that I had supposed the honorable Senator himself was instrumental in pressing the claim; not only the original claim, but that he urged that the interest should be allowed upon it, about which so much was said. If I am mistaken in the facts, I am willing to be corrected. I have not made any imputation as to motives.

Mr. TOOMBS. You are not at all mistaken in the fact. When that interest was allowed, I defended it in the House of Representatives, and I defend it here. I know that the then Secretary of War came to the House of Representatives and demanded that the question should be referred to the Supreme Court of the United States, pledging himself to refund the money if the decision was not affirmed by the highest tribunal of his country; and a partisan majority in this House put it down. I suppose the gentleman got his information from his allies; and I dare say millions of dollars have been stolen in this country under the cry of Galphinism. It is the common cry when there is a desire to plunder the public Treasury. I will give a brief statement of the case now to refresh the public mind.

George Galphin was an Indian trader in the State of South Carolina. He bought from the Indians, with seven other traders, a large tract of land. The amount of his debt, £9,000, was audited by Governor Wright, at the commencement of the Revolution. The British Government were to sell the lands and to pay the traders' debts. There never was dispute anywhere about his debt. It went from Congress to the Legislature of Georgia, and from there here, the dispute being who should pay. Georgia said the United States ought to pay; the United States said Georgia. Georgia said she never used the fund; that the land had been used in the particular defense and in the general defense of the United States. This man, being a friend of the Revolution, called upon his own Government. The other seven traders were Loyalists; they went to the British Parliament and were paid. I hold that the Government of the United States were bound to pay the money, as they had, in 1790, assumed the debts of all the States incurred for the general or the particular defense. The Hon. George McDuffie, of South Carolina, reported the bill in this body, and the Senate passed it year after year. It came to the House of Representatives, and there I was its ready defender. It went to the Judiciary Committee, of which the Hon. Joseph R. Ingersoll, of Pennsylvania, was chairman, and that committee reported unanimously in favor of the bill, and it passed the House unanimously, as will be recollected by the Senator from Arkansas, who was then a member of the other House, and who was present on the occasion. When General Taylor came in, the question whether it should draw interest, according to the act of 1832, as all such claims did, was referred by the then Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Meredith, of Pennsylvania, who now, I believe, belongs to the Republican phalanx, to the Hon. Reverdy Johnson, a friend of mine then and now, as noble and true a man as lives on the face of the earth, who had been a counsel twenty years before he came there, and, without the least knowledge of who the parties concerned were, he decided that the interest was due. That is the history of Galphinism.

This cry I know has been the common slosh of party newspapers, but I did not expect to hear it in the Senate unless from a gentleman who knew enough about the claim to point out what was wrong in it, wherein it violated public principle. I voted for it, and I glory in it as an act of justice and right, not to my own constituents, but to the constituents of my honorable friend from South Carolina. Dr. Galphin, the executor, to whom the money was paid, lived in South Carolina, and it may be that some of the parties interested lived in Georgia. That the claim was a just debt, a part of the price of the Revolution, was unanimously decided by the Senate and House of Representatives, and approved by the President, and honestly decided by the Secretary of the Treasury and Attorney General of the United States. No man, I think, is prepared to controvert it—at least I am ready to take issue with any one that does. I repeat that whoever alludes to it by way of imputation, uses his privilege as a Senator to say what he is not ready to maintain outside.

Mr. HAMMOND. I merely wish to say, as this subject is referred to, that some twenty-odd years ago this claim was put in my charge as a member of the other House, and I investigated it thoroughly. Knowing the nature of the Galphin claim, and being acquainted with all the parties, I indorse entirely everything that has been said by the honorable Senator from Georgia in regard to it.

Mr. MALLORY. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. HUNTER. Let us sit out this, and finish the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. FOSTER in the chair.) The motion to adjourn is not debatable.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. MALLORY. I moved an adjournment, because we had come to a very singular discussion. On the question of reconsidering this bill for the purpose of compensating our reporters, we have got into a discussion of the merits of the Galphin claim.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is in the power of a Senator to make a point of order; but the Chair did not feel at liberty to arrest the discussion, though it was rather wide of the question.

Mr. MALLORY. Much has been said, Mr. President, about the circular of Mr. Rives, and the language in which it is couched. That is a question of taste. I regard the rules it lays down as well calculated to effect the object proposed—a faithful report of the debates of this body. The last clause announces a truism, which might as well have been left unsaid, namely, that there is no use in having rules unless you abide by them. Mr. Rives has mistaken the fact that he prescribes the rule, and not the Senate for itself. But I see nothing there to take offense at; and even if there were, what has that to do with the question before us—whether we shall pay our reporters what they earn, what their services are worth? Sir, I have been exceedingly surprised, frequently, at the accuracy of our reporters. I have taken some pains to ascertain the facts; and I believe they are the best reporters this day in the world. There are, to my certain knowledge, some three hundred and fifty systems of short-hand writing; and the system which is pursued here is, I am convinced, that which is best calculated to give accuracy to the reports; and by that system it requires no ordinary man to make a reporter. It requires a strength of intellect, a range of accomplishment, an experience and acquaintance with the business affairs of life, which not one reporter in ten thousand possesses. Here the three main reporters we have, have not only practiced this system by themselves, but practiced it with each other, so that each can read the others' marks. Not only have they done that, but they have acquired a familiarity with the style of different gentlemen here; with their intonations of voice; with their emphasis; with their manner; with their peculiarities of mind; and with the range of their mind, which enables them to report us with exceeding accuracy. This is a body mainly of lawyers; and we are frequently engaged in legal investigations. We had long treatises delivered to the Senate on national and commercial law, recently, upon the fisheries. During the Kansas debate, we sat up one entire night discussing the law of slavery and points of order, congressional law and parliamentary law. A few days ago, during the discussion of the cod-fishery question, I deemed it proper to make some few remarks, which amounted to three columns in the Globe. I saw none of the notes of the reporters; I asked for none. I did not see the report until two days afterwards; and I was surprised at the accuracy of everything in it.

Now, the question is, can we retain the best reporters when we have them at the compensation we are now giving them? Do they get enough to compensate them for their labors? Compare it with the compensation we give to others. We give our messengers $1,200; we give our clerks of committees, some of them, $1,850; we give our pages a large amount for their services; and these reporters, upon whom the reputations of many gentlemen more or less depend, are receiving less. The reporting for the present Congress, I understand, will amount to about twelve thousand dollars, or $6,000 a year, out of which the reporters and their assistants, copyists and amanuenses, must all be paid.

The report in to-day's Globe of yesterday's proceedings is, I think, unprecedented. You see there more than twenty-five columns reported. I do not recollect ever to have met in the history of the American Senate such a report as that. The reporters were employed from nine o'clock in the morning until four o'clock, some nineteen consecutive hours, in business connected with reporting and in preparing that report; and it was so done as to render it unnecessary for gentlemen to revise their remarks. Well, sir, when we have such reporters, it relieves members of the Senate of a great deal of labor; Senators are not anxious about looking at the reports; they can confide in them; but get an inaccurate set of men, a new set of reporters unfamiliar with this body, and you will find that almost every sentence you utter will be reported wrongly.

The Senator from California regretted that we had not adopted some more simple system, as he says, that of making a compendium; and the Senator from Georgia, too, regrets the publication of so much matter. Well, sir, I think if there be anything about the debates of Congress at all that is worth preserving, it is necessary to preserve nearly every word that is said. I do not say that it is necessary to print so many volumes and distribute them; but a record of a man's thoughts, and the motives of his actions, are precious to him, and they should be retained. If we look upon it in that light, we cannot dispense with good reporters. I think if gentlemen will inquire into the compensation paid to the reporters in the cities of New York and Philadelphia, paid to itinerant reporters who are sent to public assemblies and gatherings all over the world, who are the cheapest class of reporters, ours are inadequately paid.

Mr. TOOMBS. I ask the Senator whose duty it is to pay them under the contract?

Mr. MALLORY. I would ask the Senator the same question. If the Globe speaks correctly, whose duty was it to pay them before, when the increase was offered in former years?

Mr. TOOMBS. Do you show that the present compensation is inadequate?

Mr. MALLORY. I know the fact.

Mr. TOOMBS. Do you show that Rives does not get sufficient compensation for public printing to give his reporters fair wages?

Mr. MALLORY. Of public printing I know nothing; on that subject I am as ignorant as the gentleman himself; but I know what the reporters receive, and I know that in comparison with the compensation we pay others they are not compensated at all, and I know they can leave this body to-morrow, and get double what they now receive. I know that they have had offers to do so, and they will do it, unless they are compensated for their labor. I do not care for that; all I wish is to see that those who bear this important relation to us shall receive a fair equivalent for their labor.

As to Mr. Rives's statements, I believe them. I would believe Mr. Rives as soon as any man in Washington. If the life he has passed in Washington, as well known as he is, for some twenty-five years, more or less, connected with Congress, has not given him a reputation which will support him here in the simple statements he gives us in relation to this printing, then public reputation is not worth the strife of an honorable man. I would as soon take Mr. Rives's statements, unsworn to, made as a gentleman and a man of honor, as I would those of any other man of my acquaintance. Knowing the fact that we have repeatedly made attempts to have our debates reported accurately; that other gentlemen who have taken a contract to do it have had to resign it because they could not be compensated, I regard the pay we give to him as enabling him to allow no more to the reporters than he now gives, $4 50 a column, and reserve proper compensation to himself.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the Senate ready for the question on the motion to reconsider?

Mr. HUNTER. I hope the question will be taken.

Mr. PUGH called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 28, nays 16; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bell, Benjamin, Bigler, Broderick, Brown, Cameron, Chandler, Clark, Davis, Dixon, Doollittle, Fessenden, Foster, Green, Hamlin, Harlan, Houston, Iverson, Johnson of Tennessee, King, Mallory, Polk, Simmons, Stuart, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—38.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Bright, Clay, Clingman, Fitzpatrick, Gwin, Hammond, Hunter, Johnson of Arkansas, Mason, Pugh, Rice, Sebastian, Slidell, Toombs, and Yulee—16.

Mr. HUNTER. Is the bill now open to amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Not now. The engrossment must first be reconsidered.

Mr. HUNTER. I move to reconsider the engrossment.

The vote ordering the amendments to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time, was reconsidered.

Mr. HUNTER. I now move to strike out the provision which the House have made, giving $800 to each of their reporters. The amendment is from line one hundred and thirty-one to one hundred and thirty-seven inclusive, to strike out the following words:

"For the usual additional compensation to the reporters for the Congressional Globe, for reporting the proceedings of the House of Representatives for the next regular session of the Thirty-Fifth Congress, $800 to each reporter, $4,000."

It is not my purpose to make any speech about it. The whole matter has been discussed. I hope the question will be taken. Let us determine whether we shall strike it out. That will make the two Houses equal.

Mr. PUGH. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion.

Mr. BROWN. I want to say a word before that vote is taken.

Mr. HAMLIN. Let me make a suggestion to the Senator himself, and it is this: before we take the question on striking out these words, it is parliamentary to perfect them, and let us see whether we cannot insert our friends here.

Mr. BROWN. That is just what I am going to do. When we had up the deficiency bill, the Senator from Virginia took precisely this course. An amendment, a copy of which I have in my hand now, to the original deficiency bill was ruled out, and I had a sort of quasi promise from the Senator from Virginia, that if the House insisted upon paying their reporters, then that ours were to be put upon the same footing. It was not done. Now, before this motion passes to strike out, I insist upon what I insisted on doing then: that we vote our amendment in, and, then, if you choose to strike it all out let it be done; but I want to file a caveat with the committee of conference, if it comes to that, that we mean to protect our own reporters. Therefore, I want to get the amendment in protecting our reporters so as to notify the committee of conference, however it may be composed, that we mean to put our reporters on the same footing with the House reporters. I insist, again, that it is degrading to our reporters, for the Senate to agree, as we do when we pass laws by the joint action of the two Houses, that they shall receive $800 each less than the House reporters.

Mr. HUNTER. The Senator is mistaken in supposing that he had any promise from me in relation to the matter.

Mr. BROWN. I so understood it. I put it on that ground, and I understood there was acquiescence in it; that if the amendment was not adopted, the committee of conference on the part of the Senate would take care of our reporters. The broad principle I have stated again and again, that it is degrading to our reporters that we allow the House to pay their reporters $800 more than we pay our own, by a bill for which we vote. I want to put an amendment in, placing our reporters upon the same footing with the House reporters. If they insist that we can get the bill upon no terms except that their reporters are paid, then let ours be paid the same compensation. Therefore, I hope this motion to strike out, just at this time, will be withdrawn, until I can offer this amendment, or have it voted down, and then we can take the motion to strike out all together. I believe I have a right to perfect it. Then I offer this amendment. After line one hundred and thirty-seven to insert:

To enable John C. Rives to pay to the reporters of the Senate the usual extra compensation for the third session of the Thirty-Fourth Congress, $800 each, $3,200.

To enable John C. Rives to pay to the reporters of the Senate the usual extra compensation for the first session of the Thirty-Fifth Congress, $800 each, $3,200.

To enable John C. Rives to pay to the reporters of the Senate the usual extra compensation for the second session of the Thirty-Fifth Congress, $800 each, $3,200.

Mr. HUNTER. I will ask if this comes from any committee? There is a rule in regard to that matter, I see. This is for deficiencies, not only to go forward, but to go back. I ask if it comes from a committee?

Mr. BROWN. I do not move it on the recommendation of any committee, but I do it because it is germane to the subject. It is a part of the same proposition. I leave it to the Senate to determine whether I shall move the proposition or not.

Mr. IVERSON. Is that amendment in order now?

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FOSTER.) There is no amendment that would be in order now. This is proposed as an amendment to an amendment, which must be acted upon.

Mr. IVERSON. I will read the rule, if the Chair pleases. I think the amendment is clearly out of order. Rule 30 is:

"No amendment proposing additional appropriations shall be received to any general appropriation bill, unless it be made to carry out the provisions of some existing law, or some act or resolution previously passed by the Senate during that session, or moved by direction of a standing or select committee of the Senate, or in pursuance of an estimate from the head of some of the Departments."

That is the rule on the subject. I think an individual member cannot move the amendment.

Mr. BROWN. With all deference to the Senator, I make this suggestion: that this is simply an amendment to increase an appropriation already proposed in the bill; it is not a new and original proposition. I do not bring in a new proposition. I simply propose to increase the amount of the appropriation to pay the corps of reporters; and, if it be said that we must vote in the absence of a proposition which comes from a committee or a Department, without the power to lessen it or to increase it, then we had better give up the whole business of legislation to the committees and to the Departments. I do not propose anything new; but you already have a proposition in the bill to pay a portion of the corps of reporters, and I simply propose to add something to the amount—that is all—to amend an already existing proposition in the bill. I grant you that I have no power to bring in an entirely new subject without the consent of a committee, or without a recommendation from a Department; but this does not stand on that basis.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is manifest that there is a very considerable majority of the Senate in favor of this proposition; and I really think the Senator from Virginia had better withdraw his objections on a mere point of order.

Mr. HUNTER. I have no right to withdraw a point of order. It is for the Chair to decide.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think in a little time a committee can be found who would recommend it; and I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. BROWN. I hope the Senator will allow me—

Mr. FESSENDEN. If it is excluded on the point of order, you cannot put it in.

Mr. BROWN. Then I will vote for an adjournment.

Mr. TOOMBS. I hope not; let us get through with the bill.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I appeal to the honorable Senator from Virginia to withdraw the objection, on the ground of a question of order, and to allow the sense of the Senate to be taken.

Mr. HUNTER. What right have I to withdraw a question of order? The matter of order has been forced by the rules. It does not depend on me whether the rules of the Senate shall be enforced or not.

Mr. KING. I desire to ask the Senator from Virginia a question. Does he suppose that it is not competent for a member to move to increase or diminish an appropriation in a bill?

Mr. HUNTER. He cannot move to increase it unless the increase be recommended by a committee, or an estimate from the head of a Department.

Mr. BROWN. If the point of order is insisted upon, I move to refer the proposition which I have just introduced to the Committee on the District of Columbia. I think we can settle it by to-morrow morning.

Mr. HUNTER. If the Senate choose they can overrule the point. The Chair has not decided yet.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has not decided the point, but was about to suggest that he would take the opinion of the Senate on the question of order.

Mr. BIGLER. Let that be a test.

35TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Legislative, etc., Appropriation Bill—Mr. Pugh.

SENATE.

Mr. DAVIS. I think the point of order is not applicable to the amendment moved by my colleague. There is a law which is found in your appropriation act, for reporting the debates of the Senate, and, under that law, he merely moves to increase the compensation, if you please to change the form of the compensation. It is a mere question of dollars and cents. He is introducing, as he says, no new subject, but under cover of law is merely proposing to change the amount of compensation.

Mr. TOOMBS. I take issue with the Senator from Mississippi. There is no law paying these reporters, and there never was a law for it.

Mr. DAVIS. The law is for reporting the debates of the Senate.

Mr. TOOMBS. Yes, sir.

Mr. DAVIS. And the mode of compensation is to pay the printer a gross sum. Now you may change the mode of compensation certainly under that law for reporting your debates. You may pay your reporters a certain sum, and the printers a certain sum.

Mr. TOOMBS. I submit that the Senator is in error. A contract to do a certain job of public work with one man cannot be changed in this way by paying money to another. That is the case here. We have got a contract with one man that he shall pay all the expenses of printing and reporting. The Senator says that under that law we can pay anybody else.

Mr. DAVIS. If the contract were made so that it could not be changed prospectively, if it were a contract which bound the Senate to the expenditures of the present and second session of this Congress, then I think the Senator would be right; but if the contract be one which we make with the printer for a certain work, and we now propose for this session and for the next session of this Congress to pay an additional sum, it is a variation of the contract, which we have a right to make.

Mr. TOOMBS. We have a law to pay Mr. Rives for this work, and now it is proposed, in violation of that law, to pay other persons for it. That is exactly the point of order, free from all ambiguity. We have hired one man and agreed to pay him. There is another more specific law than the one which the Senator from Arkansas read, but that is sufficient for me. By that law we do not pay for reporting specially, but for reporting and printing, $7 50 a column. That has been increased by adding to the number of copies of the book you take, and by giving a cent for five pages. Now, it is proposed, in violation of that law, and without the least authority of law, to pay persons who are not our employees, or in other words to pay persons unknown to that law for the discharge of this work.

Mr. HUNTER. So far as I am concerned, I will not interpose the question of order against the sense of the Senate. My opinion is unchanged; but I will not press it.

Mr. TOOMBS. I renew the point of order.

Mr. PUGH. So do I.

Mr. STUART. I wish to have the amendment read, as I understand it is to pay the same person.

The Secretary read: "To enable John C. Rives to pay"—

Mr. STUART. That is enough.

Mr. TOOMBS. That, I think, is within the express rule of the Senate to increase salaries. My friend from Virginia is familiar with the rule; you cannot raise salaries without the report of a committee.

Mr. HUNTER. You cannot offer an amendment increasing an appropriation, except on the recommendation of a committee or the estimate of a Department.

Mr. TOOMBS. That is the rule as to the increase of the salaries of officers recognized by law. The rule is clear and plain. Gentlemen, no doubt, will get over it in some way; but I simply want to have it settled, so that we may know what the rule is.

Mr. BROWN. I hope the Senate will allow this amendment of mine to be referred to a committee, and that then we shall adjourn and we can settle it in the morning.

Several SENATORS. Pass it now.

Mr. BROWN. I am willing to do that, and I think there is a clear majority of the Senate in favor of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state the question to the Senate. The Senator from Virginia proposed to amend the bill by striking out certain words, which he specified. Before taking the question on that motion, the Senator from Mississippi moved to add certain words to the clause proposed to be stricken out, in order to perfect it before taking the question on striking it out. The Senator from Virginia, and other Senators, have made a point of order, whether the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi is in order. The Chair is about to submit that question to the Senate to be decided.

Mr. TOOMBS. I ask for the yeas and nays on that question of order. I want to see this settled regularly as a precedent.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is whether the amendment to the amendment shall be received—whether it is obnoxious to the point of order which has been raised?

Mr. WADE. I am satisfied that we shall not get the question this evening. ["Yes, we shall."] It is out of fashion to finish anything here. We get very near it, and go no further. I do not expect that we shall finish anything until the last night of the session; and I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to; there being, on a division—yeas 15, nays 26.

Mr. BROWN. I hope the Chair will state the proposition, so that Senators will comprehend it. The form I take to be this: will the Senate receive the amendment? In that form, everybody understands how to vote.

Mr. TOOMBS. I hope not. The question of order, which is made, is that it is contrary to the rules of the Senate to receive the amendment.

Mr. BROWN. How will you take the question?

Mr. TOOMBS. The Chair has determined to submit that question of order, and the question to be submitted is: is it according to the rules of the Senate to receive the amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state the question as he supposes it to stand.

Mr. DAVIS. I understand the point of the objection is to increasing the sum to be paid for reporting for the Senate. The objection is that my colleague had no right, not speaking for a committee and not having the estimate of a Department, to propose an amendment which was in aid of the execution of the law for reporting and printing the debates of the Senate. It does not matter whether his purpose is to direct the payment of a certain portion of this money to the reporters of the Senate. I do not think it would vary his right to present the amendment if it were to provide for paying a certain sum to the reporter and another certain sum to the printer. It would still come under the general provision of reporting the debates of the Senate.

Mr. TOOMBS. I wish this question understood, and not got round. Of course I know where it is going to. This is a clear equivocation. Can the Senate receive any amendment out of order? Otherwise, why make such a question as this? The Senate voting for it is receiving it. You get rid of your rules entirely by the mode proposed by the Senator from Mississippi. An amendment is moved which the Senator from Virginia says is contrary to the rules and orders of the Senate. It is the rule that the Chair shall first decide such a question, and that then an appeal may be taken from his decision. Now, it is suggested, however, that the Chair put the question whether the Senate will receive the amendment. Has the Senate a right to receive it out of order?

Mr. BROWN. I understood the Chair to propose himself to submit the question. I only suggested the form in which it should be done.

Mr. TOOMBS. I want to put the form so as to get at the substance. I know what Senators want. It is to get in this amendment without being bound by the precedent. I wish the Senate to decide whether this amendment is in order, so that there may be one rule which shall govern the body in all its transactions. This is nothing but honesty and fair dealing. I wish the question submitted to the Senate whether this amendment be in order or out of order; not whether they will receive it. Everybody can see the folly of putting the question in that way; because, if the Senate vote for an amendment, that vote receives it, and thus the point of order could never arise. The question of order is to defeat the majority of the Senate, who wish to violate their own rules. The object of the rules is to prevent a majority from doing what they want to do out of order. I simply ask—the Senator from Virginia having raised the question of order, but he having withdrawn it, and my friend from Ohio and myself having renewed it—that there shall be no indirection in this matter; that the question of order shall be stood up to and voted upon. I have no doubt the Senate will vote me down; but I want it done directly. I think it is right to have it done directly; and I think that gentlemen in their eagerness to do this thing should not care about how it may stand in their way in the future. I have an amendment here myself. ["Question! question!"] Never mind calling the question yet. You will not have it before I am ready. I have an amendment which I may wish to offer. It has not got the sanction of a committee; but it is very important to the public. It is to carry out some experiment made in reference to the coins of the United States, and is recommended by the Treasury Department; but has not been before a committee, owing, perhaps, to my own neglect. If it is in order without coming from a committee, I desire to move that amendment to one section of the bill. I simply ask the majority to do this thing decently, and in order.

Mr. STUART. I suppose it will be unquestionably admitted that the Chair will put the question to the Senate in such form as he thinks is right, governed by his own judgment; and I only rise for the purpose of saying that since I have had the honor of a seat in this body, a question of this kind has always been put in this form: Will the Senate receive the amendment? The question has been put a great many times in my presence, and always in this form; and I think the honorable Senator from Virginia will say so. It is a question of order, it is true; but that is the form in which it was always put.

Mr. PUGH. The objection which was made by the Senator from Virginia, and renewed by the Senator from Georgia and myself, is that this proposition is in violation of the standing rules of the Senate. In my judgment, it is in open, unequivocal violation of those rules, and that question is made to the Presiding Officer of this body. If he decides that it is in order, I shall appeal from his decision; and then I ask of the Senate the question, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate? How is it proposed to circumvent my right as a Senator to appeal from the decision of the Presiding Officer? Why, sir, it is proposed to put the question to the Senate, not whether the amendment is in order, but whether the Senate will receive it in order or out of order? What are your rules worth? You must give one day's notice before you can amend a rule of this body. If any Senator rises to-day and moves to amend a rule, I have a right, individually, to insist that it shall go over twenty-four hours; and why does the majority undertake to trample on my right to insist that there shall be twenty-four hours' delay before the rules of this body are altered? Therefore I say—whatever may have been the usage heretofore I do not know and I do not care—the question which the Senate is to decide and put on its record, and to which I shall refer hereafter, is whether or not this amendment is in order under its rules? I say it is out of order, and this is an attempt to violate the right of every Senator on this floor to insist that the rules shall not be changed under less than twenty-four hours' notice.

Now, sir, is it pretended that because the House of Representatives have sent to us a bill appropriating money to a certain class of individuals, therefore we can appropriate to another class of individuals? Is it pretended that because, by law, or by usage, or by resolution, we have given one man $1,000 a year, therefore any Senator can move to increase it to $3,000 a year? Is it pretended that because, by law, the salary of the President of the United States is $25,000 a year, 1, as a Senator, can move, on this bill, to give him $100,000 a year? What is the object of your rule? It is to prevent legislation, at the end of a session, in this hurried manner; to require the safeguard of an estimate; to require the recommendation of a standing committee. But, sir, I do not know that it is worth while to urge this matter. I see that this amendment is to pass, and I do not believe that all the rules that ever were made will stand in the way of it.

Mr. BAYARD. I trust the Senate will rather adjourn than violate so plain a rule of order as must be violated if we receive this proposition. I am aware that the Senate is impatient, and I shall not say more than a word or two. At the same time, I deprecate the idea that under an immediate excitement connected with a trivial measure, in some respects, a great general rule of the Senate should be violated. I am in favor of the proposition on its coming properly before the Senate. I agree that the reporters of the Senate are entitled, properly—not because a different course degrades them, but because it degrades ourselves in not doing justice to them—to the same compensation you give for similar labor in the House of Representatives. I agree to that; but for all that, or for any purpose, I am not willing to introduce a precedent which violates so plainly the order of the Senate, and puts down entirely every rule or regulation you have, at the mere will of a majority. I must vote against the proposition to receive the amendment.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I am in favor of the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi; but I do not think, with my understanding of the rules, that it is in order, and I shall be bound to vote against receiving it. I believe the rules, as the Senator from Georgia has said, are made for minorities; and if majorities are to set them aside they will do no good. Majorities need no rules. They are for the benefit of the minority; and if it is insisted upon, therefore, that a question of order is to be made, I move that the Senate adjourn; and let this amendment come from a committee.

Mr. HUNTER. Let us finish it.

The motion was agreed to; there being, on a division—ayes 25, noes 15; and the Senate adjourned.

DE VISSER AND VILLARUBIA—CUSTOM-HOUSE FRAUDS AT NEW ORLEANS.

DEBATE IN THE SENATE, FRIDAY, May 14, 1858.

Mr. HUNTER's motion to reconsider the vote passing the bill for the relief of Simon De Visser and José Villarubia, of New Orleans, having been agreed to—

Mr. SLIDELL. I have no disposition at all to enter into any discussion of the merits of this case. I merely wish to present a fact for the consideration of the Senate that I think will be conclusive with the majority. The purpose of the bill is to relieve Messrs. De Visser & Co. from all penalties and forfeitures incurred in consequence of fraudulent invoices of some sugar that was entered at New Orleans. I am inclined to think, in fact I am willing to concede from an examination of the testimony, that the now members of that house, the other partners of the house, were entirely innocent of all fraudulent intention; that they were the victims of a misplaced confidence in one of their partners. I shall now only move to postpone the further consideration of this bill until December next, and I will state very briefly the reasons that induce me to do so.

A full investigation of this case was had in the district court of the United States at New Orleans. De Visser & Co. were large importers of sugars and other merchandise from Havana to the port of New Orleans. There is no imputation upon the good faith of the larger portion of the members of the firm; their character is not impeached. But a person of the name of Métiéye, a full partner in the concern, having, it is true, but a small share in the profits—I think some fifteen or sixteen per cent. in lieu of salary—was employed to transact their custom-house business. A discovery was made, almost accidentally, that an invoice of two hundred boxes of sugar, which, it appeared afterwards, had been fabricated in New Orleans, was a forgery, by a simple substitution of one set of figures for another, by carrying out a false multiplication. The amount of the invoice on which duty was to be charged was reduced very considerably, so as to make on that single importation a difference of some two thousand dollars. This discovery was not made until some weeks, or perhaps months, after the entry of the sugar; and the sugar had been discharged and had passed into the warehouses of these gentlemen. When the discovery was made, the sugar was seized; all the facts were submitted to a jury, and a verdict in favor of the claimants of the sugar was rendered. If the sugar had been seized on board ship, the case would have been on the admiralty side of the district court, and there would have been no intervention of a jury. Be that as it may, the law officer at New Orleans, and his superiors here, think that the charge of the court to the jury, which probably caused their decision in this case, is obnoxious to very grave objections in point of law, and they have appealed from the decision of the district court to the circuit court, which sits, I think (my colleague can inform me, for he is more familiar with the details) towards the end of this month; or, at any rate, in the beginning of June. If the decision of the circuit court should affirm that of the district court, I shall have nothing further to say on this subject. It involves a very great principle.

The fraud which was the subject of controversy in the particular case that I have alluded to, was but one of a series of frauds, extending back for some two or three years, including some thirty or forty entries, if I mistake not, and involving a loss of revenue, if they had not been discovered, of twenty or thirty thousand dollars. The partner who made these entries at the custom-house, charged the firm with the full amount of the duties that ought to have been levied on the invoices; but by a fraudulent change in the invoices he was enabled to enter the goods at a much lower rate of duty, and he pocketed the difference between the amount which ought to have been paid, and the amount which was actually paid under these fraudulent invoices. It does not appear, I am willing to admit, that Messrs. De Visser and Villarubia, the remaining partners in the firm, had any cognizance of these frauds, or in any degree profited by the perjury and fraud of their partner; but it is a very grave question whether a commercial house is not responsible, morally, if it is not legally, to the Government for the acts of its partners, however innocent its other members may have been of any participation in them. That is the question. That question is to be submitted to the circuit court of the United States, and will be decided in a few weeks.

I admit the case is a very hard one. These gentlemen for a time suffered in reputation and character from the act of a dishonest partner; but I have a letter here from the district attorney—I will not occupy the time of the Senate in reading it—in which he points out exceptions to the charge of the district court to the jury, which I think tenable and well founded; but at any rate this case being now on appeal to the circuit court, and very soon about to be decided, involving very grave questions of law and a large amount of money—because the claim against De Visser & Co., I think, amounts to $200,000 for various penalties and forfeitures—I consider it but right that the question should be submitted to the action of that court. If it should be decided by that court that these gentlemen are in no sense legally or morally responsible for the act of their partner, I certainly shall have no disposition to contest any measure of relief that may be brought forward, however early at the next session of Congress; but for the moment I think we should at least let this matter be considered by the appellate court. I will not enter into any discussion as to the particular facts of the case, but I move now to postpone the further consideration of the bill until the first Monday in December next. If that motion shall fail, I will then state to the Senate all the circumstances of the case, and dispute the bill upon its merits.

Mr. TOOMBS. I oppose the postponement of this case. It was referred to the Committee on Commerce, of which I am a member, and submitted by that committee to me. The facts are full, clear, and distinct beyond all sort of question, and I suppose the main difficulty is as to the amount of forfeiture of which the custom-house officers, and probably the clerks themselves by whose omission these transactions occurred, are to be beneficiaries.

Mr. SLIDELL. In order to relieve the Senator from any embarrassment on that score, I will state that probably I should have known nothing of this case, and should not have thought proper to interpose if the officers of the custom-house had not called my attention to it.

Mr. TOOMBS. I had no doubt whatever it was a question of forfeiture with clerks who are endeavoring to visit these heavy penalties on gentlemen, whom the evidence taken before a judicial tribunal shows to be entirely innocent, to justify themselves for their own gross neglect. Any Senator who will read the petition in this case cannot doubt for an instant as to what ought to be done. It seems that these two gentlemen, Messrs. De Visser and Villarubia, bought out a concern then existing in New Orleans, as importers of sugars. The old house had a clerk who had attended to the business of passing their commodities through the custom-house. The new firm took him in at the rate of one eighth. He was really a clerk, but they gave him a compensation of one eighth of the profits, and afterwards carried it to fifteen per cent., his whole duty being to attend to the entries of the custom-house, he being acquainted with the language in which the original invoices were drawn, and familiar with custom-house business. They dealt to a very large amount through the custom-house. It is in evidence before the judicial tribunal which tried the case that these gentlemen paid to their clerk every dollar of the amount of duties due according to the correct invoices, that they checked for it, and that he went to the bank and drew the money, then went to the custom-house where he committed the frauds. In some cases they were done by the simple running out of figures, which would have been detected but for the carelessness of the officers of the Government. By a simple mistake in the figures in turning the Spanish money into our money he would oftentimes fitch three, four, or five hundred dollars. This went on for three or four years by the grossest negligence of the officers of the United States themselves—these very clerks who are pressing the forfeitures. The evidence supporting this claim is all before me judicially settled—it is not in pais—and I will read the decision of the commissioner and the statement of the district attorney. This man, as I said, who is charged as a full partner, had but a special duty to perform, that of passing the invoices and paying the duties, and it turns out upon examination of the evidence before the court, and by the examination of the books of these gentlemen, who seem to be as honorable merchants as their fellows from all account, that they paid every dime of the legal duties. They checked for the money and he drew it out of the bank, and by the negligence of the officers of the Government he was allowed to steal on single invoices sometimes two hundred, sometimes three hundred dollars, and again would force invoices instead of giving the true ones, thereby cheating the Government out of large amounts of duty.

When this was discovered at the custom-house, the officers did not communicate with this house; but knowing that he was in this scrape, and having confessed it to the officers of the Government, they allowed him to remain two or three days without communicating the facts to the other partners, gave him an opportunity to run away, which he did, and then arrested these two gentlemen for frauds on the United States. The case went through a thorough examination, and I will read to the Senate the admissions of the commissioner of the United States and the district attorney:

"The district attorney waiving all opposition or reply to the appeal of the defense, the commissioner said he was prepared to pronounce his opinion promptly; that he could see no evidence and no circumstance implicating the gentlemen, as they were charged in the transactions of Métiéye; and, at the request of the defense, he promised to give a written certificate to that effect for the satisfaction of the gentlemen.

"The district attorney then said, that now, as the case was fairly closed, he felt it incumbent on him, in justice to the gentlemen accused, as well as to the cause of truth, to express his entire concurrence in the decision of the commissioner. The examination, he was free to say, had resulted as he had believed it would, though he was un-by a sense of duty to the Government, to prosecute the matter thus far. He was gratified to find that his own private convictions were so completely demonstrated to be correct as they were by the result of the examination."

They had no participation in the frauds. They paid the correct amount of duties according to the original invoices. The frauds were committed by this man, who received fifteen per cent. of the profits, as clerk's hire, for doing this business, instead of a standing salary, he having belonged to the old house whom they purchased out, and recommended by that house to them, and not knowing anything of his character more than that. Subsequently the leading merchants of New Orleans appointed a committee to examine the books of those gentlemen, and I will read what they say.

Mr. SLIDELL. Allow me to suggest to the Senator from Georgia that I think I have admitted that there is no shadow of suspicion attaching to the character of these gentlemen, and I think, that point being conceded, he may pass it over.

Mr. TOOMBS. I want to show that the carelessness was with the Government, and that therefore the Government ought not to insist on these extraordinary penalties. They have seized a cargo of sugar, not for the duties owing to the Government, but for forfeitures to the amount of hundreds of thousands of dollars, when the duties were but a few thousand. They sue for forfeitures for the benefit of clerks in the custom-house, when the whole fraud was produced by their own carelessness; and this opposition, as the Senator very frankly concedes, comes from them. They are the people who are seeking the forfeiture to increase their pay, when it was the neglect of these very officers that allowed the frauds to be perpetrated.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Allow me to suggest that I have only one possible doubt about the matter, and that doubt arises from my ignorance of the law governing the case. This appears to have been a very large seizure; and I suppose, if the property be condemned, the custom-house officers will be entitled to a certain proportion.

Mr. TOOMBS. One half.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If Congress remits the penalties, will they not have any possible claim at all?

Mr. TOOMBS. None whatever.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not know the law on that point.

Mr. HAMLIN. If they do not recover the penalties they will not get any portion.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Has there not been a condemnation?

Mr. BENJAMIN. Not at all. These parties do not go into the question whether they are legally responsible; but they say it is a very cruel thing to have such a suit pending against them even if it is a legal liability.

Mr. FESSENDEN. What is the shape of this bill?

Mr. BENJAMIN. To discharge them from the pending suits. One suit has already been decided in their favor, but there is an appeal.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If a man recognized as their agent committed the fraud, it would not be right that the Government should lose the amount of the duties.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Oh, no; that is not provided.

Mr. TOOMBS. The Government loses nothing.

Mr. MALLORY. The Senator from Maine anticipated me. I desire to ask what the rights of the seizing officers are, in case of seizure? If a forfeiture had taken place, they would undoubtedly have had a portion of the proceeds, and it would have been beyond the power of the Treasury Department to release that portion coming to them. Have they any such rights now, while the prosecution of the suit is going on?

Mr. TOOMBS. No; and that is the importance of passing the bill now—that they shall not have. They have got none now.

Mr. SLIDELL. Under certain circumstances, for certain violations of the revenue laws, the Secretary of the Treasury has a right to remit; but he has no right to remit in this case. The forfeiture has either accrued, or it has not. If it has, it seems to me there is a vested right in these officers to the extent of their interest in the seizure, of which Congress cannot divest them by legislation. I submit that point to the consideration of the Senator from Georgia. The Secretary unquestionably can remit a penalty; and in remitting it, as regards the United States, he has a right to say that the custom-house officers shall be entitled to no share of any forfeiture that may be made; but this is a very different question; I am inclined to think, a new one. If there be any rights vested in these officers by the seizure, which the Secretary cannot remit, I doubt whether, by any constitutional action of Congress, the rights of officers of the custom-house can be divested.

Mr. TOOMBS. There is no difficulty whatever in the suggestion of the Senator from Louisiana. There is no vested right in forfeitures by anybody. I take it the Senator will find that to be a universal principle of law; one practiced upon by this Government from the beginning. There is no such thing as a vested right in a forfeiture until there is a judgment of a court adjudicating the forfeiture. That is a universal principle; and there are cases running through your whole system of revenue laws showing it. The importance of present action is to defeat these very people who are attempting to obtain these forfeitures. The custom-house officers, for a series of years, by the greatest negligence—which would ordinarily amount to a connivance at fraud—allowed this proceeding to be carried on; and now they want the amount of the forfeiture, not the Government debt. The Government became satisfied that cruel injustice was done to these honest men, who had been imposed upon by their own clerk, and yet seek to obtain from them two or three hundred thousand dollars of a forfeiture. I will read—for it is important—the certificate of a committee appointed by the leading merchants of New Orleans on this subject. The books of these gentlemen were examined by a committee; and I beg the indulgence of the Senate while I read the results of that examination:

"At the request of Messrs. S. De Visser & Co., the undersigned have examined the above extracts* from the books of their firm, and on examining the statement and comparing its several items with the check books of S. De Visser & Co. on the Canal Bank and other banks, their cash book, invoice book, journal and ledger, and whatever other books and vouchers we deemed it proper to call for, the following facts are apparent to the undersigned:

"1. That for every amount in the above statement charged as deposited against entries, they produce the corresponding check duly paid and canceled by the bank on which it was drawn.

"2. That the amounts of such deposits as set forth above, correspond, in every instance, with the amount of invoices to which they relate, as their invoice book and the copies of the original invoices received by them from Havana, as far as they are in their possession, clearly show.

"3. That the items of 'excess of duties,' returned by the custom-house, in the above statement, correspond with certain memoranda in their possession, preserved by them, and which are in the handwriting of Charles Métyé.

"4. That the invoices in their invoice book, journal, and ledger, are charged with the same amounts as those named 'ascertained duties,' in the said statement.

"5. That the profits on their invoices have been duly carried to their profit and loss account.

"6. That their books are kept in the most regular and correct manner, and bear every indication of honesty and fair dealing.

"From this examination, the undersigned conclude, that they give full credit to the above statement, as furnishing a true and correct account of the course pursued by Messrs. De Visser and Villarubia, with reference to the duties on merchandise to which it refers. That the memoranda from Métyé of the sums set forth in the foregoing statement as 'excess of duties returned by the custom-house,' was well calculated to induce them to believe that Métyé, to whom the actual duties had been intrusted, had honestly used them in the payment of the duties justly due. That the books show clearly that Messrs. De Visser and Villarubia could not have intended to defraud the Government of its duties, and that the manner in which they have been kept, and their entries made, entirely negative any such suspicion.

"And, in conclusion, the undersigned cheerfully bear testimony to the commercial and social standing of Messrs. De Visser and Villarubia, to their honor, integrity and probity; and cannot permit themselves, for an instant, to believe that they would lend themselves to the commission of the frauds with which their names have been so, unfortunately, and, as we believe, so unjustly connected."

That is signed by the leading importing houses of New Orleans, including, I believe, every one of character in the city. According to the testimony of the commissioner and district attorney of the United States, and all the merchants who inspected their books, there were never more honest, fair, or correct books kept by any merchants.

* These extracts were the statements copied from the books of all the custom-house entries.

Every dollar was paid by them according to the true amount of the invoices. They paid the money to this clerk, who cheated the Government by running the Spanish reals out into dollars. He would cheat the Government two or three hundred dollars on every invoice, and the custom-house officers could have detected it in a moment, if they had made the calculation as they ought to have done.

Mr. POLK. I should like to be distinctly informed whether this house of De Visser & Co. have paid the duties to which the Government was really entitled, or whether the only thing in controversy is the penalties on the seizure at the custom-house?

Mr. BENJAMIN. The Government had the choice of suing for the duties as a debt, or for the forfeitures. Instead of claiming from this house the back duties, they have preferred to sue for the forfeiture of the entire invoices imported for a series of years, and commenced suit against them for over three hundred thousand dollars. They could not sue for both at once, and they have preferred to sue for the forfeiture of the invoices.

Mr. POLK. I understand that the house of De Visser & Co. have actually parted with the true amount of the duties.

Mr. TOOMBS and Mr. BENJAMIN. Every dollar.

Mr. POLK. And the fraudulent contrivance, by which the United States got less than they were entitled to, was one of which this Métyé, the clerk, got the advantage.

Mr. SLIDELL. A partner.

Mr. TOOMBS. I have stated the partnership. He was made a partner, first at one eighth, and then at fifteen per cent, as a mere compensation. That was the evidence.

Mr. SLIDELL. I wish to ask whether it was not in the power of these gentlemen to have deposited in court the amount of duties short paid, which they acknowledged to be due to the United States; and whether they have done so or not? and whether, by possibility, the consequences of this act may not be to release De Visser and Villarubia altogether from any debt to the United States, when it appears that the United States have been defrauded to the amount of twenty or thirty thousand dollars by their agent?

Mr. TOOMBS. The last question, I can answer very fully, and it is the only one important to the case. This bill does not discharge them from any debt due the United States; and if the Senator thinks it does, he can put it in such a shape as will prevent any such thing. There is not the least difficulty on that point. The bill does nothing but discharge them from suits for forfeitures, not only for the goods that were seized, but for sugars, on which duties had been paid years before. Under the extraordinary circumstances of this case, the frauds having been committed by the clerk of these parties, the Government has chosen to bring suit against them for the forfeiture of all sugar they had ever imported in regard to which there was fraud by the clerk. The effect of this bill is to release them from this forfeiture. The debt of the Government I have no doubt is open.

Mr. SLIDELL. Why is it not paid?

Mr. TOOMBS. I do not know. The case was presented to me as a member of the Committee on Commerce; that was the first time I ever knew of it. I took the case as presented, and as it has been judicially determined. I know nothing about it except as the facts disclosed in the testimony show, not having the pleasure of knowing the parties.

Mr. POLK. The Senator from Georgia says the bill is intended merely to release them from the payment of forfeitures.

Mr. TOOMBS. Yes, sir; it provides that the suits shall be dismissed on payment of costs.

Mr. POLK. I am inclined to think the bill may have a construction a little broader than that. Mr. TOOMBS. The Senator can add an amendment, providing for the payment of duties, though I think that would be a hard requirement. The non-payment of the full amount of duty resulted entirely from the fraud of this man, whom the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. SLIDELL] calls a partner. He was, it is true, nominally a partner, to take one eighth of the profits for doing his duty.

35TH CONG....1ST SESS.

De Visser and Villarubia—Mr. Slidell.

SENATE.

It was a clerk's duty. Afterwards, on account of his fidelity, as they believed, they raised his compensation to fifteen per cent. on the profits. He had no capital, but instead of giving him a standing salary as clerk, they gave him a contingent interest in the profits of the concern. He had no other duty to do but this particular one of passing goods through the custom-house, and they took him on the recommendation of the parties whom they bought out, who testified to his ability, fidelity, and good character. He discharged this duty for the firm whom they bought out for many years, without the least suspicion attaching to him. No men have acted with more caution, more prudence, more honor, or more integrity, than these gentlemen. These are not ex parte statements, but they have undergone judicial investigation, and the words used by the commissioner of the United States, and the district attorney, fully justify what I have said.

Mr. SIMMONS. I hope the Senator from Georgia will agree to allow this bill to lie over until to-morrow. If he will agree to have the Government secured in the payment of the amount actually due, I shall not object to the bill. I suppose he will not pretend that these men are not responsible for the act of their partner.

Mr. TOOMBS. Not at all.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not want to enforce a forfeiture, because I think there is a fair showing that this man was a rogue, and that they confided in him; but I would not permit them to get rid of the amount they actually owe the Government.

Mr. TOOMBS. I shall not object to such an amendment, though, according to my judgment, I would relieve them even from that. I think the bill, in its present shape, does not touch that question. I do not think it right to require them to pay these duties over again, because the frauds would not have happened if the Government officers had not been to blame. If the clerks in the custom-house had made the calculations turning the reals into our money, they might have known what the duties were. The Government officers took this clerk's statements, when the slightest attention on their part would have enabled them to detect the fraud. But, for the grossest negligence of the worthless people who are generally kept about custom-houses, the thing could not have happened three times without detection. Some of the invoices, it is true, were forgeries; but most of the frauds were in the mere running out of the calculations. If the Senate differ with me, and say these parties shall be liable to duties, at all events, let the Senate put in an amendment requiring the duties to be paid.

The petition exhibits the facts as they were tried before the court. Here is the ample testimony of the judge who tried it, of the late district attorney, and the present district attorney, and of all the importing merchants of the city of New Orleans, as to the integrity of the transaction on the part of these gentlemen. The proof is that the Government officers knew all about the frauds two days before they communicated with the partners, and gave this man an opportunity to flee the country, and after having done that, they bring a suit against these gentlemen for forfeitures. I think the course of the Government officers against them has been extremely hard.

Mr. SIMMONS. I never like to mulct anybody in damages for the fault of a partner, but I think it would be better to let this bill lie over for the present.

Mr. TOOMBS. There is importance in carrying it now.

Mr. SIMMONS. Not this day.

Mr. SLIDELL. The Senator from Georgia has entered somewhat into the merits of the claim upon the question of the postponement, which should have been answered by itself. I shall not reply to the attacks, I think rather harsh, and in some instances gratuitous, he has made upon the officers of the customs at New Orleans. I should be prepared to take the vote now, without further delay; but that the Senate may understand this question, I will state that these frauds run back four or five years. I will state the character and extent of them, and I will then endeavor to relieve the officers of the customs from this charge of gross negligence and incapacity which has been so freely indulged in.

Mr. Météyé, the person who was the active agent in committing these frauds, (and it is unnecessary for me to repeat again that I absolve his partners from any moral complicity, though they have legal liability,) has been a partner in this house five or six years. The manner in which the frauds were perpetrated is not such as the Senator from Georgia represents. I do not think he understands the particulars of the case. Sugars are sold in Havana at so many reals the arroba. The arroba is about a fourth of a quintal of sugar—twenty-five or twenty-eight pounds. It is always sold at so many reals the arroba. The weights and prices of the sugar were correctly stated in the invoices. Perhaps the invoices do not give the exact amount, and in that opinion, I think, my friend from Rhode Island, [Mr. SIMMONS,] who is so exceedingly anxious to have the mode of the valuation changed, would agree with me. These gentlemen have been large importers of sugar from Havana for many years. As I said before, we will suppose that the price given for sugar was an honest and fair price; but in the particular instance on which the court passed there was an importation of two hundred boxes of sugar. A box of sugar contains about sixteen or eighteen arrobas. Then the invoice would be in these words: "two hundred boxes of sugar, containing three thousand six hundred arrobas, at so many reals per arroba." If it had been carried out so many pounds of sugar at so many cents per pound, the most negligent clerk, in running his eye over the calculations, would at once have seen that there was a mistake or a fraud in them. But the Senate will very well understand that, unless a minute critical examination was made of every multiplication and addition in this invoice, it might very well escape the observation of a clerk.

These frauds began on the 2d of August, 1854. The first importation was three hundred and thirty-five boxes of sugar. The invoice amount was $5,544, and the correct amount was $6,573; the amount of excess $1,029 72, and the duty on excess $308 91. It is unnecessary for me to do more than state that a great many entries were made of the same character, probably forty or fifty in number, the aggregate between the invoices as carried out by the additions and multiplications being $289,000 when it should have been $371,000. The amount which these invoices fraudulently represented less than the real amount was $81,725, the duty on which was $24,517. Now this system of fraud was continued without intermission during the whole period of four years, until it was discovered under the administration of the collector who was recently appointed.

Mr. Météyé, whom it is now sought to reduce to the humble capacity of clerk, merely to do custom-house business, was a full partner of the house of De Visser & Co., authorized to use their signature in every transaction, held out by them to the public as their partner, and entitled to the same degree of confidence in the community as any one of the members of the firm. That, I presume, will not be disputed. He was, in every sense, a full, equal partner in the concern, except as regarded the participation in the profits. He had fifteen per cent. profits of the concern. In the course of four years he managed to embezzle twenty-four or twenty-five thousand dollars. I do not know what his habits were. Men very seldom steal money from their employers or the Government unless they have extravagant habits, and I think it is fair to presume that such was Mr. Météyé's character; and if it were so, his partners ought to have been cognizant of it, if they exercised proper discretion. It is very easy. It may not be so in New York, but in a town like New Orleans, containing a population of one hundred and fifty or one hundred and sixty thousand, a man who is enjoying a revenue of three or four thousand dollars a year, cannot very well spend three times that amount without attracting public attention towards his habits of extravagance, and his partners ought to be the first men to know it; but, unfortunately, too often they are the very last.

Now, the question is, whether it is consistent with public interest, with public policy, and, I may say, with good morals, to let innocent partners of a commercial firm escape, scot free, from the delinquency of men whom they have chosen to put in that confidential position towards the general public, and towards the Government? He enjoyed this confidence at the custom-house, because he was the partner of De Visser, and went there as such. These frauds probably could not have been perpetrated by him unless he had been the partner of a great commercial firm, for all we know—

Mr. BENJAMIN. My colleague will remember that it is proven here that he had been the entering clerk at the custom-house for a long series of years for their predecessors.

Mr. SLIDELL. I think it will also appear that he has been their partner for the last four years.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I do not dispute that. I say that did not give him credit at the custom-house. He was palmed on them, as well as on the custom-house.

Mr. SLIDELL. If the Senate so understands the—

Mr. PUGH. I want to ask the Senator from Louisiana a question. I do not understand the civil law, but I ask on what principle he calls this man a partner? He would not be so at common law, but simply a clerk.

Mr. SLIDELL. I am as ignorant of the common law as the Senator professes to be of civil law. I hope he knows a little more of the one than I do of the other. But Mr. Météyé was a full, complete partner, in every sense of the word; he had as full rights towards the public as every other member of the firm. His signature bound the firm. The gentleman shakes his head. He has just declared he knew nothing of the civil law; and when I give it to him as it is, he intimates his dissent.

Mr. PUGH. I understood the gentleman to say there was no difference.

Mr. SLIDELL. I say there is no difference, under our system of laws, on this subject. But the gentleman shakes his head, after appealing to me for information.

Mr. PUGH. The gentleman said there was no distinction.

Mr. SLIDELL. I say there is no distinction. In every sense of the word he was a full and complete partner under the civil law.

Mr. PUGH. Ah!

Mr. SLIDELL. I profess to know nothing of the common law. Now, I come to the charge of gross carelessness on the part of the custom-house officers. If the Senate understand the explanation I have already given of the manner in which these frauds were made, accompanied by some other circumstances, I think that charge of gross carelessness cannot be brought home to the officers of customs. That seems to be a point very much insisted upon. The inadequacy of the force at the New Orleans custom-house has been very often represented. I was perfectly satisfied of the fact myself, and have called the attention of the Government to it on repeated occasions. I have never been able to obtain for the officers of the customs there the same degree of aid in the discharge of their duties that has been extended to other custom-houses. We live in a remote and not a very important section of the country, and we do not receive quite as much attention here as others do. At any rate it is a fact that I assert, from my own knowledge, that the clerical aid of the custom-house has been, and now is, totally inadequate to the proper discharge of the duties of the officer of the customs in the protection of the revenue.

The character of the business at New Orleans is very different from that at New York, and other large importing towns in the country. We have a very large number of small merchants who import assortments of every variety of merchandise, and our invoices frequently occupy folios, columns of entire sheets of paper, half a dozen of them combining every possible variety of articles and every variety of price. The importations at the North are almost exclusively made by large merchants, who import in packages of great value, and then sell out to the retailers. Such is not the character of the principal importing trade of New Orleans.

Now, I say it was physically impossible, with the number of clerks employed in that branch of the service at New Orleans, to have collated all the invoices that were sent to them, and gone through all the additions. They were obliged, to a certain extent, to trust to the good faith of the parties with whom they were acting. It would take a clerk a whole day to go over a French invoice, for instance, of a milliner from Havre, six or seven hundred articles of goods, all in small quantities and at different prices. It would, perhaps, require more expenditure, in the way of clerks, than the thing would be worth, if it were practicable; but at any rate, whether that be so or not, they had not the means of doing it. It is proved, by the documents on file in the Department here, that it was utterly impossible for the clerks of the custom-house to have gone through a minute examination of all the additions in every invoice that was presented. Since then—since this fraud has been discovered—they have relaxed in some degree from the severity of their rule, and I think they have given one or two additional clerks to this branch of the service, and it is probably better conducted now than it was then.

Now, as regards the personnel of the custom-house, the gentleman under whose administration this fraud was detected, and who is now accused with all the others, en masse, of gross dereliction of duty, of utter incompetency, of bad administration, had not been in office more than four or five weeks when the frauds were detected, and they have been running through a series of years. The Government is indebted to the vigilance of the officers of the customs for the detection of this fraud; and I think if any benefit is to be derived from the forfeiture, they are fairly entitled to their share, because, if the discovery had not been made by them, the example would probably have been imitated by others, and the revenue would have been subjected to immense loss. So far as regards the collector of the port of New Orleans, I presume, then, that he is scarcely amenable to the charge of incompetency, unfaithfulness, and carelessness in the discharge of his duty.

I do not know enough of the mechanism of the custom-house to give any precise details on the subject, but I believe the form is this: goods first go to the appraiser's office; they are there examined; one or two packages out of a certain number are opened to find if they correspond in their contents with the invoice. Then the next examination is directed to whether the prices are fairly charged. That is the duty of the appraisers. I presume the appraisers have nothing to do with the addition. They simply say, we have examined the goods and are satisfied the invoice gives a correct account of what is contained in the different packages; and as far as we are able to judge the price appears to be in accordance with that usually charged for similar articles in the port from whence they were shipped. They make their return that the invoice is correct. It goes to the collector's office. There the invoice is looked over and the calculations are made of the amount of duties to be levied. From that office they are sent to the naval officer who verifies the correctness of the calculations made in the custom-house proper. When the whole examination has been made, the amount of duties is pronounced to be liquidated at a certain sum, and the importer pays them. He generally deposits in advance an amount sufficient to cover the duties.

I repeat that Mr. Hatch, the collector of the customs—and as I said before, he had been in office but three weeks when the discovery was made—is not responsible for past neglect. I here take occasion to say that we had at New Orleans previous to the appointment of Mr. Hatch, the most incompetent collector that has ever filled any position of equal importance under the Government. I used every proper effort under the past Administration to have him removed. Everybody admitted his incompetency, but there were certain reasons why he was kept in office, to which it is not necessary for me to advert. When the new Administration came into power, they changed the collector, and one of the first fruits of that change was the discovery of these frauds that had been going on for three or four years. I think the Senator from Georgia will now acquit the collector of blame.

Mr. TOOMBS. I spoke of the custom-house officers, whose duty it was to make these examinations, and I spoke by the sworn testimony in court, from which it appears they never examined one of them until they discovered the fraud, and they swore it was their duty to do it. I spoke by the card; for I have the oath of the custom-house officers on that point.

Mr. SLIDELL. I have no doubt they did examine, but did not give that particular examination necessary.

Mr. TOOMBS. I wish to disabuse myself of having given an incorrect statement about these gentlemen. I have spoken on the sworn oaths of the men whom I charge with negligence. I think it is giving fair chance to let them give their own story.

Mr. SLIDELL. Who are the men you charge?

Mr. TOOMBS. The custom-house officers whose duty it was to examine the papers as presented. I charge it on what I have before me, the testimony of two or three of them. Joseph Genois, sr., was one.

Mr. SLIDELL. He is the naval officer. Of course, he never looked at the examination.

Mr. TOOMBS. One of them swears it was his business. Mr. John McLoughlin was another, and Mr. Capdeville swears it was his business. Mr. J. R. Conner was sworn also, and Mr. Relf. The man who discovered it, I think, was Mr. Conner. I have read through the case.

Mr. SLIDELL. What about Genois?

Mr. TOOMBS. He states that it was the first one he examined; and it was his duty to examine them all, and he discovered the fraud.

Mr. SLIDELL. If Mr. Capdeville was one of those whose duty it was to examine the calculations, he was in the appraiser's office, then it went through three calculations. As regards the naval officer, I have already said that from my own personal knowledge he had not sufficient clerical force working night and day to have been capable of all these examinations; and I think the Senate will understand that a mere ordinary cursory examination of these invoices, such as I have no doubt takes place in every other custom-house of the country, would not have enabled the clerks to discover it. It was very ingenious.

Now, to come back to the point—perhaps this discussion is not exactly in order on the question to postpone—I say that these officers of customs have a right, in my opinion, and the Government has a right to the action of the circuit court, on the writ of error that has been taken in this matter. That court sits either on the latter part of May, or the first part of June. The question then will be fully discussed. If there be circumstances of equity to recommend it to the consideration of the court, the judgment of the court will be in accordance with them. If it be not, the claims of the Treasury will be vindicated; and I think the just rights of these officers, by whose vigilance this seizure was effected, and this system of fraud which has been carried on with impunity for so many years, arrested. It appears to me that it is a very reasonable request. As regards the grounds on which the district attorney intends to prosecute his writ of error to the circuit court, they relate to the instructions of the judge, which probably acted conclusively with the jury; and to my mind are evidently palpably wrong. The judge instructed the jury that, "as the items of the invoice exhibited the actual cost of the sugar, though the extensions were fraudulent, they could not be considered as a part of the invoice, and therefore the case did not come within the provision of the act under which they were seized."

The Senate will understand what the extensions were. The weight was right; the price was right; but the difficulty was in the calculation of the amount of that price in a complicated currency—a currency not familiar to our people, and in a system of weights unknown to us. The eye, in passing over this calculation, would not detect it at once. The judge decided that as long as the price stated in the invoice was correct, no matter how fraudulent the calculations in an invoice might be, it did not operate a forfeiture under the act of 1799. It appears to me that that cannot be good law. If it be, certainly our statutes require amendment in a very important particular. I have no disposition to detain the Senate from a vote further. I think there are good reasons for postponing the consideration of this case.

Mr. SIMMONS. I should be opposed to postponing the bill until the next session; for if I understand it, the evils apprehended by these parties may have happened before then, and other rights may have intervened, so that we may not be able to prevent their losing half the forfeitures, unless we pass the bill at the present session. At the same time, I do not feel exactly clear as to the difficulty of casting an invoice of sugar coming from Havana. These are in arrobas and reals. Twenty-five pounds is an arroba, and a real is twelve and a half cents—just half as many cents as there are reals for these arrobas. It is the easiest computation in the world.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I do not know that the Senate understood my colleague fully. I think the negligence of the custom-house officers is fully shown by my colleague's statement. Sugar is sold in Havana at so many reals the arroba. Twelve and a half cents is a real, and twenty-five pounds is an arroba, so that a real an arroba means half a cent a pound, and when it is entered at six reals an arroba that is three cents a pound. For four years of forty-odd invoices, the custom-house officers testified they had never carried out a single extension. It was in the carrying out of wrong extensions that the entire fraud was committed, and in no other way.

Mr. SIMMONS. If it be critically examined it will probably turn out to be one of those cases which have been brought to my attention a great many times—every one of these invoices was under-valued.

Mr. BENJAMIN. All were full value.

Mr. SIMMONS. It may be that they were. I have looked at some of these invoices, and I think they give a pretty low price for sugar at that time; but I am not going into that, because the court have gone into it, and I am satisfied. I want to suggest to the Senator that this should lie over until an appropriate amendment can be made, requiring the amount of duties still deficient on these invoices to be paid. The Government is entitled to them; and nobody will pretend that the men who have kept this partner for four years are not responsible for his acts. I have had some inkling of what partners of that kind are; and in fact it is stated that this partner was taken in because he had a peculiar adaptation to enter goods—I understand what that means—he had a great facility for getting goods through the custom-house. I will not say that his partners had any bad design, but I am going to treat them as if they were the most honest men that lived in the world. I do not want them to lose anything, but I do not think the Government ought to lose anything by the misconduct of one of their partners. I do not think they ought to lose by forfeiture, because they happened to be unfortunate in getting a partner; but as to their invoices and prices, I suspect there is a pretty general rule that sugar shipped at Havana is undervalued in the invoices. I have heard it, at any rate. But be that as it may, if the Senator from Georgia will make a provision saving to the Government the real amount of duties, according to their own statement, that is actually due, I will consent to pass the bill and relieve them.

Mr. IVERSON. Will the Senator from Rhode Island allow me to read an amendment I have drawn up to this bill, which, if the motion to postpone does not prevail, I shall offer?

Provided, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to relieve said parties from any amount of duties which may justly be due to the United States on account of said importations, and that this act shall not take effect until said duties are paid.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think that will answer. Mr. COLLAMER. I would suggest to the gentleman a substitute for that amendment. My idea is that whether this man was an agent or a partner makes really no difference. Partners are not answerable for the acts of a copartner criminaliter, but only civilliter; and therefore for forfeitures these gentlemen are not responsible. The honorable gentleman on the other side [Mr. SLIDELL] seems to doubt whether there be not some law beyond that; but I do not think there is. I do not know that is not so in the civil law; but it is not so in common law, nor common sense. But still, after all, he was their agent, or he was their partner, to make these entries and to pay these duties; and in all that, whether you treat him as an agent or partner, it is not material, because the law is the same. He was their agent or partner to pay these duties to the Government, and make the right entries and pay right sums, whether he got the money out of his partners or did not. Then all that he did not properly enter and pay, they should pay. That clearly is the law, though it may have been their misfortune. They may have settled with their consignors. It is likely they have, and closed up so that they cannot get pay from the consignors. That is their misfortune from having a dishonest partner, or dishonest agent, and the Government should not suffer. My only objection to the suggestion made by the honorable Senator from Georgia [Mr. IVERSON] is, that I have some doubt in my mind whether, when the Government, has insisted upon a forfeiture, it can now consistently claim the amount of the duty. The very ground of these suits is that of forfeiture, and I therefore prefer that a proviso should be added expressly requiring them to pay the amount of the duties, and not provide for waiving them.

Mr. TOOMBS. That is the amendment.

Mr. COLLAMER. No; the amendment is, that nothing in the bill shall be construed to waive the duties.

Mr. TOOMBS. The Senator did not read the latter portion of the amendment.

Mr. CLARK. There is a last clause covering that.

Mr. IVERSON. The amendment is:

Provided, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to relieve said parties from any amount of duties which may justly be due to the United States on account of said importations, and that this act shall not take effect until said duties are paid.

Mr. COLLAMER. I have no objection to that, but I think it would be preferable to put it in this form:

That said parties pay to the United States Treasury the full amount of duties actually payable on goods, wares, and merchandise heretofore imported by them into the port of New Orleans.

Mr. HOUSTON. I do not know that I comprehend this subject very perfectly; but from all I have heard of it, I have come to the conclusion that these petitioners are very honest, gentlemanly men, and that the delinquency of their clerk, or partner, if you please to call him so—and, technically, I do not care what he was—should not be visited upon them. They in good faith advanced the money to him to pay the duties upon all the goods received, and he misapplied it. For allowing this to pass the first, the second, or the third time, the officers of the Government may have been excusable; but after that, I think it would be an act of injustice on the part of the Government to exact the duties from these gentlemen, when it was the duty of the Government officers to examine into the accounts, and to detect any errors; and we have the evidence of the honorable Senator from Louisiana [Mr. SLIDELL] that the individual who was in charge of the custom-house was one of the most worthless men that could have been placed there; and we have a right to infer that it was owing to delinquency or neglect on his part that this evil was continued.

Mr. SLIDELL. Allow me to say to the Senator, that if I made use of that word, I certainly do not wish it to remain in the sense in which the Senator applies it. I way he was incompetent. I said nothing against his personal integrity.

Mr. HOUSTON. Very well; that devolves the responsibility on the Government, for they are bound to select capable men to discharge the public trusts. For that reason, I cannot think of voting to tax these men when the Government had a fair opportunity to detect these frauds that were practiced upon the custom-house, and it was the duty of the Government officers to do so. When the successor of the delinquent collector came into office, he detected those frauds. His predecessor had four years in which to do it, and if he had discharged his duty, he would have done it in the course of three weeks, as this officer was enabled to do. I do not say that there was any complicity between the custom-house officers and this delinquent clerk or partner; but there is no doubt that the fault was that of the Government, and not of these partners who come forward as petitioners, and ask relief. If they have already paid the duties in good faith, as is testified, it would be a very severe penalty to make them pay them over again. At any rate, to mulct them in the sum of two or three hundred thousand dollars, merely to give a portion of the money to the informer, is a principle that I will never recognize in legislation. If this collector, for having discovered the fraud in so short a space of time, is to receive such a recompense, what ought to be the penalty inflicted on the delinquent collector? Sir, there is none that could reach him. I am prepared to vote to exonerate these partners from all accountability to the Government, but, in good faith, to hold the officers of the Government, to whom it has confided important trusts, responsible. When they have failed in the duty confided to them, and the revenues are betrayed or defrauded, let not the injury fall on innocent individuals when it is caused by the acts of the Government, who were responsible for the protection of citizens through the public functionaries of the Government.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. Foor.)

The question is on the motion to postpone the further consideration of the bill until the first Monday in December next.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. IVERSON. I now offer my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will suggest that in the present state of the bill amendments are not in order, and cannot be made except by unanimous consent.

Mr. TOOMBS. I wish to make one statement to my colleague. It is perfectly clear that these men have paid this money. It is equally clear, from sworn testimony in the courts of justice, that these frauds were permitted to go on by the gross neglect of the custom-house officers, who had never examined a single invoice. I say, of course, in strict law they are bound, as their agent did not pay the money, to pay it over again themselves; but the Government ought not to avail itself of the negligence of its own officers, clearly and distinctly established, and running over a period of three or four years, to exact the money. Admitting the strict legality, is it just and fair, when the Government, by its paid officers, enabled this man to perpetrate these frauds for four years, to ask innocent parties to pay the money? The officers of the Government might easily have detected the frauds, but it is sworn to that they never did run out the figures. I admit the legal principle, and I am willing to consent that the amendment may be received, and that the Senate may pass upon it; but I make this appeal to Senators: I do not think the Government ought to exact these $24,000 from these men, when, as has been said by the Senator from Texas, it was in consequence of the naked, clear negligence of the Government officers that these transactions happened. I make no objection to receiving the amendment, and I ask for a vote upon it.

Mr. CLAY. In support of what is said by the Senator from Georgia, as Senators may not understand the question thoroughly, I will make a single remark, in order to explain fully what he means. I will say, before doing so, that when this question was referred to the Committee on Commerce—of which I have the honor to be chairman—I examined it first myself; and I became fully satisfied that these men ought not to be made to suffer this forfeiture. But, not being willing to trust my own judgment on it, I did not report it to the committee, but referred it to the Senator from Georgia, knowing that he was a lawyer of more experience and ability; and he came to the same conclusion, without any conversation between us on the subject previously.

Now, he says this money has been paid. Senators may not understand how that is. The firm advanced the money to this clerk to pay the duties. Their books show it. The merchants who investigated the question say that their books show that they did advance the money. Therefore, they have advanced to the Government, as far as they could through their agent, this amount of money to pay the duties. The clerk did not pay them. He went there, and succeeded in chiseling the Government, as the Senator says, through the criminal complicity or culpable negligence of the officers of the Government. But this complicity or negligence did not result merely in wronging the Government; they went further, and did a gross wrong to this firm. They discovered the fraud; but, instead of reporting it to the partners, or to the principals, in whichever character you regard them; instead of reporting it to them, and enabling them thereby to arrest this clerk, and to secure the funds which he might have in hand belonging to them, and which he was embezzling, they remained two days conscious of these frauds without imparting a knowledge of them, and suffered him to run away. Thereby they made themselves accessories after the fact to the fraud which he perpetrated upon his principals, or partners; and it is in that view of the case that I agree with the Senator from Georgia, that it is really taking advantage of the wrong of the officers of the Government to make the parties pay these duties over again.

Mr. SIMMONS. I should like to have an explanation on that point. When the fraud was discovered, did the custom-house officers wait any longer than was necessary to seize this man, before notifying the partners?

Mr. TOOMBS. It was discovered on Saturday, and here is the sworn testimony that they did not communicate it at all to these parties until Monday afternoon, and then the man had run away. They then went and arrested these gentlemen criminally for this very forfeiture.

Mr. SLIDELL. I have not a copy of the petition, but, as far as my recollection serves me, the Senator from Georgia is right about the day. Saturday was spent in consultation, or an attempt at consultation, with the district attorney. They did not know how to proceed. They could not find the district attorney, and on Monday they got out an order for arresting the partners, not knowing how far the other parties were implicated in this affair. They did not inform them, because they considered them equally guilty.

Mr. TOOMBS. The Senator is mistaken. It is in proof that this man Météyé was in the custom-house on Monday morning.

Mr. SLIDELL. I say the difficulty was not with the officers, but with the district attorney, for whom they could not get the necessary information to proceed. A collector has no right to take a man by the collar and arrest him.

Mr. TOOMBS. They allowed the guilty man to escape.

Mr. IVERSON. I am satisfied there was laches on the part of the custom-house officers, in allowing this fraud to be so long in existence, without detection; but doubtless that was attributable, to a great extent, to the confidence which they placed in this agent of these parties. These invoices were made for them, and the officers took it for granted that what he did was properly done, and they were probably deceived and misled by the confidence they placed in this very man. And who gave him the confidence which enabled him to impose on the custom-house officers? These parties themselves, who employed him. It is said he was nothing more than a clerk. That makes the case still stronger. If he was a partner on an equal footing with them, perhaps it would not have been so strong a case; but here they employed the agent themselves, and the employment was an indorsement of his integrity. That is the principle everywhere, both in law and common sense: if you employ an agent to transact any fiduciary business for you, you indorse his integrity and honesty. These men employed him for two or three years, and he was dishonest the whole time. To be sure, they may not have known anything about it, and I dare say they did not; but still, law as well as equity makes them responsible for the integrity of his conduct; because whose fault was it that he was enabled to impose on somebody else? It was the fault of those who employed him, and they are responsible for what he has done.

This man doubtless misled the custom-house officers to acquiesce in the proceedings which resulted in this fraud, and the Government certainly has not received the duties. That much which was due to the Government has not been paid; and these parties now come here and demand that we shall release them from obligations or penalties which they have incurred in consequence of their own misplaced confidence in their agent. They have no legal claim to this release. That is admitted. They come and appeal to our equitable and generous feelings to release them from a penalty which has been imposed on them by law.

35TH CONG....1ST SESS.

De Visser and Villarubia—Mr. King.

SENATE.

I think we have a right to impose conditions precedent on them, and compel them to pay what is due to us honestly and honorably, before they shall be released from the penalty which their conduct has inflicted on them under the law. I will vote against the bill unless this amendment be introduced. I will vote for the bill if its friends will allow it to be made.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair begs to suggest to the Senator from Georgia, that unless the vote ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time shall be reconsidered, the bill is not open to amendment, except by unanimous consent.

MR. IVERSON. I make that motion.

MR. TOOMBS. It is not worth while. I suppose there will be no objection, even by the opponents of the amendment, to receiving it.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. If no objection be made, the Chair will receive the amendment. [No objection.] There being no objection, the amendment is made.

MR. BENJAMIN. The Chair misunderstood the advocates of the bill. The advocates of the bill consent that he introduce the amendment without previously moving a reconsideration. We are going to take a vote on it now.

MR. SLIDELL. I took it for granted that this amendment would pass without objection. If not, I have something further to say on the subject.

MR. BENJAMIN. Is my colleague going to speak the bill out?

MR. SLIDELL. I do not know how long I shall speak. It will depend upon circumstances.

MR. IVERSON. I understood my colleague to say he would agree to the amendment.

MR. TOOMBS. I said I would not object to its introduction.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The rule is, that in this stage of the bill, the bill can only be amended by unanimous consent.

MR. TOOMBS. The same unanimous consent would allow the introduction of the amendment without the reconsideration of the engrossment. I was content that the Senate might vote on the amendment as though the bill had been reconsidered, to save time.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senate agree to the amendment?

MR. SLIDELL. I have a word to say.

MR. MALLORY. My friend from Louisiana will allow me to ask him if he can inform the Senate what the amount of these duties is?

MR. TOOMBS. Twenty-four thousand dollars. It is judicially ascertained.

MR. MALLORY. That will be the sum required to be paid by this amendment.

MR. TOOMBS and MR. BENJAMIN. Yes, sir.

MR. SLIDELL. I am glad to perceive that these gentlemen, who are certainly very honest and respectable men, find in the Senate persons who go further in advocating their interests than they themselves do, and who ask for them what they never asked for themselves; for I take it for granted that in passing this bill they would not be willing to accept the imputation of bad faith. It is proposed that they shall be released from the payment of the penalties; and now we are told the bill goes further than that. These persons have never asked anything more than a simple abandonment of the claim of forfeiture. They have always said they recognized their liability, and were willing to pay the duties. It is like being more catholic than the Pope. Gentlemen here want to be more liberal to these men in New Orleans, whom I do not think so entirely free from blame as many Senators appear to regard them, than they ask. I admit there is no moral obliquity about it, but they have never pretended that the debt for duties was not a just debt. I have here a copy of a letter, not certified, it is true, but I take it for granted it will be admitted as correct. This is a letter, dated April 13, 1857, addressed to the collector at New Orleans:

"SIR: We are informed by Mr. Benjamin that you are willing to receive the deficit of duties remaining unpaid on the invoice of sugar per schooner Mary Elizabeth, so soon as the goods have been appraised, and thereupon you will release the seizure made by you on our store. We are ready now, and always have been ready, to pay this deficit; and we beg leave to renew to you the offer made to you some time ago by Mr. Hunt, our counsel in our behalf, and to state that we will pay whatever deficiencies may be discovered in the invoices that may have been fraudulently passed through the custom-house by Mr. Météyé, our late partner."

they do not call him clerk, but partner—"as fast as they are detected."

Now, in regard to the imputed complicity of the officers of the custom-house with Mr. Météyé, I think a very few words will satisfy the Senate that that imputation is altogether unfounded. The discovery of a fraudulent alteration of one invoice was made at a late hour on Saturday. Mr. Météyé, I believe, in the first instance—I do not know what the record may say on that point—as all men who are found in a position of that sort, disavowed his culpability. He said it was an accident, a mistake. Then the suspicions of the custom-house officers were excited; and on the following day, Sunday, they went through all the other invoices which had been accumulating there during a period of years, and necessarily required examination; and they found the same frauds had been committed in various instances contained in the paper I have before me. It took the whole of Sunday to make that examination. They were not at all aware, until Monday morning, of the extent of the frauds. The collector—I believe that appears in the evidence—endeavored to procure the advice and counsel of the district attorney, in order to have this man arrested on the spot. He did not find him. I believe the then collector and district attorney were not on very good terms, and stood on some points of punctilio. One expected the district attorney to call on him, and the other expected the collector to go to him. That is immaterial. The delay was a natural one. The collector or the naval officer could not take Mr. Météyé by the collar and carry him to jail. It required that some preliminary proceedings should be had in the court of the United States. The proper man to conduct those proceedings was the district attorney. When the district attorney was ready to proceed, the bird had flown.

That is the true state of the case. I do not see any culpability in the matter on the part of the Government officers. It is said they ought to have informed the other partners of the fraud that had been committed. At that time they had no evidence of the absence of complicity on the part of the other partners. They had a fair right to presume that in a mercantile house, in whose name so large frauds had been carried on for so many years, all the parties were equally culpable. It was only after an investigation of the case before the court, that they became satisfied of the innocence of Mr. De Visser and Mr. Villarubia, so far as any moral complicity with this matter is concerned. I think I have explained the reason of the delay.

MR. TOOMBS. I shall detain the Senate but a moment in reply to the gentleman's statement about these duties and that letter. When these parties were about to be sued for $300,000 of forfeitures, and their business was about to be broken up, they were then willing to pay the Government the duties, for there was nothing but ruin to them in this arrangement, to their character, reputation, and business. The Government officers refused their offer, and brought suit for $300,000 forfeiture against them, breaking up their business entirely. The Government was defeated in the courts on the forfeiture; and now they say, pay us the duty. These gentlemen were put to very great expense in defending their case; they have brought here and presented to the committee a transcript of the record, containing all the evidence; and when that came to the committee of which I am a member, my friend, the chairman, [MR. CLAY,] gave it to me to examine. It was the unanimous judgment of the gentlemen of the committee who investigated it, that they should not be charged with the $24,000.

The Senator does not answer the allegation as to the malfeasance of these officers. The idea that the district attorney had to be consulted is not tenable. Any of the officers could have gone and made an affidavit, and had this man arrested. They knew the facts on Saturday; they waited all day Sunday; he was in the office on Monday. They might have made an affidavit in ten minutes and arrested him, and probably got this very money back; but they give him time to run off, and then seize these innocent men, and attempt to prosecute them for fraud, as well as to hold them liable for $300,000. They have been put to great trouble and great expense in defending the case. The Government failed before the district court of the United States at New Orleans. I have before me the report of the speech of the present district attorney, whom the honorable Senator knows very well, and I do too, an eminent gentleman formerly of this city, who said that nothing but a sense of public duty induced him, against his feelings, to prosecute the claim for forfeiture. He said there was not the slightest blame attached to these parties. I have his speech before me, in a New Orleans paper; but I shall not take up time by reading it. It entirely exculpates these gentlemen. When they stand blameless, when they have had to defend themselves against a claim of $300,000, and a ruthless prosecution of these men to get forfeitures, I think nothing would be more just and proper in the Senate, under the circumstances, than for the Senate to say that they should not be compelled to suffer by their unfortunate connection with this partner, if you choose to call him so, thrice partner, if you please, three hundred times partner, when the fraud was permitted by the neglect of the Government officers. I think it appeals to the generosity and magnanimity of every Senator that they should not be compelled to pay one cent.

MR. KING. When this claim was first presented to the Senate, I did not suppose that the claimants asked for anything more than a release from the penalties and forfeitures; and if that was all they asked, I was not disposed to interpose objections to the passage of their bill. Upon looking at the bill, however, I find that it does in terms release them from all claims, as well as penalties and forfeitures, which would include a release from any duties that might be due. Now, I know nothing of the facts of this case except as they have appeared before the Senate to-day; but I do know that just complaints exist throughout the country of frauds practiced by false invoices and false entries at the custom-houses. I know, too—for I live upon the frontiers—that the revenue laws of the country are not popular laws upon the frontiers, and that they are not popular with the importers; and that they desire always to have them construed liberally, and that there is too much disposition to look lightly upon evasions of them. But when frauds are detected, I think certainly they should be visited with the just penalties of the law. In this case, a commercial house, which it turns out contains two respectable partners—for I have no disposition to say anything in derogation of the eulogiums that have been pronounced on the character of these two gentlemen—took a man into their firm for the purpose of transacting their custom-house business and paying their duties; and, upon an examination of their books, everything looks entirely plain and well. If there had been originally a design upon the part of this firm, through a course of years, to commit a series of frauds upon the revenue, it might be that they were prepared, when detected, to show a pretty clean record for themselves; and one of the partners runs away, thus relieving the firm from the odium that would attach to them if they could all have been obnoxious to suspicion. That might be done; I do not say it has been done here.

Now, when they come and ask not only to be relieved from the forfeitures, but to be relieved from the payment of the duties of which the Treasury of the nation has been defrauded by the act of their partner, I must say that I think the question entitled to the serious consideration of the Senate; and I am rather surprised to find the Senator from Georgia [MR. TOOMBS] advocating this claim, for in general, upon all this character and class of claims, I vote with him, and I think he is generally sound on them. Admitting these men to be entirely as innocent and as honorable as they are claimed to be, it is their misfortune that they were connected with this rogue; but he was a man of their own selection. The proofs of all the facts and circumstances of this case are unknown to us; they are in the courts. We are told that these gentlemen are not liable in the courts. Well, if they are not, they are in no trouble. If they are not liable for the penalties and forfeitures, and not liable for the criminal act of the partner, these two innocent gentlemen have no apprehensions of anything to suffer. But the sugar has been imported into the country, and they have received the profits on these invoices, for they seem to have been carried on their books to their profit and loss account; they have received the benefit of the importations, and one of the partners certainly has received the benefits of the amount of duty of which the Government has been defrauded. Knowing nothing of the case, I would not object to this bill, and I only speak because there seems to be a disposition on the part of the Senate to exclude this amendment. Gentlemen ask to have the question taken upon it, and there seems to be nothing said upon the propriety of insisting on the payment of duties. If there is persistent objection to the payment of these duties, I hope the question will be taken by yeas and nays. I should like to vote to require the payment of the duties, and then I am willing to relieve these gentlemen from the penalties.

Mr. IVERSON. I think there are very grave objections to the passage of this bill for the relief of these parties on general principles; but still I am willing to waive my objections to this particular case, because there seems to have been some laches or neglect on the part of Government officers in permitting this fraud to go on so long as it did without detection. That is the only ground, in my opinion, upon which this claim has one particle of foundation.

Now, sir, this bill will hold out nothing but a reward for fraud and perjury if it pass. Hereafter, if a partner or a clerk employed by an importing house commits frauds of this kind, the parties have nothing to do but to come to Congress and say, "we were honest; we were deceived; we did not practice frauds; our clerk committed them; and you must relieve us not only from the penalty, but not compel us to pay one cent of the duties." It is an inducement held out to every dishonest member or agent of an importing house who enters invoices at custom-houses to commit fraud. They have nothing to lose by it, for they will argue in this way: "if I can succeed in this particular it is all well; I will put the money in my pocket; but if I am detected, my partners or employers have nothing to do but to go to Congress and set up a cry of honesty on their part, and deception on the part of their agent, and get rid of the whole payment."

The penalties imposed are intended to secure honesty; and when you release those penalties you hold out a reward to dishonesty and corruption. This very case will be an inducement for others to commit frauds under similar circumstances, and be a precedent for Congress to release parties from their obligations. That is simply the result; and my word for it, if this bill passes you will have case after case hereafter, fraud after fraud committed upon your revenues, and parties will come here and appeal to the sympathies of gentlemen to release them because they have not been participants in the frauds. It is a dangerous precedent, in my opinion; but I am willing to yield my objections in this particular case, on account of the circumstances disclosed in the testimony, showing that the Government officers themselves were somewhat in laches; it was their fault, perhaps, that this fraud was not detected earlier than it was, and that this party was not arrested and held in custody, and made to pay the penalty of his crimes; but without this amendment it seems to me very unfair that this bill should pass.

Mr. HOUSTON. I do not wish to detain the Senate, but it does seem to me that it is a most extraordinary course which gentlemen have taken. I have great respect for the kindness, good temper, and justice of my excellent friend from New York, [Mr. KING;] but it does seem to me he has not carried his suspicions quite far enough. He thinks these partners might have kept this man for the purpose of imposing on the custom-house. Now we learn from the facts stated to-day—I have never looked into the case before—that he was recommended to them as a business man, confidential and intelligent, and not for the special purpose, I believe, of transacting business at the custom-house as suggested. He was recommended by his former employers as a most reliable man, and he was made a partner to sustain and encourage him, and requite him for his fidelity. They gave him every encouragement necessary; and, being recommended by former business men who had him in their employment, it was natural that they should confide to him important trusts. That is, I believe, about the circumstance of his being employed by them; but it is just as probable that he had partners in the custom-house, who were sleeping or dormant partners, as to suppose that he had partners out of it. It does seem to me that four years' delinquency and perpetration of crime on his part is conclusive evidence that there must have been collusion in the custom-house, and that the collector of the customs is responsible for the deeds, and not this firm in New Orleans, of which a partner was involved in complicity. I think the securities of the collector at New Orleans were answerable for these injuries to the Government; and if it was defrauded out of customs, it was his business to prevent it; and if the Government lost, owing to any neglect of his, his securities are responsible, for their obligation was to vindicate his honesty as a public officer; to see that he performed his duties as a public officer. A man might be honest, and yet utterly neglectful in the discharge of his duties, and involve the country in ruinous consequences to its revenues; and in that event, the sureties are generally as responsible as if he had been guilty of purloining money from the custom-house at New Orleans.

I can arrive at no conclusion whatever but that these gentlemen are guiltless. Météyé, if you view him technically, may have been their partner, and they may be liable for his conduct; but, on principle, so far as the facts are manifested here, not a solitary suspicion can attach to them, as I apprehend the case—not the slightest suspicion. If I believed there had been delinquency on their part, or that, by collusion or contrivance with this partner, they had defrauded the revenue, I could not give countenance to any application of theirs. If they were willing at one time to compromise, and to make a great sacrifice to get out of the difficulties in which they were involved, owing to the misconduct or neglect of the collector of the customs, if they were willing when a most alarming ruin was before their eyes, to compromise, that should not be pressed against this bill now. The honorable Senator from Louisiana on my right, [Mr. SLIDELL,] did not give us the date of the letter he read; but subsequent events show that these gentlemen have been vindicated. The people in the vicinage, who understand all the facts of the case, have come to a conclusion very different from some of the gentlemen of this body; and, for my own part, I am prepared to vote against this amendment; and I am equally determined to vote for any measure that will give them this relief—avert the evils that have been threatened, and arrest the wrong. I am willing to vote for any measure that will give them relief, and visit responsibility on the officers of the Government, and direct the eye of the Government to them. It should not, in these responsible offices, place favorites on account of political claims, but men who are elevated by their moral worth, whether of this party or that party—men who have established a high character, and obtained standing in society. These are the men I want to see placed in office; and not delinquent favorites, or men who come with the clamor of friends to sustain them, and have not character to herald them to the world.

Mr. CHANDLER. I am somewhat familiar with this question of frauds upon the Treasury. In New York, American citizens have been driven from certain kinds of importations entirely through just such frauds as this. The ordinary course is to take a partner for this express purpose—a man who will swear to a false invoice. A house is established in New York, and foreign manufacturers send it a false invoice, and by that process they have driven honest, upright, and honorable American citizens entirely out of their own market for that species of merchandise. I know nothing about this case at all; I presume these gentlemen to be honorable men; but our action upon this claim will be looked to with great solicitude by a large class of the men to whom I have alluded who have engaged in this kind of business. I trust that the Senate will not offer a bribe to rationality. I trust we shall not offer a bounty upon perjury and false invoices in our custom-houses. If this amendment should be carried compelling the parties to refund the money which they justly and honestly owe the Government, I shall have no particular objection to their being allowed to go scot free of the penalty, on account of their high character, as here represented; but to offer this bounty upon fraud and perjury, would be a most dangerous precedent, it seems to me, for the Congress of the United States to set. I hope this amendment will prevail.

Mr. BAYARD. I have entertained from the first no earthly doubt that it was shocking to the sense of natural justice that we should attempt to enforce criminally against innocent men the penalties of the law for the fault of a guilty partner. It is contrary to every principle of the common law. I doubt whether the Government could possibly succeed in any prosecution of that kind; and certainly a proceeding for confiscation or to recover a penalty for a false invoice is a criminal proceeding. My doubt has been as to whether, in passing this bill to relieve the parties from this prosecution, we ought to impose such terms as are now proposed. There are many technical questions involved; but these parties ought not to be subject to this liability, as the proof is clear that they were not morally responsible or cognizant of the acts of the partner. My doubts have been whether we ought to hold them civilly liable and make it a condition of relief that they should pay the duties which the Government has not received, in consequence of the fraud. My first inclination of opinion was that we ought to exact the payment of duties, and I think I should have retained that impression but for one fact; if I am wrong in the fact, of course I should come to my original conclusion. If I understand the case rightly there was, at least, gross negligence on the part of the agents of the Government, they having the means of discovering the fraud running through a course of years; and these partners, though the other was their partner if you please—there is no magic in the term; it means merely that he was employed by their authority—had not the means of detection; they paid the excess into the hands of this individual; and the profits of the fraud have not inured to the benefit of the firm but to the benefit of the fraudulent party, and that through the negligence of the Government.

But it did not stop there. The officers knew of the existence of fraud; they discovered it on Saturday. They then examined and found further frauds on Sunday. The guilty party was at the custom-house on Monday, the party who had the entire transactions with them personally, the only one known to the officers, and they suffered him to escape, and then turned round and, after he had escaped, arrested innocent parties, and sued them, not for the duties, but for confiscations and penalties, to the amount of $360,000. Under these circumstances, if any benefit inured to these innocent parties from the fraudulent entries made by their copartner, beyond all question that ought to go to the Government; but if they have received no benefit, and the fraudulent party alone has received the benefit, the Government choosing to suffer him to escape, it ought not to make it a condition of remission of those penalties that the other partners shall pay that from which they have received no benefit at all. I shall vote against the amendment, with my view of the facts as they now stand, because these men have received no benefit from the frauds of their partner.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have been exceedingly unwilling to say anything about this matter. I was very much in hopes the friends of the bill would consent to this amendment. If it be consented to by them, or if the amendment be made by the Senate, I shall be willing to vote for the bill. If not, I must vote against it. I am willing that these men shall be relieved from the penalties; but I confess I have been surprised by the mode of argument adopted to defend the objection which is made to this amendment. Just look at the case for a single instant; look at the whole argument as presented.

The gentlemen who came here as petitioners entered into partnership with this Météyé. No matter whether they gave him a small amount of the profits or not, they entered into partnership with this man; they indorsed him; they gave him character as one of their firm; they put him forth to the community as an honorable and honest man; they intrusted him with their money to make these payments of duties; they sent him to the custom-house. By receiving him into partnership, and putting their money into his hands, they recommended him to the custom-house officers, and to everybody, as an honest man, and a man to be trusted. He goes there, and he commits these frauds over and over and over again. It is not pretended that the custom-house officers are in complicity with him, that they are a party to the fraud; but that they did not exercise the vigilance they should have exercised to guard against the frauds he commits; and in consequence of those frauds the Government loses $24,000, and finally having discovered them, seizes a part of the goods themselves, and commences prosecution. These parties come up here now, not only to be relieved of the penalty to the amount of about three hundred thousand dollars, but in addition to that, to ask that the United States abandon its claim for all it has lost, give up the goods acquired by the penalties, and also allow them to go free from the amount of which the United States has been defrauded—$24,000. Senators say this is a hard case. These gentlemen have been persecuted and prosecuted, and have paid heavy costs, all on account of this man whom they trusted, they being honest men themselves.

Well, who enabled him to commit these frauds? They. Who gave him a character? They did. Who put the money into his hands and sent him to the custom-house? They did; and they reply to the Government of the United States, "it was the business of your officers to watch and see that our partner did not cheat you, and because you did not do it, you ought to lose the money you have been cheated out of, because your custom-house officers were not sharp enough to suspect that he was a rogue, and did not look with that degree of scrutiny they should have done into the papers he presented. You were in a degree negligent because you did not have the best officers in the world, and, therefore, our partner and our agent, who cheated you out of the money, should alone be held responsible for it, and we ought not to lose it."

That is a very singular argument, to my mind. What is the law between man and man in dealing with agents? I send an agent to deal with you; my agent commits a fraud; I give him a character—he is my partner, if you please. He commits a gross fraud by which you are defrauded of a certain amount of money, giving you a large claim on me; and when I appeal to you to remit that large claim I say, "this is very hard for me; I have been an honest man, though my partner, to be sure, is a knave. I want you to remit this claim." You say, "very well, I will remit it; I do not like to be hard on you and will let you off if you give me the money you have cheated me out of." "Oh, no," is the response, "your employe was not so sharp as he ought to have been, and therefore I will pay nothing." What sort of an answer would that be between man and man? None at all. Everybody sees it would be no answer, and the claim made in such a case would certainly be scouted at. An individual in such a case would say: "I do not insist on any penalty; I do not want to be hard on you, but I cannot allow your partner to cheat me out of money. If you ask a favor of me, do right yourself first." It would be no answer to say, "it is hard on me that I should lose the money." Very well, some one must lose it. Shall he lose it, who put the man forward, who gave him character, and enabled him to commit the fraud; or should another person, who has been defrauded, suffer the loss?

It strikes me that the obvious principles of law and justice between man and man give the answer to all this. It is, "if you want a favor of me, and apply to me to remit a penalty which you say is ruinous to you, you must first make me whole for what you, or your servants, have defrauded me out of." That is the proper course on the most obvious principles. I can see no possible answer that can be made to that; and when gentlemen say this has been a hard matter to these people who have lost money, they have been injured in character, they have been placed in an unpleasant situation, paid costs, and all that, I reply that I am sorry for it, but such things are not unfrequent; the roguery of some men injures others; and if a person enters into partnership with another, and gives him an indorsement, he must take the consequences. These matters are followed by their evil as well as their good results. Other persons must not suffer, but he who has led to the commission of the act by forming the connection. To be sure, he may not be morally in fault; he may have been deceived himself, but the consequences must rest with him after all, because the first fault or mistake is his.

That is the law as between man and man, and it is just. But, sir, I have been principally induced to speak on the subject because these complaints are common to our whole country, and it is well known as a fact, that the revenue is defrauded in every principal city in the Union by precisely such arrangements as were made here. They are made on purpose, in some cases. I do not say it was done in this instance. I would not insinuate that it was; I am perfectly willing to say, on the evidence, that I do not believe it was; but every one can see how it could be managed for a couple of men who stand well in the community to have a partner, at a convenient rate of compensation, to make all these arrangements. It is very easy to keep the books square, and show the money paid out, and when the fellow has carried it on for years, and chooses to run away; when they have made a good deal of money, or he gets accidentally found out, everything on the face may appear fair. Though I do not believe that has been done in this instance, there is good reason to believe that similar practices have existed in many other instances. If we go the length now, not only of remitting the penalty, but of saying the fraud shall be successful, and the duties shall not be asked for in such a case, simply because innocent men have suffered by the fault of the rogue they took into their employ and indorsed and gave character to, we may just as well abandon the farce of trying to collect duties on imports.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. FITZPATRICK.) The amendment will be read.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

Provided, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to relieve the said parties from any amount of duties which may be justly due to the United States on account of said importations; and that this act shall not take effect until said duties are paid.

Mr. KING called for the yeas and nays on the amendment; and they were ordered.

Mr. HARLAN. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. DURKEE] has paired off with my colleague [Mr. JONES.]

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 25, nays 9; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Chandler, Crittenden, Davis, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foster, Green, Harlan, Henderson, Iverson, Johnson of Tennessee, King, Mallory, Polk, Sebastian, Seward, Shields, Simmons, Slidell, Stuart, Trumbull, Wade, Wilson, and Yulice—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Benjamin, Broderick, Clay, Fitzpatrick, Houston, Pugh, Rice, and Toombs—9.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FOSTER. I should like to be informed, before the bill passes, whether, in the present state of the prosecution against these petitioners, the duties can be collected even with this proviso in the bill. I have an impression that goods which are forfeited in consequence of false entries, or an attempt to smuggle, are not goods on which duties can be collected. The claim, as I understand it, is that these goods are not now to be forfeited, and the forfeiture is remitted; and the design of the Senate manifestly is, that the forfeiture is remitted on the ground that the duties are to be paid.

Mr. STUART. The amendment says that the bill is not to take effect until the duties are paid.

Mr. FOSTER. That relates to duties which are by law payable; but I apprehend there is, after all, a question whether the duties can be collected.

Mr. IVERSON. The amendment is not that duties legally liable shall be paid, but those justly due to the Government, is the language of the amendment.

Mr. FOSTER. But the question, after all, would be what is justly due.

Mr. STUART. Their goods will be forfeited unless they pay what the Government thinks is right.

Mr. FOSTER. About that, I apprehend there may be difference of opinion here. I should like to have the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BENJAMIN] express his views on the question whether, if this bill passes, these merchants of New Orleans can be compelled to pay these duties?

Mr. BENJAMIN. They must, in order to obtain the benefit of the bill, undoubtedly. I do not see how they can avoid it.

Mr. SIMMONS. The question is, are duties chargeable on goods that have been forfeited?

Mr. BENJAMIN. Undoubtedly if they want the benefit of the bill, they must pay the duties.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Let the amendment be read.

The Secretary read it.

Mr. FOSTER. Now, suppose these petitioners do not think proper to avail themselves of the benefit of the act, what becomes of the forfeiture?

Mr. TOOMBS. They have a right to do so.

Mr. FOSTER. They have a good defense in that suit. They succeed in getting the goods that are not forfeited, and the result is that they get the goods without paying duties.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Are you going to pass a law to prevent them defending their suits?

Mr. FOSTER. By no means; but I apprehend it is not the design of the Senate that such a course shall be taken as that these goods shall be imported without paying duties.

Mr. CLAY. The Government have got the game in their own hands. They will not give up the goods unless the duties are paid, I suppose.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I should like to hear the amendment read again.

Mr. TRUMBULL. In order to make this matter perfectly clear, I think an amendment of a word or two would accomplish the object which the Senator from Connecticut has in view. As the amendment now reads, the proviso is:

"That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to relieve the said parties from any amount of duties which may be justly due to the United States on account of said importations, and that said act shall not take effect until said duties are paid."

By altering the phraseology so as to make it, instead of "which may be justly due," say "which would have been due to the United States on account of said importations had there been no forfeiture, and that this act shall not take effect," the object will be attained.

Mr. SLIDELL. I would prefer that the amendment should not be made. I think it is a great deal better as it is.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think it would be better.

Mr. TOOMBS. There is no objection to that in the world. You can fix it in that way if you like it better.

Mr. SLIDELL. If the Senate admits the principle that the forfeiture is not to be exacted from these gentlemen, the bill is now in a satisfactory form. I shall offer no proposition to it. I prefer, however, the amendment as it stands to the suggestion of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will not move it.

The bill was passed.

WASHINGTON PUBLIC SCHOOLS.

DEBATE IN THE SENATE.

SATURDAY, May 15, 1858.

The bill (S. No. 191) for the benefit of public schools in the city of Washington, was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides that so much of the fines and forfeitures hereafter to be collected in the District of Columbia as accrue to the United States shall be surrendered to the city of Washington for school purposes, until the whole sum so received shall amount to $50,000. It declares that the corporate authorities in the city of Washington may, with the assent of the owners of real estate in the city, levy a special tax of ten cents on each hundred dollars' worth of taxable property in the corporate limits of the city, for the benefit of public schools; and that whenever the Secretary of the Treasury shall be officially notified by the Mayor that this tax has been levied and collected, it shall be his duty to pay from the Treasury of the United States, to the persons legally authorized to receive the school funds for the city of Washington, a sum equal to the amount thus raised by taxation; but not more than twenty thousand dollars per annum is to be paid by the United States, and these payments are to continue for five years, unless Congress shall otherwise order. For the purpose of testing the sense of the property-owners of Washington city as to whether they will submit to this tax, the Mayor of the city is to order an election on such day as he may deem proper, to be conducted in all respects as other elections in the city, except that no one shall be deemed a qualified voter unless he owns property subject to taxation in the city.

Mr. BROWN. I suppose there will be some discussion about it, and I ask that the report be read.

The Secretary read the following report, made by Mr. Brown on the 10th of March:

The Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom were referred various memorials and petitions from the corporate authorities, the trustees of the public schools, and citizens of the city of Washington, praying congressional aid for the public schools in said city, have had the same under consideration, and report:

First. That there are no unold lots of material value in the city of Washington, and therefore it is useless to deny or grant so much of the prayer of the petitioners as seeks a donation of these lots to the public schools of said city.

Second. The policy of granting lands in aid of public schools in the new States and Territories appears to your committee to have been eminently wise, and free from all constitutional objections; but when it is proposed, as by these memorials, to extend that policy to the District of Columbia, new and grave objections arise. These objections are not only to the expediency, but, in the judgment of many, to the constitutionality of the proposed measure. Without discussing the question, your committee report that, in their opinion, it is not proper, at this time, to make a grant of public lands to aid the public schools in the city of Washington.

Third. The proposition to appropriate money in aid of these schools has engaged the attention of the committee.

It appears, according to the best data attainable by your committee, that the Government owns about one half in value of all the real estate in the city of Washington. On this it pays no taxes. The citizens are heavily taxed for the various purposes of city government, and the United States makes large appropriations for purposes of its own within said city. While the city appropriates largely from a common treasury for the support of schools, the United States never has appropriated a dollar for that object.

There are in the city of Washington more than five thousand children, between the ages of five and eighteen years, who attend no school. Of these, it is believed, more than two thirds have been attracted to this point by the Government. They are the children of persons in the service of the United States, many of whom have no taxable property in the city, and very little anywhere else.

Of these five thousand who attend no school, one half at least, perhaps more, are the children of parents too poor to bear the expense of their education, and they must grow up in ignorance, unless educated at the public expense. It would seem hardly fair to throw them as an exclusive burden on the private property-holders of this city.

There are in the public schools of this city two thousand and four hundred pupils, besides three thousand two hundred in the private schools. The public schools are maintained mainly out of the city treasury, there being paid for their support an annual sum varying from twenty to twenty-five thousand dollars.

Your committee has found a healthy state of public sentiment in the city on the subject of education; many of the largest property-holders not only consenting to, but urging, an additional special tax for school purposes. The assessed value of property in the city is a fraction over twenty six million dollars, yielding a revenue, at the present rate of taxation, of $185,000, about nine per cent. of which is appropriated to the support of public schools. The city has a permanent school fund invested which yields $3,000 per annum; and the poll tax, amounting to about five thousand five hundred dollars annually, goes also into the school fund. It is now proposed to levy an additional tax of ten cents in the hundred dollars for the special purpose of aiding the schools. This will raise about twenty-six thousand dollars per annum, which, added to the present sum expended, will be equal say to fifty thousand dollars a year. If the city was well supplied with school-houses this sum would go far towards meeting the desired object of placing a school within the reach of every child in the city; but there is, unfortunately, a great deficiency in school accommodations.

In view of all these facts, your committee think it expedient for Congress to pass an act surrendering to the school fund of the city the fines and forfeitures in the District courts, and hereafter to be collected, until the same shall reach $50,000, the money to be applied to the erection of permanent school houses.

The fines and forfeitures vary in amount per annum, according to the number and magnitude of offenses against the criminal laws. In the years 1856 and 1857 the total of forfeitures was $9,565 50, and of fines $1,652 50. Of these sums only $1,482 appears to have been collected. By surrendering this fund to the public schools, there will be created an additional incentive to more rigid collections in future; and thus the double benefit of aiding the schools, and punishing offenders with more certainty, will be obtained.

In addition to this provision, your committee propose an annual appropriation from the national Treasury of $20,000, for five years, on the condition that the citizens submit to the tax above alluded to—that is, a tax of about twenty-six thousand dollars in the aggregate, for the special purposes of the public schools, and this to be in addition to the sums now paid by them. Thus the Government will pay, for a limited time, about one part, and the citizens two parts, of the expense of keeping up the public schools; and it is hoped, with this aid, these schools, in five years, will be put on such a solid foundation that they can be sustained without aid from the Government.

In accordance with these views, your committee report a bill.

Mr. HALE. I have an amendment to offer as an additional section:

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That all the taxes levied on the estates of colored persons, in the city of Washington, shall be devoted to the support of schools for the education of colored children, under the direction of the government of the city.

I desire to state that several of these individuals have spoken of it to me as a case of extreme hardship that the colored population here are taxed for the support of schools, (and it forms no inconsiderable amount of the taxes collected,) and, whilst they are compelled to pay taxes, their children have not the slightest benefit of the schools. I do not propose to establish any mixed schools or anything else, but to devote the taxes collected from this class to the education of their own children under the direction of the city government; and it seems to me to be a matter of such plain justice that it will hardly be denied. They are an oppressed and a degraded people, and I think it hardly comports with the magnanimity of their superiors to collect their money and to use it to educate their own children. I hope that this proposition will commend itself to the chairman of the District Committee.

Mr. TOOMBS. I think this effort of benevolence could have been directed to a much better object. I am perfectly willing that the bill should exclude their property from taxation for this purpose. I think the city could much better afford to lose the amount that this class of people pay than to have any difficulty by a proposition to mix them. I think it all very well as long as you allow them to stay here, which ought not to be done, not to tax them for other people's benefit. That is a wrong principle, and I think the gentleman had better amend the bill by excluding their property.

Mr. BROWN. I was about to say that the city authorities here have never made provision for the education of colored people, and I do not believe they ever will. I think the colored people here have schools of their own under their own control, and the control of such persons as think proper to meddle with them. I have no objection to exempting the property of colored persons from taxation under this bill if our friends generally concur in that. I understand the complaint to be, that these people are to be taxed for an object in the benefits of which they are not to participate. Then I propose to get them out of the difficulty by saying that they shall not be taxed.

Mr. HALE. I am content with that amendment.

Mr. BROWN. Draw it up in that form.

Mr. TOOMBS. A proviso will answer, providing that the property of colored persons shall not be taxed under this bill.

Mr. DURKEE. I would suggest to the Senator from New Hampshire that that will not remove the difficulty entirely, because these people will necessarily be taxed by indirect taxation to raise the money which we now propose to appropriate for the benefit of the schools. We propose in this bill to donate a certain sum of money to benefit the schools; and they contribute a portion of that money.

Mr. HALE. I do not expect to get the colored people up to anything like their rights, and I only want to make a beginning. The idea of taxing their property for the education of white people is so monstrously unjust that I hope there will be no objection to a provision such as has been suggested.

Mr. TOOMBS. That is right.

Mr. HALE. I will take the suggestion of the chairman of the committee, simply exempting their property from taxation.

Mr. BROWN. The object will be accomplished by putting a proviso to the last section of the bill providing that the property of persons of color shall not be subject to taxation under this bill.

Mr. HALE. I do not know that that will cover all. If the chairman will let the bill lie by for a few minutes, I will endeavor to fix an amendment with him that will meet the case.

Mr. BROWN. I do not wish the bill to lose its place.

Mr. HALE. Let it be passed over informally, for the present.

Mr. TOOMBS. There are one or two sections of the bill which we might as well be acting upon while the Senator from New Hampshire is getting his amendment ready. I would ask the Senator from Mississippi what is now done with the fines and forfeitures proposed to be given in one section of the bill to the school fund?

Mr. BROWN. They go into the national Treasury.

Mr. TOOMBS. I was aware of that fact, and I want to strike out that provision from the bill. The administration of justice in this District is peculiar. The United States actually pay for administering justice to this people. This is entirely wrong. The expense of administering justice here is probably greater than in any similar community anywhere on earth. The abuse is atrocious. If there is a "muss" down here on Pennsylvania avenue, probably the costs of the justices of the peace, constables, &c., will run up to $300. The only compensation the Treasury gets for the costs it has to pay where these "culled pussuns" are unable to pay their own, and there are from twenty to sixty always in jail, is the fines some few of them pay. The great body of these criminals are paupers; and thousands of dollars, I think between sixty and eighty thousand dollars a year, are paid as costs to all the various officers for administering criminal justice here. I am not willing to make the Treasury of the United States pay for all of the expenses of administering justice and maintaining order in Washington city. The costs of the proceedings in regard to the most petty offenses of free negroes here are thrown on the Treasury; and then, when you fine one who can respond to a fine imposed on him, you take the money and give it for schools. I would rather vote money directly out of the public Treasury than indirectly in this way. This is the only fund that remunerates the United States for the vast amount of costs they pay in the District. I move to strike out so much of the bill as gives the fines and forfeitures to the city for this purpose.

Mr. BROWN. The Senator, I think, over-estimates the present amount of collections from that source, and underestimates what would be the amount collected if there was a more rigid enforcement of the law.

Mr. TOOMBS. I think my friend from Mississippi misunderstands me. I express no opinion as to that. I have no information as to what the amount of fines and forfeitures is, but I know it is not anything like equal to the costs the Government pay.

Mr. BROWN. The Committee on the District of Columbia were at some pains to inform themselves on that precise point. They called on the marshal of the District, and upon the clerk of the criminal court, and obtained some facts in regard to this fund, which I will state. The fines and forfeitures vary in amount according to the number and magnitude of offenses against the criminal law. In the years 1856 and 1857, which, it will be recollected, were years fraught with crime, the total of forfeitures was $9,565 50, and of fines $1,652 50, and of these sums only $1,482 appears to have been collected in the two years. The committee believe that if you would surrender these fines and forfeitures to the public schools of the city, then the school commissioners, the school teachers, and all others connected with the public schools, would have a direct interest in looking after them, and seeing that they were collected, and that, when collected, the money was accounted for, and thereby criminals would be more certainly punished by being made to do precisely what I am sure the Senator from Georgia would like to have them do—pay up their fines and forfeitures; and then the money would go to a very laudable and good purpose. At present, as it seems by the report, the sum amounts to very little, and if I did not think it would be greatly increased, I would as soon see this provision stricken out as not; but I think, in the end, it will amount to six or seven thousand dollars a year, with a rigid enforcement of the law.

Mr. TOOMBS. The objection is not answered. It is whether we should continue to pay these costs as we do? When the subject was under consideration in the Judiciary Committee last year, we reported a bill, which was passed by this body, to amend that great difficulty, but it failed in the other House, though it was a very necessary reform. This being the only money the United States get for the purpose of paying the very heavy judiciary expenses of the District, I do not think it expedient to take it away. There is, however, considerable force in the argument of the Senator from Mississippi, that it is probable criminals will be more vigilantly prosecuted, and there will be a more rigid responsibility on the part of the officers, if this provision be made; and I do not know, after all, whether it would not be as well to make it, for there seems to be very little responsibility in the matter now, and the amount is so small that the United States certainly get very little, and if the schools will make more out of it, I am content to withdraw the amendment, though I have no idea it will be done.

Mr. HALE. I will offer an amendment in place of the one which I first proposed, that I believe will meet the views of the friends of the bill. It is:

And be it further enacted, That the estates of colored persons in the District of Columbia shall be entirely exempted from all taxes levied for schools and school-houses in the District.

Mr. BROWN. I have no objection to that. The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I move to strike out the following words in the second section of the bill:

"And that whenever the Secretary of the Treasury shall be officially notified by the Mayor that the said tax has been levied and collected, it shall be his duty to pay from the Treasury of the United States, to the persons legally authorized to receive school funds for the city of Washington, a sum equal to the amount thus raised by taxation: Provided, that not more than $20,000 per annum shall be paid by the United States, and that the payments shall continue for five years, unless Congress shall otherwise order."

It seems to me that this is a plain and distinct proposition for the Government of the United States to take charge of the public schools in this District. I think, sir, that we have really reached a point where we ought to stop. There is no Senator here who will go farther than myself in promoting common schools and the cause of education. I have given evidence, in my own State, of my views in that regard. I may also remark, in this connection, that there is scarcely any one in the Senate or throughout the country who knows and feels the wants of educational advantages in early life more than I do. While I admit the great importance of educating all the children of the country, as far as they can be educated in the common schools and in higher schools, I want it done on correct principles; and I want those to pay the expense who are justly chargeable with it. In this case, why should the Government of the United States be taxed to educate the children of the people of the District of Columbia any more than the children in Mississippi, or Tennessee, or Georgia, or New York, or the New England States? If we look to our own States, we find that there is a great want of education there; we find that there are many children there who are not going to school; but is it, therefore, proper for us to ask the Federal Government to take money out of the Treasury of the United States to educate children in the different States? If it is not right in regard to the States, surely it is not right in regard to the District of Columbia. If we have not the power to educate children in the States, at the expense of the Federal Treasury, how can we have the power to educate children in the District of Columbia, at the national expense? Where do you derive the power any more in the one case than in the other? Where does the right exist now in the one case than in the other? This is a common Treasury; and have we any more authority, or any greater claim in right to use it for the education of children here, than for their education in the States?

I repeat there is no one who has higher regard for the children of the District of Columbia than I have, or who will go further to educate the great mass of the children throughout the whole country; but is it right, is it constitutional, to place the expense of their education upon the Federal Treasury? Should not this community bear the tax of educating its own children as well as other communities? Is it right to tax the people of the States, and devote the fund which you raise from them to educate children in this District? Is there any justice in it? This is simply a proposition to fasten permanently on the Treasury an expense of $20,000 annually, and as much more as can be got, for the education of children in the District of Columbia. Where do you get the power? From what clause of the Constitution is it derived? I know that, at this late day, it is considered antiquated and rather old-foggyish to talk about constitutional restraints, and we are constantly met with the argument that, in the District of Columbia, Congress has exclusive power of legislation, and that, therefore, we can go into the Treasury of the United States and appropriate sums without limit for the purposes of the District. When we examine that subject closely, I think we shall find that we have no more authority to appropriate money from the national Treasury for the education of children in the District of Columbia than for the education of children in the State of Massachusetts or the State of Louisiana. It is true, Congress has exclusive power of legislation in the District of Columbia, but that does not mean unlimited legislation. Because Congress legislates exclusively for this District, Congress has no power to take money out of the Treasury of the United States and appropriate it in this District to purposes for which it could not appropriate it in the States. It has no such power. I admit that, while Congress is acting as a Legislature for the District of Columbia over the revenue or taxes derived from the District, it can appropriate them to any purposes to which the Legislature of the State of Maryland could have appropriated them; but that legislation must be in reference to taxes collected from the people of the District—not to taxes collected from the people of the whole Union. You have no more power to appropriate money out of the Treasury of the United States, for educational purposes in this District, than in the several States of this Confederacy. We not only violate right and justice, in taking a fund which properly belongs to others for the education of children here, but we violate a plain and fundamental principle of the Constitution.

I know it is stated in the report of the chairman of the District Committee—and I am a member of the committee, and know something about the reporting of this bill—that the District of Columbia has had no public lands for this purpose, and therefore we can appropriate money for it. I am free to admit that, in my judgment, Congress can appropriate the public lands to some purposes to which it cannot appropriate money out of the Federal Treasury. Congress may appropriate the public lands to aid the cause of education in the States where the lands lie, or even, perhaps, in other places. There, I think, the power is clear, and the object is national; but I do not see what power Congress has to take money out of the Treasury, and appropriate it to school purposes in this District.

If the relation that exists between the District and the Congress of the United States is simply that which exists between the people of a State and their Legislature, then, while acting as a Legislature for the District of Columbia, we have no power to appropriate the money of the people of the United States for educational purposes in this District; and where is your authority for the passage of this bill? The first section of this bill, I think, is very liberal, because it proposes to appropriate, for the benefit of the schools in this city, all the money collected by the Government from fines and forfeitures here. In my opinion, that is going far enough, and they should not, in addition to that, ask Congress to give them $20,000 annually to sustain common schools here. We already pay the expenses of their judges and jurors; we build their jails, erect their penitentiaries, and feed their convicts. What more shall we do? The States tax their citizens for these purposes, and do not call upon the Treasury of the United States to pay these expenses. This community is as much bound in justice, under the Constitution, to pay all expenses of this character as are the respective communities in the several States. It is not right, decent, and just to impose all the expenses of this community upon the people of the United States.

There is another bill to which I may allude in this connection, proposing to appropriate money for the benefit of an asylum here for the deaf and dumb. There is no one who has more sympathy for that unfortunate class of our fellow-citizens than myself, but where do we derive the power to appropriate for them? I think the appropriation contained in the bill to which I have alluded amounts to some two hundred or three hundred dollars per scholar for the deaf and dumb. This community, after asking an appropriation of that amount to take care of the deaf and dumb here, now want an appropriation for the education of the thousands of children who are placed in the world with all their faculties—hearing, smell, sight, taste, and touch. They come to Congress for an appropriation of two or three hundred dollars a head to take care of those who are unable to speak, those whose faculties are impaired, while at the same time there are hundreds of children born with all their faculties whom they are permitting to become deaf and dumb. Their sympathies are keenly alive to restore those who have lost their faculties, and who never can be restored. It is a strange kind of philanthropy. If one portion of the community is to be lost or thrown away, I think we had better throw away that portion who cannot be restored, and try to save those who are placed in the world with all their faculties.

I do not make these remarks out of any unkind feeling toward the District of Columbia, for I will go as far to promote their interests, on proper principles, as any one can go; but I am not willing to tax my constituents, or the people of the several States, to do here those things which the people in the States are taxed to do for themselves. Let this community educate its own children; let it take care of its own deaf and dumb; let it punish its own offenders, build its own prisons, pay its own jurors and judges, as all other communities in this Confederacy do. Sir, the Congress of the United States has been exceedingly partial, to use no stronger term, toward this District from the beginning of the Government. Since this District has been under the charge of the General Government, up to 1857, we have paid to it, for purposes not connected with any Federal expenditures, $5,120,000, and this does not include all the items—over five million dollars for the local improvements, and to promote the individual interests of the people of the District of Columbia. Of this sum $1,150,000 was paid under an act for the relief of the several cities in the District. We have assumed debts that they created, and ought to have paid out of their own funds. Have there been no other benefits conferred on the District of Columbia by the Government being located here? As I have stated, we have expended for their individual benefit, and for the promotion of their local improvements, and the payment of their debts, $5,120,000; and while we have been doing this, we have also gathered from the different States of the Confederacy the taxes of the people, and poured out $12,748,000, like a fertilizing stream on this particular locality, for the erection of public buildings, and improvements of various kinds. I have obtained from the Treasury Department a statement showing the amount expended by the United States for improvements in the District of Columbia up to June 30, 1857:

During what time.	Improvements in the District for the Government.	Improvements for the District.
From 1800 to 1848.....	$6,530,814 42	$2,708,253 88

* Of this sum $1,152,857 57 was paid under an act for the relief of the several corporate cities of the District, and $1,612,249 68 for the redemption of the debt contracted by said cities, and assumed by the United States.

R. BIGGER, Register.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, REGISTER'S OFFICE,
February 9, 1858.

Now, a community which has had $5,000,000 given to it, and which, besides, has enjoyed the profit and benefit which must result from an expenditure of $12,000,000 in its midst, comes to the Congress of the United States, and says it cannot educate its children. Though you pour out millions gathered from the whole people of the United States, for local improvements here and for public buildings, still they cannot educate their children; they cannot take care of the deaf and the dumb; they cannot take care of those who are born with all their faculties; they cannot pay their own jurors and judges; and the cry is, give, give to the District of Columbia, and tax the people of the States; pour it out here; and he who does it, he who votes for these appropriations, is a liberal and expansive statesman—enlarged in his views, comprehensive in his policy! Sir, let us be just before we are liberal. Let us go upon the Constitution, and the great principle of right which requires each community to defray the expenses incident to its own organization.

It seems to me that we are doing a great deal in granting to the school fund here the fines and forfeitures. I am willing to let them have them, if they be any inducement to prosecute suits and bring persons to justice. Anything that will impart efficiency and vigor to their system, and especially to their criminal code, I am willing to go for if it comes within the scope and design of the Constitution.

But, sir, I am getting tired of the talk about their exempting the Government property from taxation. What would the city of Washington be worth without the Government being here? Remove the seat of Government, and the property of her citizens here would wither faster than Jonah's gourd, and I believe that withered in a night. The cry is, appropriate for the District of Columbia. Sir, recipients always cry aloud and press their claims earnestly and vigorously when they seek to get that which they have not earned, and which does not belong to them. I say that the people of this District, like the other citizens of the Confederacy, ought to rely on their own resources, content with the great incidental advantages which flow to them from the location of the seat of Government here. As I have said, $12,000,000 have been poured out here for the erection of public buildings and similar works, on which laborers of every description have received employment at high prices, and in addition $5,000,000 have been expended for the individual benefit of the citizens of the District.

I know that sometimes persons become insane altogether, and now and then become insane on a particular subject, and are called monomaniacs. Well, I may perhaps be insane on this, and perhaps on all subjects; but I desire to see where this is carrying us. Here is a proposition to increase the annual expenditures of the Federal Government, which already amount to $70,000,000. New charges are being put upon the Treasury, and every step we advance they accumulate strength and power. The cry is, "give! give! give!" like the daughters of the horse-leech—give still. It seems to me that their own self-respect, their own appreciation of themselves as citizens of the Federal city, ought to preclude them from coming here and asking Congress to educate their children.

I have already given you the items of some expenditures in this District; but they are hardly the commencement—no more than the A B C. How much will it take to complete the improvements now in progress here? Five or six million dollars will not complete them. There are your water works, and your extensive wings of the Capitol. Appropriation after appropriation is being made, and still we have applications for more. We have already expended $12,000,000 for public buildings and improvements here; and by the time we complete those now in progress, $20,000,000 will not foot the bill. Where, then, may we expect the expenditures of this Government to be carried? As long as I have a place here I intend to iterate and reiterate these things. I have Shakspearean authority, at least, for such a course; and after awhile, perhaps, I shall get the people to understand me. If iterating and reiterating the facts as to the expenditures of this Government will bring the attention of the country to them, I intend to do it if I stand here solitary and alone; but I think there is a disposition in the Senate to help such movements.

In 1790 the population of the United States was a fraction less than four millions, and the expenditures of the Government in 1791 were a fraction less than two million dollars. In 1858 the population is estimated to be twenty-eight millions, and what are the expenditures? Seventy-five million dollars. From 1790 to 1858, a period of sixty-eight years, the population of the United States has doubled seven times, while the expenditures have doubled thirty-five times, showing an increase of expenditures twenty-eight hundred per cent. greater than the increase of population in the same period. When we see such results, is it not time to pause; is it not time for us to ascertain, if we can, where we are going, and what is the maximum we are to reach? If, as the Senator from Georgia [Mr. Toombs] remarked the other day, ours be the most corrupt Government upon the face of the earth, this is the most corrupt part of it. It is in the power of Congress to prevent these enormous expenditures; and if we do not interpose we are responsible for them. This Government, sixty-nine years of age, scarcely out of its swaddling-clothes, is making more corrupt uses of money in proportion to the amount collected from the people, as I honestly believe, than any other Government now on the face of the habitable globe. Just in proportion as you increase the amount collected and expended by the Federal Government, in the same proportion corruption goes along with it; and when you run the expenditures of this Government up to one hundred millions or one hundred and fifty millions a year, the Treasury of the United States will control the whole nation, and the people of the respective States will have very little part in the Government except to foot its bills in the shape of taxes.

It may be said that this is only a small amount, $20,000 per annum, which is to be voted to the District of Columbia, and that this is not the place to commence the work of reform; we cannot get the wedge in here; it will not do to stop this expenditure; oh, no, this is not the place. If we happen to get the place, then we are told it is not exactly the time, but the effort should be postponed to some other time. We always miss either the place or the time. When will the time come? It is suggested by my friend from Mississippi that this appropriation is to last only five years. Let them get it for five years; let their system be organized, and their teachers employed, depending for payment on the appropriation from the Treasury, and who will cut it off? Who will break it up? The appeal will be made that the Government is committed to the cause of education here, and will you now stop your appropriations, turn these children out, and deprive them of the benefit of schools? Once get the Government committed to the scheme, and at the end of the five years, instead of the appropriation being stopped, the probability is that it will be continued and increased to forty or fifty thousand dollars, on the plea that they have erected their schools and employed their teachers and want more money. I ask the Senate and the country if we have not reached a point at which we should pause and see whether an effort may not be made to introduce retrenchment and reform into some of the departments of the Government? In sixty-nine years your people have doubled seven times, while your expenditures have doubled thirty-five times. The one has quintupled the other. Where will the end be? I hope that some effort will be made to stop this downward career. I think this is a fit occasion for such an effort, and I hope the Senate will agree to my amendment. I do not wish to consume time, though much might be said on this subject.

Mr. BROWN. I desire, in a few words, to state distinctly the ground, on which the feature of the bill upon which the Senator from Tennessee has been commenting is placed; and if it is not vindicated on a principle, and a principle in my judgment which every fair-minded mind must recognize, I am willing to see it stricken out. This feature of the bill is not extended to any portion of the District outside of Washington city, and it is because the Federal Government owns property inside the corporate limits of Washington, and none outside. I want it understood that the committee thought the Government had responsibilities here like private property-holders, not only for this object, but for all objects; that the Government was as much bound to contribute to the support of common schools, to the improvement of streets, and to whatever was necessary for the proper keeping of a municipal government here, as any private property-holder. We utterly repudiate the idea that the General Government should own more than half of all the property in the city of Washington, and yet be entirely exempt from all responsibilities to the municipal treasury.

The Senator from Tennessee says you have expended here $5,000,000 for the especial benefit of Washington city. I should be glad to see the figures which are multiplied into that sum. If any such expenditures have been made, they have not been made through the Committee on the District of Columbia, and therefore have not been made on the petition of the people of this District. I undertake to say that during no session of Congress since I have had any connection with that committee—and that has been during my service in this body and several years in the other House—have the appropriations asked for through the District Committee, ever amounted to $200,000 per annum. The taxable property of the city yields $195,000. If the Government owns as much, its proportion of the contribution would be $195,000 as a matter of course. It has never, I say again, since I have been connected with the District Committees in the Senate or House of Representatives, paid anything like that sum on their petition. What Congress may have lavished through other committees, I pretend not to say.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. The honorable chairman calls for the figures. I have here a statement made out by the Register of the Treasury, showing that in 1855 and 1856 the sum of $200,495 was expended in the District of Columbia on their local improvements. According to his statement the whole amount expended for local objects here sums up $5,120,000, and the amount expended for the public improvements $12,748,000. This is the authority on which I rely.

Mr. BROWN. But if the facts were fully elicited, it would about amount to this: that a large portion of that appropriation was for paving Pennsylvania avenue, and very large portions of it for improving the Mall; and others for the triangular reservations on the avenue, which property is yours; and if you did not want to improve it, you might have let it alone.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. The appropriations for the avenue, I suppose, came under the head of public improvements in this statement.

Mr. BROWN. I know of no $200,000 having been spent here for local improvements; I never heard of such an expenditure, nor do I believe it has been made. I do not say what may be the view of the Register of the Treasury. He may count this, that, and the other, as local improvements, but I should probably take a different view.

Now, sir, in reference to the $12,000,000 expended here for public buildings. Suppose you have spent that much money for them: have you not thereby increased your responsibility? When Mr. Corcoran expends his $200,000 for buildings, does he lessen the amount of his tax bill, or does he increase it? When the youngest mechanic in the town expends his $1,000 to build his little cabin, does he get clear of tax thereby; and is it admissible for him to come in and say, "have I not done all I could to improve your town?" If Mr. Corcoran or Mr. Riggs, who expend their $200,000, are not exempted on the ground that they spend a large amount of money to improve the city, I ask on what principle is the Government to be exempted? If individuals build new houses, and increase the value of their property, they increase the amount of their tax bill; and just in proportion as the Government builds new houses here, it increases its responsibility to the local authorities. Why, sir, I suppose that if the Government were to buy out the whole town, all but the suburbs, the suburbs would, according to the notions of the Senator from Tennessee, be required to keep up the local government; and the General Government having fructified the soil of the whole District, would do nothing. I utterly repudiate any such doctrines; I utterly deny that there is any soundness in any such theories.

Now, what do the people here propose to you upon the principle which I have stated? They already pay out of their own pockets—they owning less than half the property here—over twenty thousand dollars annually for the support of schools by taxation. The bill proposes, I beg Senators to recollect, to tax them $26,000 more, which amounts to about fifty thousand dollars in all; and then the Government is asked to do—what? To pay $20,000. This great lordly proprietor, who owns half the property, but who will pay nothing without his consent, on whom the people can levy no exactions and taxes, is asked by this bill to pay one third the whole expense. You are not asked, as you might rightfully be asked, to pay your due proportion of the expense of keeping up schools here; but you are asked to pay one third of the whole expense. And asked by whom? By five thousand children, who come to-day to the door of the Senate bearing their humble petition, and upon bended knees implore this august body to receive their petition, and grant them a rescue from the poor-houses and from the penitentiaries—ay, and from a worse fate. Think, sir, of twenty-five hundred little girls coming here and asking you, the great proprietor with all your vast wealth, to snatch them from dens of infamy! Think of twenty-five hundred little boys, most of them poor and penniless, hundreds upon hundreds of them orphans, without father or human eye to care for them, coming and asking you to take this step, that they may be kept from the jails and penitentiaries! And then think of the Senator from Tennessee, he who wears proudly the glorious name of the poor man's friend, being the first to rise and object to such a proposition! What, sir, will the unclad, what will the poverty-stricken throughout the United States think of their friend? The Senator has said that he might be crazy on this subject, and he might be crazy on all subjects. There is method in his madness. I do not charge him with being crazy; but his old friends, those who have gloried in his being the advocate of the poor, will think at least that his mind, since he got to the Senate, is a little unbalanced. I trust that the proposed amendment will not prevail; because, if it does, vitality is stricken from the bill, and you might as well lay it on the table at once.

Mr. WILSON. I shall vote, Mr. President, against the amendment proposed by the Senator from Tennessee. I regret that on this occasion he has seen fit to give us a lecture on the extravagance of the Federal Government. Surely the Senator might have seized some fitter time to point out the extravagances of the Federal Government than to have taken the opportunity on a bill appropriating $20,000 out of the Treasury of the United States for the cause of education in the District of Columbia. It seems to me that we occupy peculiar relations to the people of this District. The Senator from Tennessee does not see where we get the power to tax the people of other States for the benefit of the people of this District. Now I think the Federal Government stands to the people of this District substantially in the same relations the State governments stand to the people of the several States. I am willing, as a representative of one of the States of this Union, to tax the people of my State, not only to grant this $20,000, but to grant all the money that may be necessary to establish one of the most perfect systems of common-school education in the District of Columbia that the wit of man ever devised. I am willing to tax the people of Massachusetts their proportion of the sum required to erect good school-houses, with all the improvements of modern science—houses fitted and adapted for the use of children—and to establish schools, and support those schools, so that every child in the District of Columbia can obtain a good common-school education. I believe, further, sir, that were the approval of my vote submitted to the people of Massachusetts, not a solitary vote in that State would say nay—not one. The cause of popular education is dear to the people I represent, and a wise policy that shall establish here in the capital of the Republic a good common-school system that shall give to all the children the means of education, will meet their approval.

We own here in Washington about half the property in the city. The Senator from Tennessee tells us that we have spent so many millions in public buildings. That is true. I have no doubt we have been extravagant in those expenditures; but let it be remembered that those millions to which the Senator refers have not all been spent in this District. Many of those millions have gone to other sections of the country, often to reward political partisans, and contracts have been made for materials used in the erection of the public buildings here, and extravagant prices paid. But this erection of public buildings, and the millions that have been expended on them here, have brought to the city of Washington hundreds and thousands of poor laboring men, who are rearing, here in your own capital, families upon the pittance they earn by the labor of their hands upon the public works. You have no commerce here. Commerce has not flown away, for it never was here and never will be here. You have no manufactures here. You have no mechanic arts here worthy of the name. You have nothing here upon which a community can create vast quantities of wealth. The people of the city of Washington, as a whole, have been poor, are now poor, and will continue to be poor. Your policy of spending millions on public works annually, brings poor people to this District, and imposes upon the Government the duty of aiding in the establishment and support of a good public-school system. You have brought here, and you employ here, large numbers of men who have little property, and this imposes upon us the duty of aiding in the support of the means of intellectual culture.

The Federal Government deserves the censure of the country for its neglect of the cause of education in the District of Columbia. Nearly sixty years have passed away since the national Government was established on the banks of the Potomac. Up to 1844, no public-school system existed in this District. Early in the century, a school was established for poor children; and in 1842, only two schools, with two teachers and one hundred scholars, existed in the city of Washington, with its tens of thousands of people. These schools for poor children—not for all children—were supported at an expense of $1,755. In 1844, the city adopted and established a common-school system; and they have now twenty-four schools, thirty-seven teachers, and twenty-four hundred pupils. The city only owns five of the twenty-four school-houses now used. The other buildings are hired; and most of these school-houses are unfit for the purposes for which they are used. We need in this city an expenditure, wisely and judiciously expended, too, of not less than three hundred thousand dollars, to build good school-houses for the children of this city. We have in this city nearly eleven thousand children—and when I speak of these children, I mean the white children.

The result of the canvass just taken shows that the whole number of children in the city, between the ages of five and eighteen, is ten thousand six hundred and ninety-seven; in private schools, three thousand two hundred and twenty-eight; in public schools, two thousand four hundred; in no school, five thousand and sixty-nine. The per cent. in private schools, thirty and one tenth; in public schools, twenty-two and four tenths; and in no school, forty-seven and one half per cent. Only twenty-two per cent. of the white children of the city are in the common schools; and more than forty-seven per cent. of all the white children do not attend any schools at all. I say nothing of the children of the colored population, amounting to three or four thousand, who have no means of education, or next to none. You have, in the aggregate, seven or eight thousand children who do not attend school in this city. We have heard much of want of order, much of crimes that have been committed, in this District. Mr. President, if you want good order in this capital, you should establish and support good public schools, and see that the children, of every class and description, of every race, in this District, have the means of obtaining, and have, a good common-school education; an education that shall fit them to perform the duties of life. That policy will save your expenses for the support of judicial tribunals, and for the support of a police in the District of Columbia.

I shall vote against this motion of the Senator from Tennessee; and while I agree with that Senator that the expenditures of this Government are extravagant, and ought to be retrenched, I say this petty proposition to appropriate $20,000 annually for five years, for the support of schools, ought not to be stricken out. I would vote for it if it were $100,000, and do it cheerfully, and feel that I was doing an act for the advancement and improvement of the children of the District of Columbia.

Introduced, in the early part of the session, a proposition to grant one million acres of the public domain for the purposes of common-school education in this District, the benefit to go to all the free children of the District. That bill is upon your table. I have not called it up, for the reason that I supposed some proposition was to come from the committee, and I intended to move it as an amendment to this bill. I have consulted with the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia who reported this bill. He thinks it may embarrass his bill, and I will not make the motion to amend it by the addition of a grant of a million acres of the public domain for the use of the schools of this District. At some future time I intend to press the proposition upon the Senate. We have granted sixty-seven million acres of public lands for the purposes of education in the States; and while we have hundreds of millions of acres, millions of acres of which we are granting away to construct railroads; why should we not set aside a million acres, which may, perhaps, produce $2,000,000, as a permanent fund that shall forever go for the support of education here in the District of Columbia? Sir, had the statesmen of other days—had Congress when it came to this District, set apart one or two million acres of the public domain, and made a school fund, as you have done in your State, sir, [Mr. Foster in the chair,] that would have brought one or two hundred thousand dollars to the annual support of schools; and had Congress organized in the District of Columbia a good common-school system, the benefits of it would have been beyond human calculation. Nearly sixty years have been lost. We cannot recall the lost years, but we can now establish a wise policy, which shall confer blessings on the people of this District. Next to the liberty of the people is the education of the people.

Sir, the cause of education is advancing southward and westward. The common-school system is now appreciated all over the country. Congress has shown its appreciation of it by granting more than eighty-five million dollars' worth of public lands for the cause of education in the new States. Why, then, should we not, while our public lands are passing away, devote a portion of those public lands, and forever dedicate them to the cause of the education of the whole people of the District of Columbia? There is not a city in this Union that needs so much the aid of the Government to establish and support common schools as the city of Washington. Why, sir, our cities in other portions of the country are built up by commerce, by manufactures, and by the mechanic arts. They are the places where wealth is created—where wealth centers. They can be taxed, and taxed highly, as they are in my section of the country, for the support of common schools. I do not like, I must tell the Senator from Mississippi, this little tax of ten cents on the $100 for the support of schools. I think that it should be unlimited, except that it should not be less than that sum; but I shall not move any amendment to his bill. Perhaps it is all we can do now; but I hope the time is not far distant when the Congress of the United States, in obedience to a wise and enlightened policy, will see to it that the most perfect system of common-school education, of which all the people shall have the benefit, shall be established in the District of Columbia; that the schools of this District will be pointed at by the whole country as model schools.

These are my feelings and views, without occupying further the time of the Senate, which I know that the Senator from Mississippi deems very valuable. I will not make the motion I had intended to make to amend this bill, but will support the bill as he has reported it. I thank him most sincerely for the attention he has given this subject. If his bill shall become a law, as I hope it will, I am sure, enable the trustees of the public schools, and other gentlemen of the city, who have labored, and who are now laboring, with so much zeal and disinterestedness, to improve and perfect the public schools of the national capital, to open the closed doors of these schools to the five thousand poor children now excluded altogether from them; and these poor children, now shut out of the schools, benefited and blessed by your generous bounty, will love their country better, and serve it more readily, and obey its laws more cheerfully, when they remember that you freely provided for them the means of moral and mental culture. I shall go for this measure, sir, with all my heart; and, in doing so, I am sure I but express the sentiments of the people of Massachusetts, to whom the cause of popular education has ever been dear. Although they contribute far more than the people of any other State, in proportion to their numbers, to the support of the Federal Government, they will not grudge this small pittance for the encouragement and support, here in the national capital, of the cause of popular education, the blessings of which they so richly enjoy.

Mr. SEWARD. I think that all the difficulty there is about this question results from want of accustoming ourselves to consider accurately our relations to this place, and the relations of this place to the country at large, and to the world. We are not here mere tenants at will, or tenants for a year or a term of years. We are not encamped here like an army in our own or in a foreign country; but we are permanently here, in the character of a Government. With the beginning of the building up of a great nation, there was also begun necessarily the building up of a capital—of a great capital. I suppose that there always has been the same difficulty in regard to appropriations that we experience now, at every step in the progress of this transaction of building up a capital. I remember—it was within my own time, and yours, sir—when Washington, instead of being regarded as a great capital, was by those who were unable to see its future, ridiculed as a city of magnificent distances—a mockery of a city. It has passed from that stage and has already become a city of magnificent edifices and of magnificent gardens.

Now, as the country increases, (and I believe nobody can stop that,) as the nation grows in strength, and wealth, and territory, this capital will necessarily grow, and every year it will require from Congress the appropriations necessary to its support, maintenance, prosperity, and to its advancement in character as the Federal capital, until it shall become the finest, the greatest, the most magnificent capital in the world. I do not quarrel as the expenditures incident to this object go along. I see nothing unreasonable in being expected to substitute paved avenues for the log causeway which originally was the thoroughfare from Georgetown to the present Capitol edifice. I think it is natural to expect that we shall be required to provide for iron fences, and for walls around the public parks, and for trees and statuary to put in them. I am always willing to make appropriations for light and water, because I know that there can be no capital without these essential modern improvements.

Now, besides edifices, besides gardens, besides streets, besides statuary, there is another want which every capital on earth always has had, and always will have, namely—some provision for maintaining its morals and public virtue. It belongs to a capital that there should be a great population; and it belongs to every metropolitan population that the poor shall always be found largely bestowed amongst them. The poor, with their generations, are to be made useful, virtuous members of society by education, by moral character, or they are to be cut off by punishment, if such an achievement is possible. We have an illustration at this very session of the necessity of some provision for the poor of this capital. We have passed a bill appropriating $70,000 a year to maintain a police in the Federal capital. If, twenty years ago, Congress had appropriated $20,000 to educate the children of the capital, I am very sure that we could have cut down that large appropriation without feeling that you were unsafe when you went abroad in the streets of this metropolis at night. When I see a question of education addressed to a Legislature, it presents itself to my mind in this form: will you save public virtue by preventing vice by the process of education, or will you leave vice to flourish, and trust to penal process for the purpose of maintaining public order, and securing society against the vicious, and wicked, and depraved?

Mr. President, in regard to the power, I am quite surprised that there can be any doubt on the subject. Congress has exclusive power to legislate for the District of Columbia. Where is the limitation that you shall not establish schools for the children in this metropolis? There is none. But it is said you must derive from the District of Columbia the money to supply the endowments for education within the District. I ask where that provision is to be found in the Constitution? Congress has unlimited power over the Federal Treasury to appropriate what is necessary for the public welfare. They are to exercise that power with discretion, with judgment, moderation, patriotism, and public virtue, and if the interests of the capital require an appropriation exceeding the revenues it furnishes to the Federal Treasury, I see no constitutional objection. If this objection was well taken, we could never build this Capitol. This Capitol is no more necessary for the purposes of the Government, or the welfare of the country, in my judgment, than school-houses for the education of children at the seat of Government.

Mr. President, I always hear with pleasure propositions for retrenchment. It is a duty which we ought to perform, to watch jealously and with care over the appropriation of the public money, and yet I never am carried away by a feeling of that kind when the proposition presented to my mind is one of public education. I have looked with some care through the history of Governments; and while I have seen that wars, that the ambition of kings and princes, that public ostentation and luxury have often ruined nations, I believe that that nation is yet to come into existence which has been impoverished by the education of its children at the public cost. On the other hand, in looking through the history of our own country, and other countries, I think I have observed that those States which took the best care of public education, and those States which have spent the most money for that purpose judiciously, are the strongest, the most vigorous and most wealthy, and that their population are the most happy and comfortable. I believe that will be found to be the case in Europe as it is in this country. If I saw any objection to this appropriation whatever, it would be that it was not more general in its scope, so as to secure more impartial education to all the children in the District.

For these reasons, I shall, with great pleasure, vote to sustain the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I do not wish to consume more than a few minutes' time, but I desire to say a few words to set myself right. I do not know whether I heard the Senator from New York correctly or not in his constitutional argument, but what I am about to say can as well be said in the absence of a correct understanding of his remarks as otherwise. If I understood him correctly, he seemed to think the power was clear beyond doubt. I know that on all propositions to take money out of the Treasury, it is very hard to make a constitutional question, and really, in these latter days, the Constitution practically has almost ceased to exist. It scarcely means anything. It is an antiquated affair, a mere paper wall, to make use of an old remark, that a man who wishes to violate can push his finger through wherever he thinks proper, or a piece of gum elastic that can be expanded or contracted at pleasure. That is about the shape the Constitution has got into, and most persons interpret it to suit their own peculiar notions. I know it is getting ancient and out of date to talk about constitutional questions, but I am rather old-fashioned on such points.

The Senator from Massachusetts says that the Congress of the United States occupies to the District of Columbia the same relation that the Legislatures of the States do to the people of the States. Let us take that proposition and see where it brings us. Before the cession of this District to the United States, Maryland had full power to legislate for it; it could lay taxes; it could collect taxes and appropriate them to common schools. That is clear. Where did it get the taxes from? From what source did it collect revenue? Was it not from the people of Maryland? Then if the Legislature ceded all the jurisdiction that Legislature had to the Federal Government, can this Government exercise any greater power than the Legislature of Maryland exercised over it? The fact that Congress has exclusive power of legislation here does not confer any additional power at all. Does the fact that the Congress of the United States takes the place of the Legislature of Maryland, give Congress, while acting in the capacity of a Legislature for the District, control over the Federal Treasury? I say it does not, and the proposition cannot be sustained in sound logic. While Congress occupies the relation of a Legislature, it can exercise the functions of a Legislature and none other. This would give it control over the fund collected from these people, to appropriate it to their own purposes, and not control over the Federal Treasury of the nation.

Let us take another case. Suppose you go to the constitution of the State of Maryland, and it says that the Legislature shall pass no law to abolish slavery. When the Legislature ceded the territory to the United States, did it confer any greater power than it had? It could not abolish slavery, and could it concede to or confer upon Congress the power to abolish slavery here? Not at all. If exclusive legislation gave unlimited power, Congress could abolish slavery in violation of the fundamental law of the State of Maryland. Suppose, for instance, the State of Maryland could grant titles of nobility. The Constitution of the United States expressly prohibits your granting them, but because you have exclusive legislation can you confer titles of nobility in the District of Columbia? Not at all.

Then, when we test this matter by principle, we find that simply those powers which might be exercised by the Legislature that ceded the territory to the Federal Government, can be exercised by the Federal Government. Can you not confer power on the people of the District to collect taxes for common schools and educate their children, as they should be educated, in every proper manner? But the argument seems to dwindle, and the views of some gentlemen to diminish and become very small when they talk about taking twenty or fifty or one hundred thousand dollars out of the Federal Treasury for purposes of education in the District of Columbia.

My friend, the chairman of the District Committee, makes rather a pathetic appeal. He says that I have acquired, to some extent in the country, the reputation of being the poor man's friend. Whether I have acquired that reputation or not, I know how the fact is; I know that the finger cannot be pointed to any vote I ever gave in the Congress of the United States for ten long years, or in my own State Legislature, or any recommendation I ever made to the Legislature as Executive of the State, that comes in conflict with the interests of the great mass of the people. In advocating the proposition I have moved to-day, I feel that I am standing on precisely the same ground. I am for ameliorating, for alleviating the condition of the great mass of the people. I am in favor of each community doing that out of its own resources, and upon its own responsibility. Let the States provide their systems of education, and educate their children and tax their people to a sufficient extent to enable them to do it. Each community should be taxed to that extent which will enable every child within its limits to be educated. I have advocated that in my own Legislature. How do I now come in conflict with that principle? When I go to the State which I have the honor in part to represent, I find there—I regret that it is so, but the truth should be told, and I know it is so in other States as well as my own—thousands of children who need education, whose parents have not the means to educate them, and who are suffering for the want of education. Many of them, if they received it, might be brilliant stars—boys of talent, girls of genius, who would profit as much by education as any children here could. What does this bill propose? It proposes to tax that very community who need money for educational purposes, and to use their taxes for educating children in this District; to filch money from them, as it were, by the operation of your revenue system; to take money away from gaunt and haggard poverty. You lay a tax on their salt, on their sugar, on their iron, on their leather, on their flannel, on their calico; you lay a tax on all the necessities of life, and then bring the money here, and then it is statesmanlike, then we are the poor man's friends, if we shovel it out by thousands and millions to this particular community!

35TH CONG...1ST SESS.

Washington Public Schools—Mr. Crittenden.

SENATE.

My honorable friend from Mississippi appeals to me as the poor man's friend and says, here are two thousand five hundred little boys on bended knees petitioning the Congress of the United States to educate them. Well, sir, how many little boys are there in the State of Mississippi who have no education; how many of them there would come before the Senator on bended knees, asking him to provide means to educate them? What is the proposition here? It is to take money from the parents of the two thousand five hundred or, perhaps, twenty-five thousand children in his own State who need education, and bring it to Washington city to lavish it on children here. If that is what the gentleman calls being the poor man's friend, I confess I do not understand it. I know his sympathies are excited. His heart is patriotic; he is benevolent and kind; and every emotion of his is generous. People in this community get around him and excite his sympathies. He sees the distress about him here. How many thousands, ay, millions, are there throughout the States whose children are suffering as much for the want of education? Is it right to tax them and still let them want and suffer, and bring their money here and pour it out for education in this District? All I ask is, that each community shall educate its own children and sustain its own poor.

Sir, no one prizes education more highly than I do. I felt the smart of a want of it in early life. I know what it is to have been excluded from the benefit of schools. I have my sympathies with the destitute boy who is cast upon the world without a farthing to sustain him. I know all about his condition; I know his wants; and there is no one here, my honorable friend from Mississippi not excepted, who would go further to relieve his condition than I would; but while I should be willing to relieve him, is it right to put my hands into the pockets of those suffering in the States, and take money away from them? It is very easy to talk of being generous, and of establishing a perfect system of common schools in the District of Columbia. The Senator from Massachusetts gets very pathetic about it. If I know anything of his history, he understands how to appreciate the advantages of education; but standing as we do, at different ends of the line, he and I reason differently on the subject. He is for being very liberal here. Well, sir, just in proportion as you increase the expenses of this Government, you increase the necessity for high protective tariffs. If you increase the expenditures and cause that necessity, a portion of his constituents would reap a benefit in the return of taxes in the shape of protection.

But the Senator from Massachusetts is for being very liberal. Now, I will make a proposition to him, and I do it in a spirit of kindness. I assume that we have no authority under the Constitution to take money out of the Federal Treasury for educational purposes in the District of Columbia. I assume that it violates a great principle of justice and of right to take it away from the people of any other communities to appropriate it here. Then we have no control of this fund; it is not ours. Let us be liberal with our own means; let us be generous with what is ours, what we have acquired by honest industry in our vocation, whatever it may be. I make this proposition to the Senator from Massachusetts: let the people's money alone; let us keep our hands off the money of the little boys and girls that has been gathered here from all the States, that is not ours; but let us now contribute out of our own private means; and I will give as much to aid the cause of education in the District of Columbia as the Senator from Massachusetts. That is a fair proposition. It is very easy to be generous and liberal with other people's money, but it is a different matter when it comes to handling our own cash for benevolent purposes. What I am for in theory, I will promote, as far as my means will permit me to do, out of my own individual funds.

But the Senator from Mississippi seems to think, and he presents it strongly and forcibly as an argument having much plausibility in it, that we own the public property here, and therefore we ought to pay a reasonable amount of taxes. Sir, you may go out through the country and find plenty of men not making over three, or four, or five hundred dollars a year, who are educating their own children. Even the lowest laborers on the public buildings are receiving more money in the course of a year than many respectable farmers throughout the country who educate their own children; but he says our public buildings are here, and consequently the Government ought to be taxed. Who ever heard of a county town or the capital of a State taxing its public buildings located there?

Mr. BROWN. Will the Senator at this point allow me to say a word, as it may save the necessity of a reply to his argument?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. Certainly.

Mr. BROWN. That argument has been adduced here before; and I hope I shall have a moment's attention while I answer it. The property of a State, at the seat of government of a State, belongs to the people of a State, and that of the county, at the county seat, belongs to the people of the county. They pay no taxes upon it because it belongs to them, and they choose to have their own individual estates taxed, and exempt that which belongs to them in common. Now, this Capitol, and your Patent Office, and your presidential mansion belong to whom? Not to the people of the District, but to the people of the United States. They pay no taxes in this District, as the people of a county pay none in a county, or the people of a State pay none into the State treasury. That is the distinction; and therefore the obligation is stronger on the people of the United States here where they have the great amount of property. The people here contribute money to the national Treasury; but that is for the benefit of the Federal Government, and not for the benefit of this District. All that we propose is, that being a large proprietor, you put yourselves, upon the school question, in the same relation to the city of Washington as a property-holder, that individual proprietors occupy.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. The gentleman's case almost illustrates itself. He says the public property in a county belongs to the people of the county, and the public buildings in a State belong to the people of the State. That is a very good illustration, and I thank him for it. Take a State that is composed of one hundred counties. Those counties, as counties, contribute to the erection of public buildings at the seat of the government; and when they are about to be built, there is always a great struggle as to where they shall be located, because of the many benefits conferred upon the community where they are located. The expenditure of money upon them brings persons to the place, adding value to property, and causing the city to improve. Is there a State in this Confederacy that permits the county in which the public buildings are located to tax them? There is not a county in the thirty-three States we have now that does it—I believe thirty-three is the number.

Mr. DURKEE. Thirty-two and a half.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. The counties of a State own the public buildings, and they are exempt from taxation. All the people of the States of the Union own the public buildings here in the District of Columbia. The principle is identically the same. What would the people here say if you were to make a proposition to take away the public buildings? Instead of talking about releasing the Government from taxation on their property, they would be willing to pay you a bonus to remain. Is not this the property of all the people, those of the District included? Do not the public buildings in a State belong to the people of a State? This property belongs to the people of all the States, and there is no sort of difference in the cases. It is a tax upon other communities to sustain this community. We find a proposition to surrender their city charter; they want to throw everything upon Congress. Some time ago they had a proposition to make us raise a police force for them, and a proposition to take care of the deaf and dumb. Everything is to be put on the Federal Treasury; and that is so much clear gain for them got out of the industry and earnings of others.

I do not wish to consume the time of the Senate. I think this is one of the clearest propositions I ever saw. First, we have no right to appropriate money for educational purposes here; next, it violates principles of justice to the people of the various States. My opposition to this measure, instead of coming in conflict with the positions and feelings of my whole public life, is perfectly consonant with them, and is in fact but another instance in which I carry out the policy I have advocated ever since I have been a public man. I am for the children of the District of Columbia being educated; I want to see them all educated, and I will contribute as much, in proportion to my individual means, as any other Senator to accomplish that object; but I will not take the money out of the pockets of my constituents whose children need education, and many of whom have not the means to educate them. There is no one who places a higher estimate on education than I do. It is an advantage to the community, to the child, to the man, in every possible position in which he can be placed. To use the eloquent language of another, in private life, education is a solace and a comfort; in public life it is an introduction and an ornament; abroad, a friend; it sustains a man in every position in which he may be placed; it will benefit a man in every possible position that he may be placed in; it lessens vice, it guides virtue, gives grace and dignity to genius. The Senator from Massachusetts, the Senator from Mississippi, the Senator from any other State, will not go further in promoting the great cause of education than I will, but this is the wrong direction. This is taking money from one portion of the community and giving it to another. I am not for that policy, and I hope the section will be stricken out.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Mr. President, much has seemed to me to be said on this subject which is not very pertinent to the question we have to decide. The proposition before us is simply whether we will appropriate $20,000 a year, for five years, to the city of Washington, provided its people shall raise the same sum, for purposes of education. That is its whole extent. This proposition involves two questions; first, have we the power to make this appropriation out of the public Treasury; and next, if we have the power, is it expedient for us to do so? This embraces the whole case.

As to the question of power I have a clear and decided conviction myself that we have the power. Very long ago, Chief Justice Marshall, at the head of the Supreme Court of the United States, decided that in respect to the Territories of the General Government, the United States had the powers of the General Government and the powers of a State government; we stood to them in the double relation of the General Government and of a State government, having the powers of both for all purposes of government. That I had supposed was the universally adopted and received opinion. It was so solemnly decided by the Supreme Court of the United States then constituted, whatever some gentlemen may think of it now, of the wisest men in the country.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will ask the Senator from Kentucky if that decision has not been reversed by the recent opinion in the Dred Scott case?

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I do not know. It remains the standard of my judgment on the subject, at any rate. I understand that to be the decided doctrine of that tribunal. It has the perfect concurrence of my judgment. Now, then, if this Government in relation to the Territories possesses all the powers which the Constitution of the United States gives us, and if with these delegated powers we have also the power of a State government, what impediment can there possibly be to our power to appropriate money out of the public Treasury. The difference between this Government and a State government—and that is proper to be marked in considering this question—is that the General Government is one of limited and enumerated powers; we can as a Congress, in reference to the States, exercise no power that we cannot show in the Constitution to be granted to us. The State governments stand exactly on the reverse of that position. They have all the powers which their constitution does not prohibit; and if their constitution does not choose to prohibit any powers, then so far as relates to their character of States, they are under no limitation of powers except those expressly forbidden by the Constitution of the United States. Standing in this relation, I am of opinion that our powers are entirely adequate, unquestionably so, to grant money out of the public Treasury for purposes peculiarly beneficial to the Territory.

Sir, upon what other principle is it that we take money out of the public Treasury to pay for the ordinary expenses of Government in one of our Territories. You establish a territorial government; you appoint a Governor and judges to preside over a distant people living within a Territory. That is for the service of the people there, that justice may be administered and order preserved, and it is peculiarly for their benefit; and yet do we say that we cannot take money out of the public Treasury to pay the salaries of the officials by whom we exercise Government there? That is as directly for the benefit of the Territory as education would be. We are in the common exercise of that right. Even under the powers conferred upon us as a Congress of the United States, we do that. Can we not do the same thing in relation to a grant of money to this Territory for another purpose that we think inures to the public benefit, peculiarly to the District of Columbia, but incidentally to the benefit of the whole Union with which we are connected? I cannot see, I confess, when I look at this question on the ground of judicial authority, on the ground of legislative authority, upon precedents entirely analogous to the present, any reason on which to hang a doubt as to the power of the Government.

The only other point is as to the expediency; and upon that every Senator can judge for himself. I think it is expedient. I think, with the Senator from New York, that it is cheaper for us to educate these people than to pay the cost of their ignorance and their crime afterwards. It is cheaper to educate than it is to suffer the consequences of ignorance. I shall not enter into this question of expediency. Every gentleman will act upon his own judgment in regard to it. I think we could not make a more judicious appropriation. All the States are in the habit of making such appropriations. They put their hands into the treasury to establish schools everywhere; in counties which furnish no revenue above their ordinary local expenditures, which put no money, in fact, into the treasury, as well as in counties which do put money into the treasury. There are, I venture to say, in the State of the honorable gentleman from Tennessee, as well as in my State, counties that do not pay a cent into the treasury; and there are richer counties, which, after defraying their own expenses, have a surplus that goes into the general treasury of the State, and which forms its whole fund; and that fund they take up and apply everywhere; not in reference to the contributions made—that mode would be entirely useless; for you might as well leave every man to educate his own children, and give no public encouragement whatever to a general system of education. It is useful in another point of view, and perhaps more useful than even in the moneyed consideration: it gives a dignity to the system; it gives a dignity to education; it is an example to parents, a standing lecture to them to send their children to school. Such laws, it seems to me, have operated in a very salutary manner. I am in favor of making the appropriation. The amendment has for its object to strike it out; and I shall therefore vote against the amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I wish to put an interrogatory to the honorable Senator from Kentucky; and he knows that I do it for the purpose of being informed, and with all respect to him.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Certainly; I will answer any question of the gentleman with pleasure.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. The Senator, I understand, assumes that we can exercise here all power which the State of Maryland could have exercised over the territory before it was ceded; and that we may, besides, exercise all the power conferred on the Federal Government by the Constitution of the United States. Putting these two together, he draws the conclusion that our power over this District is absolute. Well, sir, the constitution of Maryland, when she ceded the District to the Federal Government, provided, in the forty-third article, "The Legislature shall not pass any law abolishing the relation of master and slave as it now stands in the State." Now, all the power that is conferred on the Federal Government by the Constitution it can exercise here, together with whatever the State of Maryland could exercise. I desire, then, to ask the honorable Senator whether, that being the provision of the constitution of Maryland, Congress has power to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia? I put this by way of illustration of the principle.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I will answer the gentleman with great pleasure. I said that the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States had been that this Government could exercise in a Territory, not only its own proper powers, but that it stood in the relation of a State government, not the State government of Maryland, not the State government of Kentucky, or of Tennessee, but that it stood to it in the general relation that a State government stands to the people of a State. Now the gentleman is quoting the constitution of Maryland on me, and assuming that that is the constitution according to which our powers are to be exercised in relation to this territory. Instead of taking it in that particular way in reference to any State, he is to take it in general, in the general terms in which the court decided, and which I used. We stand to a Territory not merely in the relations established between this Government and a State, but with all the powers that are given to us by the Federal Constitution, and in the relation of a State besides. Now the question is not what a State has done, but what it may do. I have heard it intimated here that a State may have no constitution at all. It has been often said in the Senate that we may admit a State without a constitution. I express no opinion on that; but we stand to a Territory in the relation of a State, with just such a constitution as we please to imagine a State constitution to be so that it be in a republican form. It is not the Maryland constitution or the Maryland laws that we are to enforce, but we may pass whatever laws, under any constitution, a State might pass in reference to the people of that State. That is my understanding.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. The Senator understands this question no doubt much better than I do—

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I do not profess to do so, and I have really answered the gentleman to the best of my ability.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I was asking for information. If I understand the honorable Senator's answer now, it is that Congress, while acting for the District, occupies the same relation to it that the Legislature of Maryland did before it was ceded to the Federal Government.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. No, sir; that is not my position.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. Then that it stands as a State Legislature does to the people of a State. The Congress of the United States stands in the relation of a Legislature to the District of Columbia, supposing the District to be a State.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Perhaps I can make myself a little better understood by another suggestion. It stands in the same relation that a State does to the people of a State—that is the decision and language of the court. Now, what is a State in reference to this matter? A State is a body-politic that has powers to make any laws it pleases not prohibited by the Federal Constitution, and to make any constitution it pleases, provided it conforms to the inhibitions of the Federal Constitution. That is our position towards the Territories, with power to legislate as we please, to make constitutions as we please in regard to the Territories, as a State might change its constitution and enlarge its powers and diminish them. Just so we may do as to a Territory, except that we have no constitution to change. We are not a State, but we have the powers that a State, defined as I have endeavored to define it, would have.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I confess—but I presume it is my fault—that my difficulty is not altogether removed on the question of power. In the first place, in making the cession of territory by the Legislature of the State of Maryland to the Federal Government, all that could be done was to confer on the Federal Government the power which the Legislature of Maryland could exercise before the act of cession. Could the Legislature of Maryland, in ceding the territory, confer upon the Congress of the United States any power over the Federal Treasury, when acting as a Legislature for the District of Columbia? That is the question. If not, and if the Constitution of the United States confers no power on the Congress of the United States to appropriate the revenues of the General Government for the purposes of the District, it has derived the power from neither source. If, however, the same absolute power is conferred upon the Federal Government in regard to the District that exists in a State which may alter and abolish its constitution, that is a different thing; but if the Federal Government does not derive the power, by the act of cession from the State of Maryland to this Government, over the subject of slavery, it has no power to abolish slavery—no more in that case than in the other, to appropriate money out of the Federal Treasury for the purposes of the District of Columbia. It derives no power from the Constitution of the United States, in general terms, to appropriate money for this particular locality. The State of Maryland, in ceding the territory, could confer no power over the Federal Treasury, because that belongs to the people of all the States. If, when acting as a Legislature for the District of Columbia, we occupy the same relation that we should if we were a State Legislature, we have no control over the revenue of the nation for local purposes here. The Maryland act of cession did not and could not confer any such power. If the constitution of that State said that their Legislature should never legislate on the subject of slavery, the Legislature being inhibited by the constitution from legislation on the relations of master and servant, could confer no such power upon Congress. The power in one case is as clear as in the other.

Mr. BROWN. I rise to ask the Senate to let us come to a vote on this question; and if that cannot be done, that gentlemen will confine themselves at least to a discussion of the bill. A great many topics have been introduced to-day which I should be very glad to discuss with gentlemen, and which at a proper time I think it would have been very right to discuss. I should like to have a full discussion as to what is the jurisdiction of the Government over this District, and I am prepared, at a proper time, to enter into it; but here I cannot hope to occupy the Senate longer than two hours more for the whole business of the District, and I have abstained and refused all day to go into these discussions in hope that collateral issues would not engage all our time, and that we might go on with the business to which the day was dedicated. If gentlemen have suggestions to make in reference to this particular amendment, I shall be glad to hear them; but I hope that Senators will do me the personal favor, if I may make such a personal appeal, to abstain from discussing these collateral issues, seeing that the people whose interests I have specially in charge have this single day left, and that if this day be taken from them, and there cannot be more than two hours left of it now, we shall do nothing for them this whole session. If we were at the beginning of the session, and could go on from day to day discussing the powers of the Government over this District, I would not object; but I hope we may have a vote as soon as possible on this bill. I refuse to reply to gentlemen's speeches, not because I think I cannot do it, but because I want a vote.

35TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Washington Public Schools—Mr. Green.

SENATE.

Mr. TOOMBS. I shall waive any remarks on the question of power, and confine myself to the expediency. I think it is inexpedient to appropriate $20,000 for this purpose. If you allow the municipal authorities of Washington city to tax the inhabitants of the city for the education of their children, you allow them exactly the same power that a State has over the subject—you tax the particular community for the purpose of educating its children. When you give, as one section of this bill does, a power to the municipal authorities to tax the whole property of the District, you give them exactly the powers which have been exercised by the States over this subject. Here you extend the principle, and take the money of the whole people of the United States to educate the people of the District of Columbia.

Mr. BROWN. I think I can remove that objection. There is no necessity, there would be no propriety, in the people of a State taxing their own capitol; but do not the people of a State tax the property of non-residents? Do not the people of Mississippi tax the property of the gentleman who lives in Georgia? The Federal Government is really a non-resident in the city of Washington; it occupies that relation to the District. Technically, the property here belongs to a resident, the Government of the United States; but really, it belongs to the non-resident people of the States; and I hold that the Federal Government is under the same obligation to pay taxes on its property in this District, that the Senator from Georgia is to pay taxes on his property in Mississippi.

Mr. TOOMBS. The Senator answers my argument before it is made. I have heard all this story about the Capitol and the public grounds for twenty-five years, and we have voted commutations to those people on that ground. I was coming to that part of the argument. We have given them millions on the cry that they could not tax the public property. Why should you depart from the rule of making this population pay their own expenses? I was going into that when the Senator stopped me with the same argument he has used two or three times, and others have used; but I say that you have no right to give this money. Conceding the power, there might be circumstances justifying its exercise. Are any such circumstances presented? Are the people here paupers? Are they unable to do this for themselves? It is not denied that they are amply able to do it themselves. Then why not tax themselves to do it? It is no argument to say that they cannot tax our property. In consideration of that this Government has spent a large proportion of money, more than enough to make up what the taxes would come to ten or twenty times over.

Mr. GREEN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. TOOMBS. Yes, if it has anything to do with the case.

Mr. GREEN. It is this: does the Federal Government own any property in the District except what is necessary to carry on the Government? and is it not a settled doctrine even in the States that whatever property is owned as a means to accomplish a Federal end cannot be taxed anywhere?

Mr. TOOMBS. That really has nothing to do with the case, and does not affect my argument one way or the other, and therefore I do not choose to reply to it. I am willing to agree to what the gentleman says; but I cannot see the slightest relation it has to my argument. I am now answering the argument of the Senator from Mississippi, which is generally made in such cases, that inasmuch as we do not pay taxes on the public property here, we ought to pay something to these people to help them to educate their children. In reply to that, I have stated, that even if this property were subject to taxation, we have expended for this District an amount of money more than equivalent to it. In the first place, the amount of money spent by this Government in the administration of justice here is more than the whole expense of the administration of justice in my State, or any five others in the South four times over. I speak by the card, for I recently had that subject under consideration. There is hardly a loafer in the streets of Washington who does not get something in the administration of criminal justice, as a witness or something else, from the Federal Government. Then we take care of their criminals; we pave and light the avenues. We have poured out money on them day after day, and year after year. It is true, that those who attend the Government here participate in these benefits. The public grounds of which gentlemen speak are used for the benefit of the city. The squares here are adorned for the benefit of the private property-holders in this city. Nearly half the money we spend here is spent for the purpose of increasing the value of property, and it does it. If you were to take away the Capitol to-morrow, and the public buildings and grounds, the city would not be worth the cost of the bricks and mortar here, and the city of Washington would sell for a plantation. As the Senator from Massachusetts truly stated, it has no commerce, and no manufactures, and can never have them. It has its existence solely through the public Treasury.

In reply to this argument about taxation, I say first, they ought not to tax the Government property; and next, if they ought, we already give more than an equivalent for it, and we do not impose any direct taxes on them: The people of the States support their State governments by direct taxation. The indirect taxes for the support of the Federal Government are levied out of the people of the District, as well as everybody else, and I want them to pay the local taxes for the education of their children. Here I will say that I very much doubt the wisdom of levying taxes out of a whole society for the purpose of educating the children of all. I know that it is done in northern society, which is a sort of system of communism; but I think it is running out; that is my own view. I know that is their idea; but I think it is not a sound one. I am aware that my views are not according to what they call the current literature of the day, and what north of here may probably be called statesmanship. I have different ideas; and I make it a rule when I speak on a subject to tell what I think. I do not regard it as a good plan, or a wise plan. I do not think it has lessened crime, as the honorable Senator from New York said it did. I have noticed these statistics, so far as they are exhibited by our census, and I believe a greater proportion of the people in Massachusetts can read and write, than in any other State or country on the globe, except China and Hindoostan. A much larger proportion of the Chinese, and many of the East Indians of the Mongolian races, can read and write, and Massachusetts approaches nearest to them. I do not think her crime has lessened at all; it has increased. It is greater than it was before her present system existed. That children should be educated, I am satisfied of; but I think they ought to be educated by their parents, and by institutions built up by private enterprise, and perhaps even by private bounty. The system of levying taxes out of a whole community for the use of a part of it, is founded on one of the greatest errors now afflicting modern society.

I am glad this bill is wisely protected against one popular error which practically prevails, so far as taxation is concerned, because it puts the right to vote in the hands of those who are to pay the tax. The idea that those who do not pay any of the burdens, shall, by a vote, impose the expense of building schools on others, is a sequestration and confiscation of property, in my judgment, dangerous to society, and will, ultimately, subvert public order, and dry up the channels of public prosperity. I believe, in New York and Philadelphia, some years ago, they said let us have water; and all voted for it, and taxed it on the city, and, by the law in these corporations, all the real estate in the city is bound for the payment of the debt, but a man who has no real property may move out, and he is not bound. I say, then, one class lays the taxes, and another class pays them. That is a fundamental error, in my judgment, in a well ordered society anywhere, whether it be for education or any other purpose. In this case, this society being amply able to pay for itself, there is no reason for taking money out of the general fund of the people of the United States, to educate the children of the District, who, upon the average, are as able to pay it, I presume, as any other portion of the people of the United States. The average wealth of the people of this District is as great as the average wealth of the people elsewhere in the country. The people in other portions of the Union pay as much upon their consumption to the General Government as the city of Washington does. Why, then, shall we levy from the people of Vermont and the people of Georgia a tax upon their consumption to raise money to be spent in educating the children of the people of Washington city, who are just as rich as they are? So long as you spend for general purposes, the fund contributed for general purposes, it is wise; but when you take from the general fund, in order to educate the people of the District here, you ought to give some reason for it. It is contended that in a State, whose jurisdiction is undoubted, they take from richer and give to poorer districts; but that, at least, is in the same social community, under the same law. The tax is equal, they try to levy it out of everybody, they put it upon personalty and real estate everywhere; but inasmuch as some of the counties have not got as much as others, some raise less than others, they let them off, in consideration of their poverty, and on the ground that it is to their interest to educate all the people, and therefore, they say, "if you raise your half we will give you so much more." Does that case exist here? Is it true that the poverty of these people is such that you should take money out of the general fund, contributed by the people of Mississippi, and the people of Vermont, and give it to this specific purpose? I think not. Take the district represented by my friend from Mississippi, a very rich State, but if we look at the statistics I do not know how many people in the piney-woods there need education. I think a great many need education in the old piney-woods district in Mississippi, that he represented in the other House. The point was well taken by the Senator from Tennessee. Why should he levy a tax out of those piney-woods people, down in the first district of Mississippi, to educate the people, rich and poor, of the District of Columbia? I cannot comprehend the justice or propriety of it, whatever you may say of the power, whatever you may say of the advantages of education, or the beauties of education, or the duties of the people to provide it. I cannot understand what justice there is in taxing the thousands and tens of thousands of ignorant paupers, who roam over the sandy lands of Mississippi—

Mr. BROWN. Oh, no.

Mr. TOOMBS. Yes; there are plenty of them in your old district—the pine-woods district—thousands; I have seen a good many of them. Whether their property be little or much, why should you tax them to bring money here in order to educate rich and poor in this District? I think it is unjust to them, and it is unnecessary for these people. If they are unable to educate themselves, I presume they will find persons willing to contribute to help them. I would, but there is no evidence of their inability. Owing to the enormous expenditures of the Government in this city, to this perpetual fertilizing stream of living waters flowing every day from the Treasury of the United States, the value of property here has gone up within the last fifteen years, since I have been here, its fifty and its hundred per cent. You make these people rich by your expenditures; you pay the burden of the administration of justice for them; the great body of their legislative and judicial expenses is paid by the Federal Government to an extent that is unjust and unnecessary. If you have this power you ought not to exercise it, because you do not make out a case for it. If education is good, let them provide for it themselves, and not call on you to do it until it is shown that they are incapable of doing it. In any event, whether you have the power or not, and whether it would be proper when a proper case was shown, I say there is no such pauperism exhibited in the District of Columbia as to show that the common funds of the people of the United States ought to be taken to aid them in the education of their own citizens.

Mr. GREEN. I asked a question of the Senator from Georgia, not for the purpose of interrupting the train of his argument, but merely for the purpose of calling his attention to a point which I thought very pertinent; but he did not see it, and in consequence of that I choose to make a few remarks in explanation of it. I agree with him from the beginning to the end of his remarks, and my design in the question I put, to some extent, was to answer the position assumed by the chairman of the District Committee, that we own a large Capitol, a Department of the Interior, a Treasury building, a President's house; and that these cannot be taxed. Why, sir, it has been decided by the Supreme Court that every means to execute a constitutional end is beyond the taxing power of a State. A branch Bank of the United States, in Ohio, was sought to be taxed by the State of Ohio; but, under the revenue power to collect, hold, and disburse the revenue, it was held by the Supreme Court that the State of Ohio could not tax it, because it was a means to execute a constitutional end. So of Fortress Monroe, in the State of Virginia, and of Fort Columbus, in the State of New York; so of all property held by the United States, to accomplish a constitutional end in any State—it is beyond the taxing power of the State.

35TH CONG...1ST SESS.

Fifteen Million Loan—Mr. Hunter.

SENATE.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Allow me to ask the Senator whether that decision went any further than to that portion of the Territory where jurisdiction had been ceded?

Mr. GREEN. Yes, sir; expressly beyond it. Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to know where that case is.

Mr. GREEN. I will answer. In the case of Ohio there was no concession of jurisdiction.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I was about to suggest to the Senator—

Mr. GREEN. I do not care about being interrupted, for I want to make only a very few remarks. My object was to show that no application had ever been made upon the part of any State for a portion of the revenue to support a common school, because the Federal Government owned a fort, or ships-of-war lying at anchor, or any other public property in the State to accomplish a constitutional end of the Federal Government. In the District of Columbia, although we own this magnificent Capitol and other public property, we hold it as a means to execute a constitutional end of the Government; and if in a State it would be beyond the taxing power of the State; in the District of Columbia it ought, by parity of reasoning, to be beyond the taxing power of the District of Columbia. It was to that point that I desired to call the attention of the Senator from Georgia. I shall go into no argument on this subject. It has been sufficiently discussed. I desired only to present this single point, that there is no case of hardship on the part of the District, because they cannot tax the Capitol and public grounds. The same thing applies to all the States, and yet every State must support its own public schools; every State must tax its own citizens, without power to tax Federal property within its limits. Take the case of the State of Missouri, where there are immense quantities of public lands out of which you derive a revenue. We cannot tax them a single cent in that State, yet we support our common schools, and that public domain lying there untaxed is as great a hardship to us as the public property here lying untaxed is to the District of Columbia.

Mr. BROWN. I do hope we shall have a vote. I have almost felt martyred to-day. I have forborne to reply to gentlemen when I thought satisfactory arguments lay at the very end of my tongue, because I wanted to get along with this bill. We have important bills behind this, very important to the District, which I am exceedingly anxious to have taken up to-day. If gentlemen must speak, I hope they will make their remarks as short as possible, so that we may get a vote. It is now a quarter past three o'clock, and we cannot expect the Senate to sit more than an hour and a half longer. If the question of jurisdiction is to be discussed, I hope the Senate will postpone it to some other occasion—take it up on one of the appropriation bills of the Senator from Virginia. He will have some item in an appropriation bill on which we can go over this whole matter, and as he has a sort of monopoly here, let us discuss the question of jurisdiction on that. I would rather lose the bill, though I appreciate it more highly than any other District bill I have before the Senate, than have the whole day lost, for I know I shall never get another day if this be wasted. I will not make an argument because I want to vote.

Mr. IVERSON. I call for the yeas and nays on the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. TOOMBS. I desire to say that I have paired off with the Senator from New York [Mr. SEWARD] at his request.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 13, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Davis, Fitzpatrick, Green, Harlan, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Polk, Pugh, Rice, Sebastian, and Slidell—13.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bigler, Bright, Broderick, Brown, Chandler, Clingman, Collamer, Crittenden, Dixon, Doolittle, Durkee, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Houston, Kennedy, Mallory, Shields, Simmons, Stuart, Thomson of New Jersey, Trumbull, Wade, Wilson, and Wright—26.

So the amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment made, as in Committee of the Whole, was concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and it was read the third time. On its passage Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee, called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 26, nays 13; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bigler, Bright, Broderick, Brown, Chandler, Clingman, Collamer, Crittenden, Dixon, Doolittle, Durkee, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Houston, Kennedy, Mallory, Shields, Simmons, Stuart, Thomson of New Jersey, Trumbull, Wade, Wilson, and Wright—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Davis, Fitzpatrick, Green, Harlan, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Polk, Pugh, Rice, Sebastian, and Slidell—13.

So the bill was passed.

FIFTEEN MILLION LOAN.

DEBATE IN THE SENATE,

MONDAY, May 24, 1858.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 396) to authorize a loan not exceeding the sum of $15,000,000.

It authorizes the President of the United States, at any time within twelve months, to borrow, on the credit of the United States, a sum not exceeding $15,000,000, or so much thereof as, in his opinion, the exigencies of the public service may require; to be applied to the payment of appropriations made by law, in addition to the money received into the Treasury from other sources. No stipulation or contract is to be made to prevent the United States from reimbursing any sum thus borrowed at any time after the expiration of fifteen years, from the 1st of January next. Stock is to be issued for the amount borrowed, bearing interest not exceeding six per cent., payable semi-annually; and the certificates of stock the President is to be authorized to make transferable on the books of the Treasury, under regulations to be prescribed. It is provided that no certificate shall be issued for a less sum than $100, and whenever the Secretary of the Treasury may cause coupons of semi-annual interest to be attached, such certificate may be assigned and transferred by delivery, instead of on the books of the Treasury. The bill further provides, that the mode of giving publicity to those desirous of making proposals for the loan, prescribes the manner in which the proposals shall be disposed of, and makes it the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to make report thereof to Congress at the next session. No stock is to be issued at less than its par value, and the faith of the United States is pledged for the payment of the interest and the redemption of the principal. Additional clerks are provided to discharge the duties which the new loan will create in the Treasury Department; and to defray the expenses of engraving and printing certificates of stock and other expenses incident to the execution of the act, $20,000 is appropriated.

Mr. HUNTER. If this bill should pass, we shall have added, during the session, $35,000,000 to the public debt of the country, and it seems to me that it is, perhaps, proper that I should give the reason why we ask for this loan, and how it is that we expect hereafter to get along with the existing sources of public revenue.

At the commencement of this session, the Secretary of the Treasury, in his annual report, estimated that our expenditures for the present year would be between seventy-four and seventy-five million dollars. At the same time, he estimated that the receipts from customs would amount to $51,573,729, and he asked for $20,000,000, to be borrowed on Treasury notes, in order to meet the deficiency. Since that time, there has been supplied, by the deficiency bill, an amount of $10,000,000, making the appropriations, for the entire service of the present year, more than eighty-four million dollars. We thus find that the ability of the Treasury to meet the probable demands upon it will be some twenty million dollars less than was supposed by the Secretary of the Treasury when he presented his annual report. He now asks for a loan of $15,000,000, in order to meet the demands to be made upon the Treasury, and it is thought that, with such a loan, he will be able to carry on the Government until Congress meets again, and, then, if there be no revival of trade, he will present such measures as may be necessary, in order to provide for the fiscal necessities of the country. If there should be a revival in trade, and customs should come in to a large amount, it may be unnecessary to present any further demand.

But he basis his estimate upon the fact that the different Departments have reported to him upon call, that they will want, until the commencement of next session, some thirty-seven million dollars, in order to meet the demands upon them. The expenditures for that time will not exceed $37,000,000. To meet those $37,000,000, he estimates that he will have $25,000,000 in the two first quarters—$5,000,000 from public lands, and $20,000,000 from customs, during those two quarters. If to that we add the $15,000,000 of proposed loan, we shall have $40,000,000 of means with which to meet this probable demand of $37,000,000.

It seems to me, however, that in presenting this proposition, we ought to look a little further and see what will be the probable demands of the Treasury and the means of supply, not only for the present fiscal year, but for the next; that we may judge how far we can rely upon the existing sources of revenue in order to meet them. It is my intention to do this very briefly. For that purpose I have thrown into tabular form the probable receipts and expenditures for the present and next fiscal year.

The estimate made of expenditures by the Secretary of the Treasury, when he sent in his annual report, was $74,963,000. Since then we have passed the deficiency bill, amounting, in round numbers, to $10,000,000; making the estimated expenditure for the present year $84,963,000. To meet that expenditure he had, at the commencement of the present fiscal year, a balance on hand of $17,710,114. The customs were estimated at $40,000,000. It is probable they may exceed this a little; but, for safety, the amount is put at $40,000,000. The lands are now estimated at $7,000,000.* Then from miscellaneous sources we have $1,046,641. Add to that $20,000,000 in Treasury notes, and we have for the entire means of the present fiscal year $85,756,755. Deduct from that $84,963,000, the appropriations for the service of this fiscal year, and we have a balance for the next fiscal year on hand of $793,697. Here it may suggest itself to some that this is not money enough on hand to allow the Secretary to work the machinery of the Treasury Department. That would be true, if the entire appropriations would be expended in the present fiscal year; but there will be a considerable amount of them that will not be used until the next year. However, I throw the appropriations of the present fiscal year and the receipts of the present fiscal year together, for the convenience of calculation, in order to estimate what will be the entire demand and entire supply

* Note.—There is a mistake in this extract of the proceeds from public lands of nearly two million dollars; but, on the other hand, there is really an underestimate of the revenue from miscellaneous sources and customs; so that the estimate of the whole means will, it is most likely, not much exceed the actual receipts.

Fifteen Million Loan—Mr. Hunter.

in the way of revenue for the present and next fiscal year together.

For the next fiscal year, the Secretary has estimated the expenses at $74,064,755. That was his estimate in the annual report. Since then he has sent in estimates for custom-houses and public buildings to the amount of $1,704,000. These together make an aggregate of $75,764,755 for the probable expenses of next year. To that, it will be proper to add the sum which Congress usually allows by appropriations originating here, not upon estimates, but to satisfy claims and for various other matters. This amount cannot be estimated with any accuracy, but it may be assumed to be something like a million of dollars. We think, though, that far more than a million of dollars will probably be taken from the estimates of $74,000,000 by the two Houses, who, in view of the present state of the Treasury, are reducing the appropriations below the estimates. This, at least, has been done in the House of Representatives, and these reductions, I suppose, will generally be sustained here. I will also say that in this estimate of expenditure we throw out nearly five million dollars for volunteers; for I suppose, if the news from Utah be true, and I rely upon it, that appropriation will not be necessary. I take, then, the probable expenditures of the next year, reckoning them according to the estimates, as likely to amount to $75,764,755. To meet that we shall have a balance on hand of $793,697. The estimates for customs is $52,000,000; from lands, $10,000,000; from miscellaneous sources, $1,000,000; making in all $63,793,697. Add to that $15,000,000 by way of loan, if this bill should pass, and the entire means for the next fiscal year will be $78,793,697 upon that estimate, leaving a surplus of something like three million dollars; but if it should turn out that the news which we have had in regard to the Utah difficulties, which have undoubtedly swelled the general estimates independently of the deficiency bill, be true, there may be some reduction here. Indeed, I think there ought to be.

Besides all this, if we were to pass a bill which I introduced here upon leave, and referred to the Post Office Committee, designed to make that a self-sustaining Department, by adding a small amount to the postages, we should relieve the general expenditures of $3,500,000 of deficiency, which is the sum now settled by the Post Office Department upon the general Treasury of the country. But putting that out of the question, it seems to me that there ought to be ground to hope that, if the Utah troubles should be soon settled, we shall reduce the expenditures below the $75,764,000 which are estimated. I know that the expenditure for the next fiscal year, on account of the Utah difficulties, no matter how they terminate now, must be greater than they otherwise would have been. Still, if we are to have peace, and no disturbance there, I think the public expenditures ought not to go to the sum which is here estimated. I think so, because I find that the entire expenditures for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1859, exclusive of the public debt, was $64,878,000. I find that the entire expenditure for the last fiscal year of General Pierce's administration, exclusive of the public debt, was $60,172,000. I find that in the last annual report of Mr. Guthrie, as Secretary of the Treasury, he stated that the average of expenditure, exclusive of public debt, for the five preceding years, had been about forty-eight million dollars. I think that with all this before us, we have a right to hope that, if those disturbances shall be quieted, we shall not only have some reduction upon the estimate of $75,000,000 for the next fiscal year, but that we have good grounds for expecting a much larger reduction for the years that are to succeed.

But, Mr. President, it may be that the estimate which I have made in regard to the probable means of the Government for the next fiscal year may be questioned. Let us see. First, in regard to the lands. It is known that we have now ready for advertisement and sale something like twenty-three million acres of public lands in California. They are the first, I believe, which have ever been exposed for sale in that State, and it is supposed they will be sought after with great avidity. There is probable reason for supposing that the sales in the older portions of the United States will be quite as rapid as they have been for a number of years past. There seems, therefore, to be good reason for estimating some ten or twelve million dollars during the next year from public lands—we put it at $10,000,000. In regard to the customs, there are more elements to be taken into consideration, and there is somewhat more reason for doubt. I put them at $52,000,000, on the supposition that there may be a revival of trade in the next year. I do this because I find that during the last fiscal year the imports of dutiable goods amounted to $294,160,835; from which we are to deduct $10,591,647 of goods reexported. I find, also, that the amount of goods in warehouse, on the 1st of July, 1857, exceeded those in warehouse on the 1st of July, 1856, some $20,802,390, and it is fair to presume that these twenty millions were imported with a view to the consumption of the succeeding fiscal year, and not for that closing in July, 1857. Making these deductions, the amount of dutiable goods entered for consumption, last year, was $262,766,798. If I have put the average rate of duty which experience, so far, has shown that we collect under the new tariff, that is nineteen and five twelfths per cent., that would have given us something like $51,000,000 for the last fiscal year. I have had a calculation made at the Treasury Department, based upon the first two quarters of the present year; and I find that taking the duties which were received, and the amount of dutiable goods imported, the rate is nineteen and five twelfths per cent. According to that rate of duty, the dutiable goods imported in 1857 would have given us $51,000,000.

If it be said that the imports for the first two or three quarters of 1857 were larger than they would have been, on account of the expansion, I think it may be replied that it is obvious the imports for the last quarter were much less than they would have been, in view of the new tariff about to come in operation; but indeed, when we come to compare the exports and imports, we shall find that they did not much vary between that year and the two years preceding it. I find, too, on reference to the Department, that though the imports have diminished very much for this year, the difference between the exports for this fiscal year and the last are not so great as would be imagined. I believe the difference in the domestic exports of this year and the last, for the first three quarters, is not over thirty-five million dollars. I find, too, on reference to the crisis of 1837, that although the imports and exports were very small for 1838; yet the succeeding year they increased very largely; and that is to say, from $43,000,000 to $70,000,000. In addition, we have accounts that already large orders are going out for the fall business. Be that as it may, this estimate is founded on the supposition that we are to have a revival of trade and business in the next year. If we should have it, I think it fair to suppose that we shall derive a revenue of $52,000,000 from customs alone.

But, Mr. President, it may be said that even this exhibition of revenue does not show that we shall have the ability to meet the rate of expenditure which has been proposed for the present fiscal year without some addition to the tariff, and that all our sources of revenue can hardly be adequate for such estimates of appropriation. Sir, I am free to say that it will be some time, three or four years, probably, before the existing sources of revenue would meet an expenditure of seventy-six or seventy-eight millions; but, at the same time, I think it obvious that there ought to be, and that there must be, a reduction in the expenditures of the country. Why should we expend more than sixty million dollars per annum? Why should we expend more than we expended in the last year of General Pierce's administration? Why should we expend more than was expended the last fiscal year, which was only $64,000,000? And I believe that the resources of the country would soon enable us to meet an expenditure even to that amount. For myself, I believe, if there were proper economy, the expenses of this Government for some time to come ought to be reduced even below sixty million dollars a year; but taking it at that rate, I think that all the probabilities are in favor of the supposition that the existing tariff will soon yield us enough of revenue, together with the proceeds of the public lands, to cover all that.

I find, upon looking to the past, that, whenever there has been a reduction of duties, a wonderful impulse has been given to the export and to the import trade of the country. The Secretary of the Treasury estimates that the annual addition to the exports and to the imports—for they amount to about the same—after the tariff of 1846, for ten years, was at the rate of ten per cent. I find, upon looking to it, that, for a period of nine years, it was more than ten per cent. The exports, exclusive of specie, in 1847, were $158,648,622. In 1856, the exports, including specie—and I include it since the discovery of the mines in California, because gold is as much an article of domestic production and as fair a subject of export as wheat, or corn, or tobacco, or cotton—were $326,964,908; showing an increase in nine years of $168,316,286. I find that the imports, including specie, in 1847, were $146,545,638; and, including specie, in 1856, $314,639,942; showing a gain in imports, for these nine years, of $168,094,304; thus showing an annual increase of something like eleven per cent.

But it may be said that this was in part owing to the expansion of the credit system due to the discovery of gold in California. I have gone back to the period succeeding the passage of the compromise bill, to see what was the effect of the reduction of duties then; and the reduction there was not so great as this. In 1833, I find that the exports were $69,950,856; and in 1841, at the end of eight years afterwards, they were $103,636,236; thus showing a gain of $33,685,380 in exports. I find that, in 1833, the imports were $83,470,067, and in 1841, $114,776,309; thus showing a gain of $31,306,242, or something like six per cent. a year.

If we take either ratio of increase, supposing that the present tariff would give us $52,000,000 next year, we should find, taking either six, or eleven, or ten per cent., as estimated by the Secretary of the Treasury, that the present tariff would soon give us $60,000,000. Take it at ten per cent.; and it would increase $5,000,000 annually, and two years would raise to $60,000,000. Take it at an annual increase of six per cent.; and less than four years would raise it to that amount. But, sir, it is fair, it seems to me, to suppose that we should at least have the same relative increase in exports and imports since the passage of the tariff act of 1857, after the revival of trade, that we had after the passage of the tariff of 1846, for the duties are still lower now than they were at that time; and not only that, but the productive energies of the country are constantly growing, and growing at a ratio far exceeding the percentage of annual increase in population. We know that cotton is destined probably to command a high price, and that its product is increasing rapidly. The same may be said of tobacco; and the same may be said of the bulk of the agricultural products, although the prices have come down. The same may be said of the export of domestic manufactures. In order to verify this, I ask the attention of the Senate to a comparison of the exports of cotton, tobacco, and manufactures, under high and under low duties.

In 1847, immediately after the tariff of 1846 went into operation, the exports of tobacco were $7,242,086, and in 1857 they rose to $20,206,772; nearly threefold. In 1847 the exports of cotton were $53,415,848, and in 1857 were $131,575,859; greatly more than twofold. The exports of domestic manufactures in 1847 were $10,351,364; and in 1857, $30,805,126; nearly threefold. I find, too, that in 1845, in the State of Massachusetts—I take her as the true exponent of the manufacturing interest—the value of the cotton manufactures was $19,237,966; and in 1855 they were valued at $36,464,738; an increase of more than eighty per cent. In 1845, in Massachusetts, there were employed in the manufacture of cotton, twenty-three thousand and eighty-eight hands; and in 1855 there were thirty-six thousand five hundred and eighty-eight; an increase of about sixty per cent. In woollens, in that State, the value manufactured in 1845 was $11,361,260; and in 1855, $15,124,233. The hands employed were, in 1845, nine thousand four hundred and ninety; in 1855, thirteen thousand and twenty-two.

Fifteen Million Loan—Mr. Wilson.

SENATE.

I say, by reference to all this, I am warranted in the hope that under the influence of this revenue system we shall see the exports, even of domestic manufactures, increasing as they have done heretofore, and more rapidly than they did under the old system, in which there was a more restrictive policy. I have seen it stated, upon newspaper authority, that since January the exports of domestic manufactured cottons from the port of New York have been greater during this year than they were during the same period for the last year; but be that as it may, I think I am justified, from the experience of the past, in assuming that the prospect is, that our exports are destined, for the future, to be very large; and if they are, so must be the imports, and for that hope I rely mainly upon tobacco, upon cotton, and upon gold, (for I believe the production of gold in California is a mere question of water and of labor,) and upon domestic manufactures themselves, if I may trust the experience of the past. In regard to agriculture, taking the years 1848 and 1857—for 1847 was an exceptional year—I find that the agricultural exports rose from $37,000,000 in 1848, to $75,000,000 in 1857, showing a large increase in them also.

If this be so, then the probabilities are that if we reduce the expenditures of the Government within the proper limits, if we administer this Government economically, the time is not far distant when the existing sources of revenue will again give us a surplus. In view of that, it seems to me the best thing we can do is to provide, in times of crisis and difficulty, such times as these, by way of loan for any temporary deficiency; and when the revenues increase, when more money is derived from customs, and the Treasury begins to overflow, we can employ that surplus in paying off the debts, and in buying up the stock; and in doing this we do what is very desirable, for we give stability to the revenue system of the country, and we make the Treasury Department operate more easily upon the general business and trade of the country; because, when specie is accumulating in the Treasury, we have the means of depleting it by the purchase of our stocks; and, at a time when there is a scarcity of money, the community is undoubtedly relieved by the mere fact that the Government is entering into the market for loans, for thus we call into activity capital which would otherwise be dormant. I know that, in this operation, it may sometimes happen that we have to lose something by way of premium on stocks; but if we deduct what we receive by way of premium, and add interest on that premium, it will be found that the loss is not so great after all; and when we come to compare that loss with the immense facility and advantage which is given by a mode of administering the Treasury that will not operate harshly and rigorously on trade, I think we shall come to the conclusion that the money has not been badly spent. But the ready mode of avoiding this is to issue your stocks at such a rate of interest that they will go at something like par, or nearly par; and then we shall not have to pay much premium to purchase them at a time when there is a surplus in the Treasury and we are going into the market to reduce the public debt, and relieve the public coffers from a plethora of specie.

In view, then, of the present condition of the finances of the country, in view of what is to happen probably for the future, it seems to me that the best thing we can do is that which is now proposed. Let us provide for the present deficiency by means of a loan; and when trade revives, and the coffers of the Treasury are full, we shall then be able, not only to meet, from all the existing sources of revenue, the probable demands of revenue for the annual expenditures of the Government, but begin to pay off the debt besides.

I had some doubts as to whether trade would revive in season to enable us to get along with so small a loan as is proposed by the Secretary of the Treasury, but he is willing to meet that responsibility; he is willing to take that risk. Desiring, very properly, not to increase the debt of the country beyond what it should be, he feels confident that he will be able to carry on the Government until Congress meets again; and if it should turn out that trade does not revive then, there will be time to make such arrangements as Congress may deem fit and proper, in view of the whole state of the case. It is obvious, sir, that this loan would be insufficient if we had to add to the estimated expenditures the estimate for volunteers; but as I said before, I hope and believe that the occasion which would seem to have required them has passed away. I hope we shall not need them, and, if we do not, I entertain the hope—I will not speak with much certainty—that we shall be able to get along with the $15,000,000 and the existing sources of revenue for the next fiscal year.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, the Administration proposes by this bill to borrow $15,000,000—to incur a permanent national debt of $15,000,000 to meet the ordinary and current expenditures of the national Government for the first two quarters of the next fiscal year. Yes, sir, the proposition is to incur a national debt of $15,000,000—to tax the productive industry of the people for the next fifteen years to meet the current expenditures of the Government at a time when we are at peace with all the world. This is an Administration measure—the measure of a Democratic Administration; it comes here with the seal and superscription of the Administration stamped upon it; and the majority here in both Houses of Congress, as in duty bound, will hasten with alacrity to register this executive mandate. Necessity, stern imperious necessity, goes on the supporters of the Administration to its early consummation. I do not rise, Mr. President, to interpose obstacles to the prompt passage of this bill; but I do rise to ask the Senate to pause long enough to take an observation to see where we now are, and whither we are drifting.

It was, Mr. President, the doctrine—ay, and the practice, too—of the republican fathers, of Jefferson and of Madison, of Adams and of Jackson, that the ordinary and current annual expenditures of the Government must be kept within the receipts of the Government in time of peace; that national debts were not national blessings, and must not be incurred to meet the ordinary wants of the Government in times of peace. Mr. Van Buren alone of all our Presidents, from Washington to Buchanan, abandoned this good old policy of the republican statesmen of the country, by borrowing money in times of peace to meet the ordinary and current expenditures of his Administration. That violation of the cherished policy of the Republic contributed in no small degree to his disastrous defeat in 1840. Sir, Mr. Buchanan is hastening on in the footsteps of Mr. Van Buren. Like Mr. Van Buren, he is rushing headlong into debt, borrowing money, incurring national debts, to meet the current expenditures of his Administration. Eighteen hundred and sixty may repeat the lesson of 1840; and I commend the Administration—I commend the supporters of the Administration in both Houses of Congress—to ponder well the lesson taught by the people in 1840. Believing the doctrines and policy of the Republican statesmen of other days to be the true doctrines and policy of the Government, we who inherit the name and the principles of the republican fathers are inflexibly opposed to this policy by which the Administration is hurrying the nation on headlong into debt in time of peace, and then resorting to borrowing money, to incurring permanent national debts to meet wants created by its own extravagance. Sir, let the supporters of the Administration understand, let the nation understand, that we denounce this policy in advance; that we wash our hands of it, now and forever; that we take an appeal to the people against the adoption of a policy so much at war with the lasting interests of the Government and of the people of the country.

The expenditures of the Government during the eight years of the administrations of Mr. Polk, General Taylor, and Mr. Fillmore, in which time we went through the Mexican war, were, on the average, $43,000,000 annually. When President Pierce came in, he commenced the fiscal year of 1853 with $21,942,000 in the Treasury. During his Administration, the average expenditures, exclusive of payments on account of the public debt, were $58,000,000, being an average annual increase of $15,000,000 over the eight preceding years—years, too, during which happened the Mexican war, with all its vast expenditures. The expenditures of the Government during Mr. Pierce's administration were larger than the expenditures of the Government from 1789 to 1817, during the administrations of Washington, Adams, Jefferson, and Madison, a period of twenty-eight years.

When President Buchanan came into power, he commenced the fiscal year with $18,000,000 in the Treasury. He has collected from all sources about forty-four million dollars, or rather he has collected the first quarter, $21,000,000; the next, $7,000,000; the third quarter, $8,000,000; and it is estimated that the last quarter will be $8,000,000, making $44,000,000 to be added to the $18,000,000, amounting to $62,000,000. We have borrowed $20,000,000 by Treasury notes, which makes $82,000,000, as the resources of the Administration for the present year. The Senator from Virginia, the chairman of the Committee on Finance, estimates, if I understood him, that the receipts for the year will amount to $85,700,000, and the expenditures to $85,000,000, which will leave a balance in the Treasury, of $700,000.

Now, we are told by the Secretary of the Treasury, that at the commencement of the next fiscal year, the $20,000,000 of Treasury notes will be exhausted, and we shall begin the next fiscal year without any money, or with only an insignificant sum in the Treasury. The annual expenditures of this Administration exceed the expenditures of the last Administration, exclusive of the public debt, more than $20,000,000. The last Administration added $15,000,000 to the average annual expenses of the country, and the present Administration adds $20,000,000 annually, over the last Administration, which the whole country believed to be an extravagant Administration.

We all remember that when Congress assembled in December last the Secretary of the Treasury, in his annual report, estimated that the receipts during this year about closing would equal the demands upon the Treasury; that it would be about seventy-five million dollars, and that he would have a balance in the Treasury the 1st day of July next of $426,000. The Secretary, however, thought that Congress ought to grant him the power to issue $20,000,000 of notes in anticipation of the revenue; not that the Treasury notes would be wanted this year, but he wished the authority to issue these notes in anticipation of the revenue which would accrue during the present year. The President of the United States in his message indorsed this demand of the Secretary of the Treasury.

On the 15th of December last, the Secretary wrote a letter to the Committee of Ways and Means asking for authority to issue $20,000,000 of Treasury notes; and in this letter, written seven days after his annual report was made, the Secretary, while asking for authority to issue $20,000,000 of Treasury notes, said:

"Though the amount of $20,000,000 will not, in all probability, be needed at an early day, if at all, yet it is deemed best that the Department be authorized to issue them and keep out that sum should it be required by the public service."

He would not want these Treasury notes at an early day, if he wanted them at all! That was on the 15th of December. The bill was promptly reported, and Congress entered upon its discussion. Within the period of seven or eight days, that bill was carried through Congress, and although the Secretary had told us he did not want to issue these notes immediately, if at all, within seven days we were pressed to hurry that bill through Congress, because the Government was becoming bankrupt; and within ten days after the Secretary of the Treasury wrote that letter, the Government of the United States was unable to meet its obligations; drafts drawn by its Army officers upon the Treasury remained unpaid; and the members of Congress who desired to go home and see their families, and spend Christmas with them, could not obtain the money to do so, because the Treasury was exhausted, and this within the period of ten days after the Secretary of the Treasury had asked for $20,000,000, and told us that he did not want it very soon, if he should want it at all. What foresight! What wonderful sagacity! What an exhibition of statesmanship was this!

The Secretary of the Treasury, in his annual report, after asking for authority to issue $20,000,000 of Treasury notes in anticipation of the accruing revenue, estimated that the receipts for the residue of the year would be equal to the demands for the year; and that he would have a balance in the Treasury, on the 1st of July, of $426,000. Now, the Secretary comes here, on the 19th of May, with a report asking for a loan of $15,000,000 to meet the expenditures of the first two quarters of the next fiscal year. He says in this report that the revenue has not equaled his estimates by $10,000,000, and that Congress has appropriated $10,000,000 beyond his estimates. There was not, I take it, a man in the Senate or the country familiar with the condition of the country and the financial condition of the Government, who did not know that the Secretary of the Treasury had overestimated the receipts by at least ten million dollars. It was declared on this floor, and on the floor of the other House, that the estimates were all overdrawn by from ten to twelve million dollars. I think it now turns out to be about twelve million dollars. Now, the Secretary undertakes to put the responsibility on Congress of having appropriated $10,000,000 more than was asked for by the Departments. We all know that the deficiency bill, which passed here, was an Administration measure; that it came here by the sanction of the Executive; that it was assumed and carried through as an Administration measure, and the executive department should share its full and equal responsibility for its passage. I do not like, Mr. President, this attempt of the Secretary of the Treasury to shirk the responsibility, and to throw the blame upon Congress for having thrust upon him an expenditure of $10,000,000 unasked. It was not in the regular estimates, it is true, but it was asked for; it was demanded by the Administration; and those of us here who interposed obstacles to its passage were denounced in the official journal and by the Administration presses of the country. Sir, the deficiency bill was emphatically an Administration measure, and I hold the Administration to its responsibility, not only for the passage of the bill, but for the use of the money.

The fiscal year is nearly closed; and the Secretary tells us, in this late report, that by the commencement of the next fiscal year the Treasury notes will be exhausted. So much for the Secretary's estimates—a mistake in his estimates which, in five months, amounts to $20,000,000. Nobody is surprised at it. We were only surprised and astonished that the Secretary of the Treasury, occupying the position he occupied, should ever have indulged in such wild calculations—could ever have made and published such estimates. The Secretary made his estimates for next year; and he is far wilder in them than he was in his estimates for the present year. He estimates the dutiable imports for the next year at $371,000,000—$90,000,000 more of dutiable imports than were ever imported into the United States in one year. I read this estimate in his annual report with utter amazement. Why, sir, if you look at the imports during the administration of President Pierce, they amount, during his four years, to $1,146,000,000—an average of $286,000,000 per annum. From this you must deduct the articles on the free list, an average of twenty-five or thirty millions annually during that Administration; leaving less than two hundred and sixty million dollars of dutiable articles annually imported during the four prosperous commercial years of President Pierce's administration. The dutiable imports this year amount to about two hundred and ten million dollars, nearly one half of which were imported the first quarter of the year. The Secretary told us, in his annual report, that they would amount to $262,000,000. They actually amount to about two hundred and ten million, being $50,000,000 less than he estimated last December. If we should import next year as much as we imported in 1856-57—which would be about two hundred and sixty-two million dollars of dutiable articles—we should go beyond the just expectations of any reasonable man in America. There is not a statesman here; there is not a merchant in the United States; there is not a practical business man in this country, familiar with the commercial condition of the country, who believes the imports, from the 1st of July next to the 1st of July, 1859, will equal the imports from the 1st of July, 1856, to the 1st of July, 1857—the largest year of importation the country ever witnessed.

Next year, Mr. President, you will not only not have $371,000,000 of dutiable imports, but you will not have $250,000,000. The largest imports we ever had were $280,000,000 of dutiable imports. Those articles, if they should come in next year in as large quantities as they did in 1856 and 1857, will be reduced in value about sixty million dollars, so that you cannot, by any possibility, have more than $250,000,000 of dutiable articles during the next year, on which you will raise not more than forty-seven or forty-eight million dollars. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. HUNTER] estimates the receipts from customs next year at $52,000,000. I think he will find, when next year closes, that he has made a mistake of from five to seven million dollars in that estimate. He also estimates that we are to receive $10,000,000 from the sale of the public lands. Why, sir, the average land receipts for the last four or five years are only about five million dollars. It is true, lands are opened in California, and we may have a large increase, but your whole revenue next year will not exceed $55,000,000, and it is more likely to be less than that amount. I think it may be, altogether, about what the Senator estimates the receipts from customs to be—$52,000,000.

Now, let us see where we are. We have this year used up the $18,000,000 of surplus in the Treasury with which we commenced the year; we have raised $44,000,000, and we have borrowed $20,000,000, making a total of $82,000,000, all of which we have spent. We commence the 1st of July next, according to the admissions of the Secretary of the Treasury, without any money in the Treasury. He estimates in his annual report, that we are to have imports to the extent of $371,000,000 next year, and that we are to raise upon those imports $69,500,000, and receive from public lands $5,000,000, and from all sources together, $75,000,000; and he estimates the expenditures at $75,000,000. He will fall short of his revenue from customs the coming year more than twenty million dollars. Instead of receiving seventy-five millions in revenue, his receipts will not go beyond fifty-five millions. What amount have we to meet next year? The estimates of the Department amount to $75,000,000, and if the expenditures do not exceed that sum by additions made by Congress, you have to add to that $20,000,000 of floating Treasury notes, which we have to pay next year, amounting to $95,000,000. I understand that propositions are before Congress likely to pass, that will add several million dollars to the expenditures. Suppose they be $80,000,000—and I do not believe they will fall short of that sum, for Congress will add four or five millions to the estimates—and add to that $20,000,000 of Treasury notes, and you have to provide for $100,000,000 next year. There is $95,000,000 to provide for, according to your own showing, and at least $100,000,000 by all reasonable and proper estimates. One hundred million dollars! One hundred million dollars to be paid during the next fiscal year! To meet that vast sum, you have only a revenue, from all sources, of from fifty to fifty-five millions; making a deficit of $45,000,000 for 1859.

Now, how are you to meet this $100,000,000? The Secretary tells us he will have to pay $37,000,000 in the first six months, and that the income for the first half of the year will not be $37,000,000, as estimated in December last, but $25,000,000. He is getting to be a little rational on this question of the receipts. He wants $15,000,000 to carry the Government through the first half of the next year—not the whole year. Now, sir, these $15,000,000 will not carry him to January next. Sir, I make the prediction here now, and I wish Senators to remember the prediction, that we shall be called upon when we meet in December next to provide means to carry the Government through December and over the 1st of January. And this call will be pressed upon us with all the power of immediate and overwhelming necessity. It is inevitable, on the showing of the Treasury Department itself, that the Government cannot go beyond the 1st of January next, if it can go to that day, with the aid of this $15,000,000 loan.

You have to provide for $100,000,000 next year. You borrow $15,000,000; you raise from all sources $55,000,000 of revenue, and to the fullest extent that is all you will get. You will, therefore, have $70,000,000 with which to meet $100,000,000. You will have a deficit of $30,000,000 next year. You are called upon, in reality, to pay next year beyond your receipts, $45,000,000, at the lowest possible estimate. You may be called upon to pay fifty-five or sixty million dollars; but it cannot be less than $45,000,000. To meet that, you propose to raise $15,000,000, for the first six months, calculating to raise $25,000,000 from all sources, making $40,000,000.

We shall have to meet $60,000,000 from January to July, and we shall have only twenty-five or thirty million dollars to pay it with, thus leaving a deficit of thirty million dollars for the last two quarters of the fiscal year. To go through the next fiscal year, the Government must incur a permanent national debt of $40,000,000. How do Senators like this flattering financial picture? It is a truthful statement of the condition of the national Treasury; and I hope Senators will not fail to see where we are, and whither we are drifting. No Administration can stand, or ought to stand, that expends in two years $65,000,000 beyond its receipts. No Administration can stand, or ought to stand, that plunges headlong into extravagant expenditures—expenditures which exceed by tens of millions its receipts. No Administration can stand, or ought to stand, that resorts to temporary expedients, or to national debts, to meet its current expenses in times of peace.

Well, sir, what are your hopes for the future? Does the Administration expect, can it expect, has it a right to expect, that the Government can raise money enough to meet its extravagant expenditures under the present revenue system?

The Secretary says our exports and imports are increasing at the rate of ten per cent. per annum; and the honorable Senator from Virginia has indulged to-day in these absurd estimates. Let me tell the Administration and the Senator that they will witness no such increase during the next three years of their power. This increase for the last four or five years has been an unnatural and unhealthy increase. It was stimulated by the expansions of bank paper, condemned by your Executive and your Secretary of the Treasury. It was stimulated by large purchases of State and railway stocks in Europe. You cannot keep up this expansion during the next three years. We have had a reaction, a collapse; the country has been brought back. Our articles of exportation have fallen about twenty-five per cent. The goods we import have gone down—some of them, like sugar—forty or fifty per cent. They have gone down, on the average, at least thirty per cent., and the reduction of the prices of your articles of export, and of your articles of import, with the fact that we have $500,000,000 of State and railway stocks held abroad, imposes upon the people the stern necessity to be economical in their expenditures. In the year ending June 30, 1857, we imported $360,000,000, and exported $362,000,000, making $722,000,000 of imports and exports. This year, our exports and imports will not exceed five hundred and twenty-two million dollars. Does any rational man believe that our imports and exports for the next year will exceed the imports and exports in 1857? Does any practical business man believe that the value of our imports and exports will, for the next three years of this Administration, exceed in quantity and value the exports and imports of the year ending June 30, 1857? In the present condition of the country, in view of the reduced value of merchandise, and the lessons of economy taught by the experiences of the past year, we have no right to expect that our imports and exports will exceed, during the next three years, seven hundred and twenty-two millions annually. Should our imports next year equal in value our imports for 1857, at the present rates of duty, only $50,000,000 of revenue will be realized from the customs. At the present rates of duties, to raise the $52,000,000 estimated by the honorable Senator from Virginia from the customs, we must import $272,000,000 of dutiable merchandise, which will be $10,000,000 more than we ever imported, with the exception of 1857.

35TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Fifteen Million Loan—Mr. Collamer.

SENATE.

In the face of these facts, the Secretary of the Treasury tells us that

"The revival of business, which cannot be longer delayed, will, I am confident, insure, through the present tariff, a sufficient revenue for the support of the Government in ordinary times."

Well, sir, having expended $38,000,000 this year more than the receipts, having next year to provide several more millions beyond the receipts, to meet the wants of the Government now, hurrying on with no prospect during the present Administration of the receipts paying the expenditures, the Secretary repeats, in this letter of the 19th of May, the doctrine laid down in his annual report, that we should have no revision of the tariff at the present time. Sir, I see no wisdom in this policy—the country will see no wisdom in a policy that imposes upon the Government the necessity of increasing permanent national debts to meet the wants of the Treasury.

In this condition of the country, what should statesmen do? The Administration should come here and propose to increase our receipts, to raise our revenue $15,000,000, or it should come here with specific and detailed propositions to reduce the expenditures of the Government by the amount of $15,000,000. I think wise statesmen would come with both propositions. I think that, if we had men at the head of affairs who adhered to the old republican doctrine that in time of peace the expenditures should be kept within the receipts, we should not incur a permanent national debt to pay the ordinary and current expenses of the Government. I think we should have had here, weeks ago, a proposition to increase the revenue by revising the tariff, and detailed and specific propositions to reduce the expenditures of this Government ten, fifteen, or twenty million dollars. I have no doubt that this Government can be well administered for $50,000,000 annually. But, sir, instead of coming here with a proposition to increase the revenue to meet the ordinary and current expenses of the Government, we have the declaration, repeated in three reports by the Secretary of the Treasury, sustained by the President, and in both Houses of Congress, that we must not revise a tariff under which we cannot, by any possibility, raise $50,000,000 for the next year, when we want $100,000,000 to meet the necessities of the Government. This is trifling with the interests of the nation, and should meet the stern rebuke of the American people. The tariff gives you only about nineteen per cent., and you cannot have more than two hundred and fifty millions of dutiable imports next year. Under the present tariff, unless we have an unnatural expansion of bank paper again, unless we have an era of speculation that is to end in bankruptcy, there is no probability that, for the next two or three years, we can raise more than fifty millions from the customs; and yet we are told, most emphatically, that this tariff must not be revised.

In this report of the Secretary of the Treasury we have an abundance of talk about "retrenchment and reform." It is all talk—mere phrases—words, words, words. Will any Senator tell me what single proposition has been made, under this Administration, towards "retrenchment and reform" in the expenses of the Government? The Secretary of the Treasury is spending nearly one million and a half dollars more money to collect the revenue than was spent by the administration of Mr. Fillmore. He spent $2,000,000 in the collection of the revenue on the Atlantic coast. The present Secretary spends $3,300,000 on the Atlantic coast alone, and employs six hundred more men than were employed by Mr. Corwin, and he asks us to take off the limitation of law, and to increase the expenditures of that Department $1,000,000, annually, beyond the limitations of the law. The Secretary of War pressed upon us the raising of five additional regiments, at an annual cost of $5,000,000, which Congress, in its wisdom, voted down. The Secretary of the Navy wanted ten sloops, at an expense of two and a half or three million dollars annually; and I am told that now, under the cry that is got up of British aggressions in the Gulf, twenty or thirty war vessels are talked of—and here, by the way, I must say that the head of the State Department, in his correspondence, talks very mildly about these aggressions, especially when we take into consideration the warlike speeches we used to hear from him on this floor.

Congress has already saved eight or ten millions dollars by refusing to grant the extravagant demands of the Executive Departments, and more may be saved. Sir, there is no proposition to reduce expenditures, unless it be by defeating all private claim bills. Everywhere, in every Department, we are pressed to increase the expenditures, rather than to reduce them; and I am surprised, that when you have borrowed $20,000,000, to carry us through this year, when you have exhausted it, and now ask $15,000,000 for the first half of the next year the chairman of the Committee on Finance should, in a bill of this character, propose to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to appoint two additional officers. There is a section in this bill to create two additional officers, although the Government has spent this year $38,000,000 more than its receipts, and will have a deficit next year of $45,000,000, if it redeems its Treasury notes. It is proposed to increase the strength of the Treasury Department. I venture to say that the force employed in the several Departments can be reduced one third, and the public will not suffer by it. There are men employed in these Departments who are absent, some of them for months at a time. There are men employed in these Departments who are allowed to traverse the country for weeks on electioneering tours—men who are allowed and encouraged—ay, compelled—to get up clubs for the circulation of political speeches and documents; to organize, in the city of Washington, political committees, to the neglect of public business. The chairman of the Committee on Finance, whom we so often hear advocating economy—and I will do him the justice to say that I think he does it with a great deal of sincerity—proposes to add two to the number of clerks in the Treasury Department. Sir, they are not wanted; there is strength enough in that Department now, and to spare. Not only that, but here is an appropriation of $20,000 to make the bonds on which we are to get this money. I believe $2,000 will more than pay all that is necessary to prepare the papers to borrow the money upon. Here is another economical proposition from the Administration which prates so often and so much about "retrenchment and reform." Some favorite is to be rewarded, or perhaps the brother or friend of some member who voted for Lecompton, is to be provided for by this appropriation.

Mr. HUNTER. The Senator from Massachusetts will find that it has been usual, in the loan bills, to add these clerks on account of the extra duties they entail; and there is generally such an appropriation in order to carry out the expenses of the loan. He will find that in the loan bill of 1848, I think.

Mr. WILSON. Perhaps it has been usual, but that does not prove the necessity of it now, and to this amount. Formerly, such bills came for great purposes, to defend the country, or to provide means to pay the debts incurred in defense of the country in time of war. This bill comes here at a time when we ought to enter upon a general system of reduction in the expenditures of the Government; and I believe we have abundant force in that Department to do all that is necessary to borrow these $15,000,000. The labor that will be imposed, the additional labor that will be required in that Department, can be easily and readily furnished in the Department. I shall move to strike out this section; and I shall move to amend the other section by reducing the amount therein appropriated from $20,000 to $2,000. In giving the Secretary of the Treasury these $15,000,000 for the first two quarters of the next fiscal year, let us tell him, in language not to be mistaken, that we expect him and his corps of clerks to take care of the matter, to perform the additional labor, and that we will not add to the Department any additional force whatever. Let us tell him, also, that we, the representatives of the people, will not permit him to expend on any favorites, $20,000 for engraving and paper.

I therefore move to strike out the fifth section, which is in these words:

"Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to appoint in the office of the Register of the Treasury, an additional clerk of the third class, at a salary of $1,600 per annum, and an additional clerk of the same class and salary in the office of the Treasurer of the United States."

I also move to amend the sixth section, by striking out "$20,000" and inserting "$2,000;" so that the section shall read:

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That, to defray the expenses of engraving and printing certificates of such stock, and other expenses incident to the execution of this act, the sum of $2,000 is hereby appropriated: Provided, That no compensation shall be allowed for any service performed under this act, to any officer whose salary is established by law.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. Foot.) The first question will be on striking out the fifth section.

Mr. COLLAMER. It is a little more than a year ago, Mr. President, when, at a certain evening session of this body, there was passed, as I thought, in hot haste, a general revenue tariff bill, remodeling the tariff system of the country, changing its essential features. On that occasion I took the opportunity to state my objections to it, in all its stages, and especially because it was attempted to be done with only the consideration of a very few hours. The bill was reported, taken up, some little amendments made, acted upon, finished, and completed here in a single night session. I did not profess, at that period, to anticipate with more sagacity than other people the pecuniary revolution which has since spread over the country; but I then thought and said that it was utterly impossible for any human sagacity to undertake to say, in the period of time allotted to the consideration of that measure, what would be its effect. It is always a grave problem whether, in point of fact, the reduction of a duty upon any given article will cause a reduction of the revenue. The very reduction of duty may occasion so great an importation as actually to increase the revenue. Nothing but experience, long observation, and consultation with men who have had experience in that department of trade, would enable you to determine, with certainty, its effect. No such consideration was given on that occasion; so such consultation was had. There were two purposes avowed in the passing of that law. One was with reference to the large amount of gold in the Sub-Treasury, which, it was said, was accumulating, and was needed for the trade of the country. The tariff of last year was made for the purpose of depleting that amount of surplus revenue. That was one of the professed objects. No man can deny that that has been accomplished. I think that, together with other causes, certainly, has at any rate sufficiently depleted the Treasury. That purpose has been effected. For myself, I had always very much doubt, and so stated on that occasion, whether, even if it had that effect, it would be a beneficial one. I believed that there had already, at that time, been an over amount of importation, and that it was probably providentially well directed that there should be an amount of money thus sequestered from the extravagant use of those who were going on in a way of extravagance, so that they should make no increase of importations not necessary to public or private prosperity, and that it would be well to have some check of that kind. But, sir, my voice was a feeble one, and the source from which the suggestion came, perhaps was not entitled to much consideration; but experience shows that it turned out pretty much as I said.

The other object which was at that time professed, was to make a step towards free trade. It was voted for professedly on that very ground. Now, we will suppose it to have had that effect, because everybody understands that you are not to expect any of the ultimate results of free trade until you adopt a system approximating to free trade, and perceive its effects, witness them, feel them, know what they are. All of us understand that free trade is direct taxation; there is no alternative; for I take it gentlemen will hardly get along in the manner suggested by Barney Blinn, who was opposed to all sorts of taxes and revenue, and was for having all expenses paid out of the Treasury, so as not to burden the people at all. [Laughter.] As we cannot always expect to get along in that manner. I suppose free trade is direct taxation. We have many gentlemen in the Senate who openly profess it, who avow it, who consider that no cutting down of the extrava-agant expenditures of this Government will ever be realized until direct taxation is resorted to. It is with them, therefore, a desideratum. When this step was taken for free trade, in the right direction, as it was said, I suppose it was with a view to direct taxation, because that must be its ultimate effect. If it has had an effect in that way, own it; acknowledge it; do not shrink from it; do not temporize about it; do not hesitate and falter about it. You have made this tariff with a view to free trade, as a step in that direction; you need money; you have depleted your Treasury; money will not come in under that system; that tariff will not produce the money you need; you say it will not. What then? I solicit gentlemen who entertain this, to them, very desirable object of resolving the support of this Government from revenue duties to direct taxation, to give me a moment's attention, while I ask of them to begin that now—begin it now when it is needed. If we are to have direct taxation, is it desirable that the people shall go on temporizing in this way, and making large permanent national debts, and gradually shaving down the tariff of duties until it really produces you little or nothing at all, and then to drive the people over to direct taxation to meet all the national debt at one time with your whole expenses at once? Can there not be a little prudence in this matter? If you have made this long step towards direct taxation—or free trade, which means the same thing—will not gentlemen produce us a corresponding provision in the form of a direct tax to meet this want? Bring us in a bill for it. Do not wait until we have direct taxation for everything, but let us meet it gradually; and if we are to have this great change in our system, let it be introduced in such a manner as shall not produce any violent revulsion; but shave down your revenue as was done a year ago, and when it does not produce as much as you want, do not hesitate, do not palter, do not borrow. You took the step which you did for free trade—then own up to direct taxation; bring in your bill for as much as is needed, and if you want to reduce the tariff more, do so, and make your direct tax larger, and so on; let the system be introduced gradually, as the people can endure it. I dislike this paltering and hesitating. Strip it of its disguise; present it in its true aspect; let the people understand it as it is; own up, and provide for it; and if there is a great advantage in the change of system, make that change in a safe and prudent manner.

It is said by the Secretary of the Treasury that the commercial revulsion will soon pass off, and we shall very speedily have a revival of trade, so that we shall not probably need all of the $15,000,000 now asked. Now, sir, any man at all acquainted with the ordinary business of the country must know that that cannot be so. If next week there were a revival of trade, and so much elasticity in the business of the country that importers might conclude to order importations to any considerable amount, that would not in the least relieve the Treasury—I mean for the present. Why have your $20,000,000 of Treasury notes been taken at three and a half, four, and four and a half per cent. interest? Because the people had no employment for their money, and they had better have that than nothing. Now, the moment trade revives all this money will be wanted; the importers, the merchants, all the men engaged in trade, will be ready to take it at six, or seven, or eight per cent. What will be the effect of that? All your duties will be paid in Treasury notes, and you will get no money into the Treasury with which to meet the expenses of the country. The Treasury notes will come in in payment of duties, if there should be any importations; and thus the revival of trade will not help the Treasury, until the Treasury notes are drawn in; and then probably they will be reissued, and come back again in the same way. I say then, no revival of trade can have any immediate effect upon the Treasury, or furnish it with any relief at all, until the whole amount of the Treasury notes has been brought in and redeemed.

But, sir, there is no revival of trade that can produce the needed revenue for the expenses of the country under the present tariff. I do not believe the revival will be very rapid at any rate, but that is a matter of opinion; and, on this point, I profess no more sagacity than other men. I say, however, there is no revival which can furnish the needed revenue to your Treasury, according to the present expenses of the Government, under the existing tariff. Nor is it true that those gentlemen who were the authors of it, and who engineered the measure through, expected it to be so. They never did expect it to be so, nor did they disguise it. They told us—and we are to bear that in mind—that they made it for the purpose of being a step to free trade; that is, they made it as a step finally to direct taxation. They professed that; and they should not attempt now, in the least, to disguise it. If it should produce, even under a revival of trade, enough revenue for the support of the Government, it would certainly disappoint their expectations. I venture to say, though I may be wrong in it, that the honorable chairman of the Committee on Finance will not stand in his place here now, and assert that this tariff will furnish enough revenue. If he believed that, he would not have been for it, because then it would not have been a step towards free trade, and his profession would have been hollow, insincere, and hypocritical, for that is what he professed at he time. Then, what are we about? We have certainly got rid of the surplus revenue. Contingencies happening that were not altogether anticipated, and increasing, if you please, the effect of the tariff recently formed, have caused an entire depletion of the revenue, at any rate. What next? We want some revenue hereafter. Well, was it ever expected that it would be produced from the present tariff, even in the ordinary course of business? If it was, it was not a step towards free trade. Then that one great object professed was insincere or untrue.

Now, in the first place, there will be no such revival of trade. The condition of the world does not require it. The revival will be exceedingly slow, and I trust wholesome. There will be no galvanized process; it will not go by spasms; a gradual confidence must grow up to create business.

Again, according to the scale of duties fixed by the present tariff, if you take the highest amount of goods ever imported into this country, it is utterly impossible that it can yield the revenue the country needs; and if we go on borrowing and temporizing with a view to any such ultimate expectation, we shall deceive ourselves and the community. If we are to go to direct taxation, let us begin by a bill for that purpose now, rather than borrow largely, and finally resort to heavy direct taxation at once to pay the loans and pay the expenses of the Government besides. If we do not mean to have such results as these, the tariff should be revised and carefully considered so as to frame one which will produce a revenue equal to the wants of the country. I should deprecate, as much as I did a year ago, that any man or set of men should undertake to do that between now and the 7th of June. It cannot be done. Human foresight is not of that kind that could by possibility, with safety, make any such provision in that period of time. It was done in a few hours here a year ago—with how much safety experience has developed much more fully than I was then able to anticipate; but satisfied I was that no such tariff, made in the manner that was made, could with any degree of safety be relied upon. I am happy to recollect that I voted entirely against it, although there were but few who united with me. I had no confidence in it. Experience has shown that my anticipations were well founded. I do not deny that the revulsion has entered largely into the occasion of the difficulty, and I do not profess to say that I foresaw that any more than others; but I did say that that bill could not, in my opinion, produce revenue enough for the support of this Government, and I did not think any man, from any consideration given to it here, was authorized to say that he could believe any such thing; nor could I find any man who did believe it. No man on this floor professed to believe that that tariff would yield revenue sufficient to support the Government. It was supposed it would deplete the Treasury, and that result has happened; but it has happened under such circumstances, that I think no man can be well indorsed by it in the opinion he then expressed as to its producing even that result.

I have no desire to take up further time. I merely say that when gentlemen declared that they took this step with a view to free trade, and of course to direct taxation, I am unwilling, when it produces its effect on the revenue, to have them say they will not meet it by a bill for direct taxation, but will go on temporizing and borrowing. If men look to this purpose, I am unwilling that they should lay it to a revulsion for the time being. I am unwilling that it should be understood by the public at large, or anywhere believed, so far as I am concerned, that I suppose a revenue, can ever be raised out of this tariff to meet the exigencies of our Government. I do not believe it. If we do not mean to land at direct taxation, we should take our departure from it now, and select proper men in due time to consider and revise the tariff, and shape it according to the exigencies of the country.

Mr. HUNTER. I do not know why it is that the Senator from Vermont charges us with a design of producing a necessity for direct taxation. He may think that that is to be the result of our measures; that may be his judgment on our course.

Mr. COLLAMER. I wish to remind the chairman, that many gentlemen who are acting in that way profess to desire that result. I view free trade and direct taxation as identical; and the Senator said he was for that bill because it was a step to free trade.

Mr. HUNTER. I certainly said I was for the bill because it was a step towards free trade; but I have always disclaimed any wish or any purpose to confine this Government to direct taxation. On the contrary, I expressed then, as I do now, the opinion that the revenue of this country should be derived from customs imposed with a view to revenue, and not to protection. I think that is the view which is entertained by a large majority of both parties. I know there are persons who do profess to desire a system of direct taxation; but I apprehend they will be found to be exceptions in any party. At any rate, I deny that it is proper to impute to me a motive which I disclaim entirely. As I said before, the Senator, if he chooses, may argue that the measures which I advocate would lead to that result. I differ with him in opinion—that is all. He says it is not possible that this tariff can give revenue enough. The same predictions were uttered in regard to the tariff of 1846, which soon filled the Treasury to overflowing; but I say—and at least I am to be credited for sincerity in that, though I may be mistaken in it—I believe that after the revival of trade, (and without it no tariff that has ever been laid would give us much revenue,) the revenue under the present tariff will increase until it will be adequate for any of the just purposes of this Government.

Does the Senator from Vermont say that a system of revenue which will give us sixty or sixty-five million dollars will not be sufficient? Does he not think it fair to infer that as we progress, it will be but a short time before this will give us enough? Four or five years of prosperity will give us a revenue of sixty or sixty-five million dollars from this very tariff, and will he say that is not enough, in addition to the public lands. It is a difference of opinion. It will be for experience to show which is right in regard to the probable results of this measure.

Now, sir, to charge the revulsion under which this country has suffered to the passage of the tariff of 1857—

Mr. COLLAMER. I did not do it.

Mr. HUNTER. Then, what did the Senator mean by saying that experience had shown that the passage of this tariff was to produce the mischievous results which he prophesied? How has experience shown it?

Mr. COLLAMER. The gentleman listened to one point of my remarks, and was busy talking to other gentlemen during the other part. If he had listened to all together, he would have understood me.

Mr. HUNTER. I think I did not misunderstand the gentleman in regard to the assertion that the mischiefs that were to result from this tariff he had predicted; and that experience had shown the correctness of his predictions. I contend that we are not justified in saying anything, so far as experience is concerned, in regard to the effects of this tariff, because this revulsion, which would have occurred whether we had passed it or not, and which did occur within a few weeks after it went into operation, would have produced a general prostration of the business interests of the country, no matter what had been the revenue system. We are not able, as yet, to speak from experience, further than this: that we find that, even in this year of revulsion, we shall probably get some forty or forty-one million dollars from this system of revenue; and if we have gotten that even in this year, with the small imports, and if we find that that rate of duty, if applied to the imports of the last fiscal year, would have given us some fifty-one million dollars, I ask, are we not justified in the assumption that if there should be a revival of trade, we may expect $52,000,000 in the next fiscal year; and if we can expect $52,000,000 in the next fiscal year, I have shown how, with the loan that is proposed, we shall be able to meet the present exigency, even under the heavy expenditures that have been estimated for. I say, after that, it will be necessary to diminish the expenditures, and we ought to do it; and if we do diminish the expenditures, the revenue which this tariff will yield, together with what will be afforded by the public lands, will probably be ample for any just system of public expenditure. Why, sir, if we do not, of course we shall have to resort to loans. There might be a system of expenditure that no taxation we could resort to would ever meet. We can only impose a revenue system with a view to what are the just wants of the country and the Government; and I say, with a view to those wants, we are justified in the opinion that the tariff of 1857, in addition to the public lands, will probably give us enough. We are certainly justified in the expectation that it will annually increase in amount, because we find from experience, we find from the experience of the tariff of 1846, that the annual increase of exportations and importations was something like ten per cent. a year giving a consequent increase of revenue. If we suppose anything like that is to happen in the future in regard to the amount which would be raised in an ordinary tariff, by the tariff of 1857, on importations, we see the time will soon come when even this tariff will give us an adequate revenue.

Sir, I have heard no man here declare or advocate the opinion that this Government ought to be supported by a system of direct taxation. When the day comes that any party shall commit themselves to that doctrine, they will do so; but until they do it, they are not fairly to be charged with entertaining it, because they submit a system of revenue upon arguments and upon experience which they think show that it will be amply sufficient for all the just wants of the Government. They may be mistaken in this; they may be mistaken in their facts; their inference may be unjust—all that is a fair subject of argument; but that they intend any such thing as is charged upon them, I utterly deny, so far as I am acquainted with their purposes and objects.

Mr. HAYNE. Mr. President, one word to my distinguished friend from Vermont; and I think I know him so well that I may feel certain, if his private revenue had been cut down this year to such a point that he would have been unable to sustain his family comfortably, he would not hesitate to do so upon his own credit; I am sure he would do it. Now, sir, I have clearly ascertained the fact in relation to the imports at Charleston, that, notwithstanding the crisis, we have imported and sold goods to the amount of only one third less than we did the previous prosperous year. I know many a friend who has been cut down in his private revenue one half, and I know that in July he will get his old full revenue. I cannot have a doubt but that the next year will give this Government a revenue which will place it in the position we desire. I feel perfectly satisfied that this will be the case; and surely, Senators, if it were not the case, you appreciate the high duties you have to perform; you have the credit of the country to sustain; and if it is necessary to borrow money in order to obtain funds for the legitimate purposes of the Government, you will do so rather than give away valuable property for no consideration.

In the present state of things, looking to the main rine of the world, would you, because you have not a full Treasury, think for a moment of reducing appropriations for war steamers; feeling, as you must all feel, and knowing, as you all know, much better than I do, that really it is the great question of this country. With such sea-ports as we have, with such a vast coast, and so many towns and cities, how is safety to be attained, how is the honorable condition of the country to be sustained unless you have a navy of proper size? It seems to me that we ought not to falter in our course with regard to the maintenance of a navy, because of a crisis which is less important than that of 1837. We are recovering from its effects daily, but we have been taught prudence, and people will not lend readily, except to the Government.

I must state one fact to the Senator from Massachusetts, who has mentioned the name of General Jackson, as one who was remarkable for economy. When that great man came into the Senate of the United States he was placed at the head of the Military Committee, and he reported a bill which embraced heavier expenditures than I have ever known reported in this House. This was done some time after the war, when our Treasury was bankrupt; but he had profited from experience; he knew that the credit of his country was good, and he desired to see the country properly defended. It is now hardly any better defended than it was at the commencement of that war; and under the circumstances, I should really be sorry to see any great opposition made to legitimate appropriations, on account of the crisis of which we have heard so much.

Mr. WILSON. I ask for the yeas and nays on my motion to strike out the fifth section of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BIGLER. Before voting on the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts, I desire to suggest an amendment to a different part of the bill, which may affect the question of the clerkships. The second section provides for the issuing of the stock. The second proviso of the second section reads as follows:

"And provided also, That whenever required, the Secretary of the Treasury may cause coupons of semi-annual interest payable thereon to be attached to certificates issued under this act."

Required by whom and required when? By the parties making the loan at the time of issuing the loan, or at any subsequent period? The language is indefinite, and I propose to strike it out entirely. I am in favor of making this loan a coupon loan. Loans of this character are no longer an experiment; they can be made with entire safety; they are preferred to any other character of loan; they have great convenience over a loan transferable only on the books of the Department; and I shall propose at the proper time to strike out that proviso and insert at the end of the third line of the second section, after the word "semi-annually," the words, "with coupons for the semi-annual interest attached to the certificates of stock thus created," so as to read:

"Stock shall be issued for the amount so borrowed, bearing interest not exceeding six per centum per annum, payable semi-annually, with coupons for the semi-annual interest attached to the certificates of stock thus created."

The effect of the amendments I suggest will be to dispense with a great deal of labor in the Register's department. A bond, with coupons attached, is transferable from hand to hand. A loan, transferable only on the books, is accompanied with a great deal of labor in the Department. Now, if we are to have a coupon loan, I am not willing to allow that to be a question with those who make the loan, but let it be decided by Congress. Then we shall have the benefit of this species of loan, which is always preferred to a loan transferable on the books. If the notice be for a loan with coupons attached, it will be more valuable in the market; and we may as well decide that fact as leave it to the option of those who may propose for the loan. By the amendment I suggest, I think we could dispense with at least one of these clerkships, if not with both, because the amount of labor which will accompany a loan with coupons attached must be very small, whilst we can all understand that where it is necessary to transfer the loan upon the books the labor is very considerable. I cannot get my amendment in now; but I suggest it for the purpose of having its influence upon the decision on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. REID. I would ask the Senator whether the additional signatures on the coupon bonds would not cause as much labor as the transfer on the books, or even perhaps more?

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator from North Carolina will understand that unless this amendment be made, the bonds are to be transferred at the Treasury, and the coupons, too, if anybody desires it, and that will make double labor.

Mr. COLLAMER. I would suggest, for the convenience, at least, of voting, that the Senator from Massachusetts withdraw his amendment until we try that of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WILSON. If the Senator from Pennsylvania desires to make his motion now, I will withdraw my amendment for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. FOOT.) By unanimous consent, the yeas and nays having been ordered, the amendment may be withdrawn. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. BIGLER. I ask the attention of the chairman of the Finance Committee to my proposition. I propose to strike out the second proviso to the second section, and to insert, at the end of the third line of that section, the words "with coupons for the semi-annual interest attached to the certificates of stock thus created." The loan will then be a coupon loan; the coupons will be attached to the certificates of stock. There will be no discretion vested in the Department or in those who propose to loan the money, on that point. The effect of my amendment will be to fix the loan as a coupon loan.

Mr. HUNTER. The difference between the bill and the provision of the Senator from Pennsylvania, if I understand it, is this: he proposes to require this to be a coupon loan, whether the bidder desires it or not; and the bill leaves it to the option of the bidder to say whether his bonds shall have coupons attached, or whether they shall be transferable on the books of the Department. It is true that, in general, the coupons are preferred, but it sometimes happens that the other form of loan is preferred. Persons who are acting in a fiduciary capacity, guardians and trustees, sometimes prefer the other form of bond, because the dangers and risks of loss are less than with the coupons. If you lose the coupon, you lose the interest. Perhaps it is quite as well to leave this matter as the Department desired to leave it, optional with the bidder to say whether he will take it as a coupon bond or not. I do not feel a great deal of interest in the amendment myself; I do not care a great deal what may be the form of the bond; but I rather incline to think it is better to leave the provision as it stands in the bill.

Mr. SEWARD. If these are all coupon bonds, the loan must be reimbursable at a fixed future day—five years, or ten years, or fifteen years—because you issue the coupons at the time of issuing the bonds; but the bill, as I understand, provides that the United States may reimburse the loan whenever they have the ability to do so. How can they reimburse it, if the transferable coupons are in everybody's hands?

Mr. HUNTER. The bill provides that it may be reimbursed at any time after fifteen years.

Mr. CAMERON. I think the amendment of my colleague is a very just one; and if that be adopted, I hope it will be followed by another, which I propose to offer. Coupon bonds, in the estimation of money-lenders, are always considered much more valuable than bonds without coupons. The objection made by the Senator from Virginia is not a good one. He says the coupons may be lost, and therefore persons who are trustees prefer the other form of loan. It is not so. The coupon is not more likely to be lost than the certificate or check of the Treasury transmitted through the mail. A coupon bond will be taken as readily in the market for five per cent. as another bond for six. The holder may save taxes by having coupon bonds. In many States loans are taxed. The State of Pennsylvania has a particular tax on her own debt, which is taken from the holder of the bond when the interest is paid. I remember that when my colleague was Governor of Pennsylvania, one of our loans was offered in the market as a coupon loan—the first experiment of the kind made in our State—and the loan was taken at rates varying from four to four and a half per cent., when our ordinary five per cent. bonds were selling for eighty cents on the dollar. I have no doubt that would be the case in regard to this loan; and if this amendment be adopted, I shall propose to reduce the rate of interest from six to five per cent. I am satisfied that at the present moment a five per cent. loan would be taken very readily, and at a premium. I believe that after awhile the prosperity of which we hear so much will come, but it will not come so soon as gentlemen imagine. When it shall come, the holders of these bonds will be willing to sell them. But for the present our country is full of money; men fear that they can get nothing for it; and they will be very glad to take a loan of the United States at five per cent. I shall vote for the amendment of my colleague, and then propose the one I have suggested.

Mr. POLK. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee a question for my own information; and that is; whether the necessity for additional clerks does not grow entirely out of the necessity of registering and transferring the bonds that may be issued?

Mr. CAMERON. I will reply to that question if the Senator from Missouri will permit me to do so. These coupons will be signed by the engraver. They require no labor in transferring; they require no signing except the name of the Secretary of the Treasury under the bond and immediately above the coupons. Each of the coupons will have its date fixed upon it, and the signature of the Secretary of the Treasury engraved. When the holder of a bond desires to get his interest at the end of a half year, he will inclose his coupon to the Secretary of the Treasury, and receive in turn a check. It is a very simple process.

Mr. POLK. Then, as I understand the Senator from Pennsylvania, if all the bonds issued should be coupon bonds, there would be no necessity for additional clerical force at all.

Mr. CAMERON. I think not.

Mr. HUNTER. In regard to that, I would say that I apprehend we shall not get rid of a necessity for clerical force by changing the character of the bond. I think it probable, though I am not familiar with the details of the books they have to keep, that this loan will create a necessity for a new set of accounts, a new set of books; and I imagine a clerk would be necessary, though I do not know with certainty.

Mr. POLK. While I am in favor of the loan, I certainly do not want it to operate an increase of governmental officers.

Mr. COLLAMER. I hope the Senator from Pennsylvania will include more words in his motion to strike out. As it was read by the Clerk, it would still leave remaining in the bill these words in lines nine and ten:

"Which certificates may be transferred on the books of the Treasury, under such regulations as may be established by the Secretary of the Treasury."

Now, if coupon bonds are to be issued, these words should be stricken out.

Mr. BIGLER. Yes, sir; I propose to strike out the entire proviso.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I now renew my motion to strike out the fifth section.

Mr. BIGLER. Before that question is taken I move to strike out "two" and insert "one." I think one clerk will be certainly necessary to open the books.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That motion will be first in order. Will the Senator from Pennsylvania indicate where his amendment is to be?

Mr. BIGLER. It is to strike out the fifth and sixth lines of the section in the following words:

"And an additional clerk of the same class and salary in the office of the Treasurer of the United States."

Mr. HUNTER. In regard to these clerks, I am not familiar enough with the details to say what are to be the precise duties of each, but I know they are esteemed to be very necessary in the Department. I know that in the bill providing for a loan in 1848, additional clerks were given. These debts create additional and unsual business in the Department, which makes it necessary, I believe, to provide some additional clerical force. It is the only case this session where I have agreed to vote additional clerks.

Mr. IVERSON. I wish to ask the Senator from Virginia a question. These two clerks seem to be appointed for all time to come. What use for them will there be when the loan is exhausted?

Mr. HUNTER. If the Senator desires to limit it, he can fix some time. I presume their services will be required for more than a year. I cannot fix the precise time. He might, if he chose, hereafter watch a chance to cut down two clerks in this Department.

Mr. BIGLER's amendment to the fifth section was agreed to; there being, on a division—ayes 24, noes 16.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now recurs on striking out the fifth section as modified.

Mr. WILSON called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and, being taken, resulted—yeas 26, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bell, Benjamin, Broderick, Cameron, Chandler, Collamer, Crittenden, Dixon, Doolittle, Durkee, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Harlan, Iverson, Johnson of Tennessee, Kennedy, King, Polk, Fugh, Rice, Seward, Simmons, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bigler, Bright, Clay, Clingman, Fitzpatrick, Gwin, Hammond, Hayne, Henderson, Houston, Hunter, Jones, Mason, Pearce, Reid, Sebastian, Stuart, Thomson of New Jersey, and Wright—20.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I believe that $2,000 will be ample to meet all the necessary expenses; but in order to be what I consider very liberal, I move to strike out "$20,000" and insert "$5,000" in the sixth section.

Mr. HUNTER. I hope the Senate will not reduce that amount. I believe the Secretary has estimated for no more than is necessary in order to carry out the law if it should be passed.

While up, I will state that I was mistaken when I told the Senate that, in the loan bill of 1848, there was a provision for two clerks. There was not; but there was a provision in regard to these contingent expenses, and here it is:

"And the said Secretary may pay such expenses as may be necessarily incurred in printing and issuing certificates of stock: Provided, however, That the employment of agents, and other expenses incident to this act, shall not in all exceed the sum of $16,000; which sum of $16,000 is hereby appropriated for these purposes, and shall be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated: And provided, That no compensation shall be allowed to any officer whose salary is fixed by law, for any service performed by him in the execution of this act."

Mr. COLLAMER. How much was that loan?

Mr. HUNTER. Sixteen million dollars.

Mr. SIMMONS. I would ask if the same plates which were then used are not now on hand, and may not be used for striking off these bonds? Have we not plates engraved for striking off the bonds?

Mr. HUNTER. I believe not. I know they had to make new plates for the recent issue of Treasury notes. I presume there will be new plates for these bonds. I cannot speak with certainty.

Mr. COLLAMER. We have not had coupon bonds heretofore, and we must have new plates for these.

Mr. CAMERON. The sum of $5,000 will be ample to meet all the expenses of engraving these bonds. The whole engraving of an ordinary bank, with a circulation of four or five hundred thousand dollars, and notes of different denominations, from five to one hundred dollars, will not cost more than one thousand dollars. Here is a proposition to issue bonds of $1,000 each.

Mr. HUNTER. One hundred.

Mr. CAMERON. I hope to fix it at a $1,000, but let it be $100; and $5,000 will still be enough. The old plates for the $16,000,000 loan of 1848 would answer now just as well as before, and I take it, then, $5,000 would be a large sum. I suppose that the $16,000 was appropriated for the purpose of employing clerks. There is no appropriation distinctly for clerks there, but I have no doubt it was intended for a corps of clerks, agents, and all that sort of thing, so common about a Government like ours; and they will be employed if we suffer them. There is nothing so easy as to get a great many men about a job of the Government. As soon as the Secretary of the Treasury gives notice that he wants this engraving done, you will have one hundred engravers here, every one anxious to do this work. If it is given out by contract, you will get competition, and the work will be done for a very small sum; and after the coupons shall have been engraved, there will be nothing more to do except that the Secretary of the Treasury will have to sign his name to the bonds. He might have some trouble in doing that. He might do like an old Governor of Pennsylvania, who, to get rid of the trouble of writing his name very often, had it engraved, and had a clerk to stamp it; but I take it Mr. Cobb will write his name with a good old quill.

Mr. COLLAMER. It is the Treasurer who signs the bonds—not the Secretary.

Mr. CAMERON. Then, if he is a subordinate, he will go to work and do it. Those in higher places generally put off the work; but I have no doubt the officer will sign his name, and the cost of the necessary engraving will be nothing like $5,000.

Mr. SEWARD called for the yeas and nays on the amendment, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 27, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benjamin, Broderick, Cameron, Chandler, Collamer, Dixon, Doolittle, Durkee, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Harlan, Houston, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Kennedy, King, Polk, Fugh, Rice, Seward, Simmons, Thompson of Kentucky, Thomson of New Jersey, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bigler, Bright, Brown, Clay, Clingman, Fitzpatrick, Gwin, Hammond, Hayne, Henderson, Hunter, Iverson, Jones, Mason, Pearce, Reid, Sebastian, Stuart, Toombs, and Wright—21.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CAMERON. I now move that the rate of interest be reduced from six to five per cent. I feel confident that having adopted the plan of coupon bonds, you will be able to have the loan taken up from one half to one per cent. cheaper than it would be without coupons. I have no doubt, in the present condition of the money market, the loan will be taken at five per cent., or less.

The difference in the payment of interest between a five and a six per cent., in fifteen years, will be $900,000. It may be said that the Government is not required by the bill to give six per cent., but I wish to press upon the minds of the Senate that the sum fixed in the law will be an indication to bidders as to what amount the Government expects to pay. Men coming here to bid for this loan will make such a bid as will enable them to get the highest fraction for it. If you fix the rate at six per cent., the fraction will approach six per cent. If you fix it at five, the fraction will approach five per cent. There is now plenty of money in the country seeking this sort of investment, because the business of the country is prostrated, there is no investment in which men can put their money, and you find the banks in New York, Philadelphia, and other cities of the Union, overflowing with specie. Men are glad to get any amount of interest rather than let their capital be unproductive. The other day, when the Democracy here issued the Treasury notes, the country banks of Pennsylvania came up and offered to take them for a sum less than four per cent.; and so they will gladly take this loan at less than five per cent.

Mr. HUNTER. As the bill now stands, it is left to the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, provided the interest does not exceed six per centum. It seems to me it is wise to leave that discretion to him, especially as there is a provision that the loan shall not be put out at less than par. Of course, he will put it out at the lowest interest which will enable him to get par for the stock. He will be interested in doing that for the sake of his own reputation. I do not think it would be safe to reduce the limit. Suppose that, after we adjourn, events were to occur which might make it impossible to get the loan for par at five per cent.; the provision, then, would be worthless to him. On the other hand, if he can get it at par for five per cent., we have every assurance that he will do so. His own reputation would induce him to do it.

Mr. MASON. I may have great confidence in the financial ability of the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania, but I think I am bound to have more confidence in the financial abilities (because of the aid that he can call around him) of the Secretary of the Treasury. Now, the bill does not say that he shall borrow the money at six per cent. The bill says he shall borrow it at a rate of interest not exceeding six per cent. Six per cent. is fixed as a maximum. The Senator from Pennsylvania says he can get the money at five per cent. I have no doubt he can. He can get it at four per cent. or three per cent. The difference is only whether he will obtain the loan at a premium or a discount, dependent on the rate of interest. Everybody knows that who knows anything about the affairs of the money world. The bill only fixes the maximum; and although the Senator may be right—and I do not mean to say that he is wrong—yet I think it will be safer for the interests of the country to let this matter be determined by the Secretary of the Treasury on the condition of the market when he goes into it.

35TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Fifteen Million Loan—Mr. Simmons.

SENATE.

Mr. CAMERON. I do not pretend to the great financial ability of the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. MASON,] who was once a president of a bank, as well as myself, [laughter,] and knows something about the matter; but I have no very great confidence in the financial abilities of the gentleman now at the head of the Treasury Department. I cannot have much confidence in the financial skill, ability, thrift, or knowledge of a man who would buy in his own debts at sixteen per cent. premium to-day and ask to borrow money in a month afterwards; and yet that has been the case in regard to that gentleman. I believe, also, that if the Senator from Virginia will recur to his own memory, he will be hardly able to find in the history of the borrowing of this country, when a loan was offered at six per cent., that it was taken for a sum as low as five per cent. I think he will find that the fractions always reach somewhere about the sum indicated in the law. I have no doubt at all, if you pass this bill as it is now, we shall get the money for six per cent.; and I believe that if you insert five in the place of six, you will get it for less than five per cent.

I pretend to no great ability in money matters; I have no money to lend, and do not pretend to be a capitalist; but I know this in regard to men of money, that they calculate very closely. They will come here, and there will be a combination amongst them, and they will come as close to the point as possible; the fraction will be a very small one. The only difference will be that by making this a six per cent. loan, you will enable some great capitalist, or some great friend of the Administration, to take the whole loan, and, after a while, sell it out for sums greatly above what he got it at, as was the case some years ago, in the administration of Mr. Polk. I think the Senator from Virginia will remember that there was then a great cry made about this town of the scarcity of money, and the difficulty of getting capitalists to invest in the loans of the United States. That cry was kept up until the loan was taken; there was a clamor made for a month or two; and all at once a great banker of this city became a millionaire from the proceeds of that loan, which was divided afterwards amongst I do not know how many persons, but, perhaps, hundreds of individuals. That is one of the schemes by which men get rich, and that is one of the sort of schemes always hatched about a Government like ours, expending from fifty to sixty million dollars, and now as much as $85,000,000 a year. I believe our expenditures this year are to be $89,000,000. That brings a set of hungry men about the Government, sharper than the Senator from Virginia would desire to be, and a great deal sharper than the Secretary of the Treasury, as an honorable man, can be. They come here and make their combinations and calculations, and get their loans apparently on terms favorable to the Government. Directly they divide the spoils among themselves, and then the parties separate. I hope five per cent. will be substituted for six per cent.

The amendment was agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 28, noes 14.

Mr. STUART. I move to strike out of the third line of the third section the word "two," and insert "one," so as to read—

In one of the public newspapers in the city of Washington.

We spend a great deal of money uselessly on Washington newspapers.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. SIMMONS. I should like to ask the Senator from Virginia a question. I see he has placed the time of the loan five years longer than the Secretary of the Treasury recommended. I suppose it was on account of some considerable amount of public debts coming due in ten years from now; but I ask him if it would not be better to put it at eight years.

Mr. HUNTER. Certainly not, if we make a five per cent. loan. The time was extended by the committee. The Secretary recommended ten, and the committee recommended fifteen years, because the loan could be gotten off on better terms for a long time, and because in ten years from this period, the bulk of the present public debt falls due. We have in the meantime $20,000,000 of Treasury notes, for which we shall have to provide in some way. If we want to pay off our debts in a short period, they will afford us the means of using as much spare treasure as we have, and rather more, I fear.

Mr. SIMMONS. We shall have to pay the Treasury-note debt in a year.

Mr. HUNTER. I apprehend that at the end of the year we shall have to provide for the Treasury notes or fund them. My estimate is that we shall have to add $35,000,000—the $20,000,000 of Treasury notes, and this $15,000,000 loan.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not exactly understand the Senator's arithmetic. One year we negotiate Treasury notes at from four to four and a half per cent., and they are the shortest loan we ever made, and at the lowest rate of interest. Now, the Senator seems to think that if we make a fifteen years' loan, we shall get the money at a lower rate. I think, myself, eight years is a great while for this loan. I have no idea of putting it at fifteen years, and making this actually a loan of $30,000,000, instead of $15,000,000. That is what it practically was as reported, because in fifteen years the interest, at six per cent., would almost equal the principal. The Secretary of the Treasury last October paid sixteen per cent. premium to redeem a six per cent. loan eight years ahead; and if you put out your bonds at fifteen years, you will have to pay an enormous premium to get them back again when you have money in the Treasury to enable you to redeem them.

Mr. HUNTER. I apprehend that if we put out a five per cent. loan we shall not have to pay a very large premium to get it back; but it is certain that if we put it out for fifteen years we shall be able to negotiate it on better terms than for one year. There is a difference between the Treasury note and the bond. The Treasury note is receivable for public dues. The bond is only receivable at the time it is payable.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator says the longer a loan has to run the better you can negotiate it. Well, sir; we have had to pay sixteen per cent. premium to redeem stock that had but eight years to run, last fall.

Mr. HUNTER. That was six per cent. stock.

Mr. SIMMONS. It had eight years to run, and we paid sixteen per cent. premium, two per cent. a year, bringing it down to four per cent. a year for the time it had to run. That was at a time when money was worth in the street two and a half per cent. a month, and now you can get it for three per cent. a year. I have no doubt this loan will be negotiated at par, at five per cent., with eight years to run. If, however, you put it off very long you will have your money in the Treasury lying without interest. I wanted to approximate as near the Secretary's proposition as I could. I have no doubt if we ever get under way with business we shall do it in eight years, and we ought to accumulate by that time $15,000,000.

Mr. COLLAMER. I am sorry to differ with the honorable Senator from Rhode Island on this point. My belief is that it makes very little difference what rate of interest you put your loan at. I think it makes more difference about the time it is payable. If the money was ordered to be hired at two per cent., the money would be obtained; but, of course, such loan would be taken at a discount. At four per cent. the discount would be less; perhaps such a loan would be taken at par. At five per cent. it would be taken at par or a small premium; and at six per cent. it would be taken still more above par. These different rates, in my opinion, practically amount to very little. All the moneyed men are wiser in their generation than the children of light. They cast the interest to a hair's breadth; they know exactly what it is. We do not get any particular advantage by fixing the rate of interest; but if we offer a loan on a long time, there is a thing you can compute with mathematical certainty; you can go into the market with advantage. I think we shall be more likely to obtain an advance premium on a five per cent. loan for fifteen years than for eight years.

That, however, is not my great objection to this proposition of the Senator from Rhode Island. The loans of 1847–48 were twenty-year loans; and the balance of them will fall due in 1867–68. Now if we make this loan for as short a period of years, as now proposed, it will fall due directly before the great body of our debt now outstanding becomes due, and it is not desirable to have them crowd each other at that particular period. It is therefore desirable, if the time should be altered from fifteen years to put it at twenty years rather than any shorter period.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have not made any motion. I merely wished to call the attention of the Senator, from Virginia to this point. My own opinion is that this loan can be negotiated for either five or eight years at par.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. PUGH. I ask for a separate vote on the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BIGLER.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That amendment will be reserved for a separate vote. The question will be on concurring in all the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole, with that exception.

Mr. SIMMONS. I designed to move an amendment to this bill when the Senate should have perfected that portion of it relating to the hiring of money. I do not know whether I can do it after we concur in these amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will then be open to further amendment.

The amendments made as in Committee of the Whole were concurred in, with the exception of the amendment offered by Mr. BIGLER.

Mr. PUGH. I ask that that amendment be read.

The Secretary read the amendment, which is, in section two, to strike out the proviso in these words:

"And provided, also, That, whenever required, the Secretary of the Treasury may cause coupons of semi-annual interest payable thereon to be attached to certificates issued under this act; and any certificate, with such coupons of interest attached, may be assigned and transferred by delivery of the same, instead of being transferred on the books of the Treasury."

In lines nine, ten, and eleven of the same, to strike out the words:

"Which certificates may be transferred on the books of the Treasury, under such regulations as may be established by the Secretary of the Treasury."

And at the end of line three, to insert:

With coupons for the semi-annual interest attached to the certificates of stock thus created.

So that the section will read:

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That stock shall be issued for the amount so borrowed, bearing interest not exceeding six per centum per annum, payable semi-annually, with coupons for the semi-annual interest attached to the certificate of stocks thus created. And the Secretary of the Treasury be, and hereby is, authorized, with the consent of the President, to cause certificates of stock to be prepared, which shall be signed by the Register, and sealed with the seal of the Treasury Department, for the amount so borrowed, in favor of the parties lending the same, or their assigns: Provided, That no certificate shall be issued for a less sum than $100.

Mr. PUGH. Can I separate these amendments?

Mr. BIGLER. I did not move to strike out the words in the ninth and tenth lines—

"Which certificates may be transferred on the books of the Treasury, under such regulations as may be established by the Secretary of the Treasury."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Those words were stricken out at the suggestion of the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. COLLAMER.]

Mr. PUGH. I ask the Chair whether it is possible to divide the amendment—whether we must take a vote on the whole of it? I am perfectly willing to have the second proviso stricken out. I think it will very much improve the bill; but I am utterly opposed to the other two parts.

35TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Fifteen Million Loan—Mr. Pugh.

SENATE.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks the amendment is divisible.

Mr. PUGH. I have no objection, then, to the first part of the Senator's amendment to strike out the proviso.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Then the question will be on striking out the second proviso, as follows:

"And provided, also, That, whenever required, the Secretary of the Treasury may cause coupons of semi-annual interest payable thereon to be attached to certificates issued under this act; and any certificate with such coupons of interest attached may be assigned and transferred by delivery of the same, instead of being transferred on the books of the Treasury."

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. PUGH. The rest of the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania will make this entirely a loan of bonds payable to bearer, with coupons attached, and the title to pass by delivery. I do not understand that we have ever made such a loan as that, and I do not believe any of the States have ever made such loans. It will do well enough for paper railroad corporations; but it seems to me that it amounts simply to $15,000,000 more of Treasury notes; nothing else in the world. It is not a loan in the proper sense of the term; it becomes the mere paper circulation we had before. I hope the Senate will adhere to the proposition of the stock, as heretofore issued—that it shall be transferable on the books of the Treasury Department. Then we know who are the holders of our stock. I am opposed—I do not know that I shall convince anybody—to the issuing of bonds to bearer, with coupons attached; and I shall call for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

Mr. POLK. I do not understand that the amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania makes either the bonds or the coupons payable to bearer, and therefore I think the amendment ought to be amended so as to make the coupons payable to bearer, and let the bonds be payable to the persons who take the loan.

Mr. HUNTER and others. The coupon is payable to bearer.

Mr. POLK. Gentlemen all around respond to me that the coupons are payable to bearer. I apprehend that the coupon is not payable to bearer, unless it be so expressed in the coupon itself. The coupon may as well be made payable to the person who takes the bid as to bearer; and if the bill does not provide that the coupons shall be payable to bearer, then a fair interpretation of the bill is, that the coupon is not payable to bearer, but payable to the person who makes the bid. I think, therefore, that, as the bill stands amended, after the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania, neither the bonds nor the coupons are payable to bearer, and I think it ought to be amended so as to make the coupons payable to bearer, leaving the bonds payable to the person who takes the bid.

Mr. PUGH. I would say to the Senator from Missouri, that I think no coupon is necessary at all. If the certificates are transferable on the books of the Treasury, you know who to pay the interest to, and you simply have to go to the Treasury office here, or any of the sub-treasurers who are authorized to pay the interest, and you do not want a coupon at all. It is the whole system that I object to. I think it is nothing but $15,000,000 more of Treasury notes. That is what it practically amounts to.

Mr. BIGLER. I do not see the difficulty suggested by the Senator from Missouri. It is perfectly well understood what is meant by the term coupon. A coupon is attached to the bond for an amount equal to the semi-annual interest. The coupons are uniformly payable to bearer. The proposition now pending simply involves the question whether the loan shall be an open loan, transferable on the books, or whether it shall be what is termed a coupon loan, that is, a certificate of stock with coupons attached, which coupons can be cut off as the interest falls due and remitted to the Treasurer and payment made. They are payable to the bearer, of course. You might as well say its date should be so and so, and that the coupons should be attached for fifteen years. I presume the Secretary of the Treasury will give the proper interpretation to the term, and understand what has been the uniform practice.

Now, sir, the question raised by the Senator from Ohio is simply whether this shall be a coupon loan or a loan transferable on the books of the Treasury. That is a fair question for consideration. I myself, years ago, interposed the very objection which the Senator suggests; but I must say that, having been overruled in that opinion, which I entertained in my own Legislature, and the practice of coupon loans having been tried by my own State, I am convinced that these coupons never become a medium of circulation. They cannot be such, because they are payable on time; and so soon as they entitle the holder to interest they are canceled. The very day they are due they are taken up. It is not, therefore, liable to the objection which the Senator from Ohio makes. The coupons do not become a circulating medium; and I will take this occasion to remark that I know from practical experience that there is a difference in the value in the judgment of capitalists. My colleague made an allusion to-day to an experiment made by own State at the time I had the honor of being its Governor. I think the premiums amounted to $134,000, which were received by canceling the old loan, and issuing new certificates, with coupons attached. It is true, that was not to be attributed entirely to the improvement in the character of the loan; but I am satisfied that we realized a very large sum from the consideration of the convenience which capitalists attach to a coupon loan. I do not know that it would have the same effect here; but I believe that the bids will be more favorable for this loan than for a loan with the inconvenience of transferring it upon the books of the Treasury.

Mr. COLLAMER. I would suggest what are the practical inconveniences of certificates of stock transferable only at the Treasury. A man receives a certificate, and that certificate states that his interest is payable at one of the assistant treasuries at Boston, New York, Philadelphia, or New Orleans. Orders are given from the Treasury Department to these different places of what certificates they will pay interest upon. They send them every six months. Within one month before the pay-day comes on, the sub-treasurer receives a list informing him what certificates are payable at his office; and he pays the interest on no others. If a man has a certificate, he has it payable only at one place. If he has any occasion to remove, and wants to get his money at any place more convenient, he has to go to the Treasury, and have the place of payment transferred from one office to another. That is a great inconvenience.

The next inconvenience is this: he is required to go in person to the office to receive his money. He presents his certificate, and receives his pay there. Though it is true that the pay-office has a list of the certificates to pay interest upon, yet you always require the man to show his certificate, and show that he is the true holder, in order to make payment. The name of the holder is put down. He may obtain his pay at this pay-office by a power of attorney; but that power of attorney is required to be made in a form prepared and prescribed by the Department. I have had occasion personally to know that there is very great inconvenience in conforming to the requisitions, and furnishing a power of attorney in such form as will enable a man to get his money; and when he gets to the office, then comes the question of personal identity, whether he is the true man represented in the power of attorney; and he has to go out somewhere into the city and find an acquaintance, and bring him in to convince the sub-treasurer that he is the identical attorney mentioned in the power of attorney.

In short, such loans are replete with inconvenience. Whenever you wish to make a transfer anywhere, you must go to the Treasury Department. With all these practical inconveniences, it is no wonder that men view coupon certificates as altogether the most valuable; and I think both the honorable Senators from Pennsylvania are well borne out in saying that there is a good reason to believe you will obtain a better premium on a five per cent. loan by having coupon certificates, than if you have it transferable at the Treasury.

Mr. PUGH. The difficulty with stocks payable to bearer, with coupons attached, is that you have no check on them; you can never tell whether there is an over-issue. They are resorts and shifts by which miserable, rotten corporations, with no genuine credit, and no real merits, have flooded the market within the last eight or ten years. I consider it beneath the character of the Government of the United States to resort to such shifts. There is no difficulty in the course I suggest. The man who will take your stock will take it in large quantities. As to the matter of transferring the title to the certificates, it is done in every State of the Union. Almost all the States, I believe, have a transfer office in the city of New York, where every bond is regularly entered, and the transfers made as desired. Nor is there any difficulty in the payment of the interest. The most of the interest received on bonds of the States is received by banking-houses in the city of New York by powers of attorney. There is no difficulty; we never had any with any of our loans; none of the States have ever had any. It is simply a question whether, after having issued $20,000,000 of floating debt—Treasury notes—you are now reduced to that point that you have to resort to the shifts of insolvent corporations to try to get credit. If this Government cannot get $15,000,000, as heretofore, on its own legitimate credit, let us get money by direct taxation. I am opposed to degrading the Government by resorting to the shifts which have been employed by rotten corporations with no legitimate credit.

Mr. CAMERON. I think the Senator from Ohio has made some mistake in regard to this matter. Why, sir, he says that the State of Ohio has never issued this species of stock; that her bonds have no coupons; they are registered in the offices; and yet I remember it was but the other day that the treasurer of the State of Ohio robbed that State of some hundreds of thousands of dollars.

Mr. PUGH. The transfer office was not kept at the treasury. That was a mistake. I always wanted it kept there.

Mr. CAMERON. The transfer office was kept somewhere where her Legislature, of which the gentleman was a member, perhaps directed it to be kept. She had a transfer office in the city of New York, and had a transfer office in the city of Columbus.

Mr. PUGH. The transfer books are in the city of New York. I know it, for I was one of the commissioners of the sinking fund for two years.

Mr. CAMERON. The books were under the charge of the gentleman for two years, and yet, with his financial wisdom, he could not prevent this robbery.

Mr. PUGH. It was after I went out of office.

Mr. CAMERON. It would not have been robbed if the gentleman was there, I know. You might just as well say that because in olden times the judges of our courts compelled the coroner and sheriff to walk before them with their maces in their hands, now every judge in Ohio should have that sort of a procession before him, or because in olden time every judge wore a cloak, you must keep that insignia of the olden time on every judge of Pennsylvania and Ohio. This is a mode not resorted to by broken-down corporations, but by States as respectable as any other States in the world. Perhaps one-half of the States of the Union have resorted to it. If it enables you to borrow money upon better terms, why not resort to it? You certainly keep a register of all these bonds at the Treasury Department, or ought to do it. The only difference is that the interest is paid without a transfer upon the books. The Senator from Vermont has most clearly explained that part of the process. It is unnecessary for me to do it. These bonds, payable in fifteen years, will have thirty coupons on them, dated at the end of every half year, beginning, say the 1st of January next. There will be a two and a half per cent. coupon, dated the 1st of January, 1859, for twenty-five dollars; at the end of the next six months there will be another one, and so on to the end of the fifteen years. When these periods come around, the holder of the bond cuts off his coupon, sends it to the Treasury, and gets a check, which the banks pay.

Mr. POLK. I move to amend the amendment by inserting after the word "coupon," the words "payable to bearer."

35TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Right of Suffrage—Mr. Kelly.

Ho. of Reps.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no such question before the Senate. The question is on striking out these words in lines nine, ten, and eleven of the second section:

"Which certificates may be transferred on the books of the Treasury, under such regulations as may be established by the Secretary of the Treasury."

Mr. MASON. As the bill stands, it does not authorize these bonds to be issued as coupon bonds; but if any holder of the bonds afterwards asks it or requires it, then the Secretary may make them coupon bonds to that extent.

Mr. PUGH. That is stricken out.

Mr. MASON. But the object, as I understand, of the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BIGLER,] who moved the amendment, was to make it compulsory on the Secretary to make them coupon bonds. Now, what will the effect of that be? Coupons are modern inventions, originating, so far as I know, in Wall street, New York, for the purpose of money facilities in the negotiation of loans. I will tell you what the experience of Virginia has been. They have issued coupon bonds lately, under advice derived from that and kindred quarters, and the State has been obliged to pass a law giving authority to the holders of these coupons, at their request, to have them converted into registered bonds. Why? Because of the risks of accident in the transmission of the coupons and the transmission of the bonds. They are bonds necessarily payable to bearer, and the coupons are payable to bearer. Now, it may be convenient for mere money dealers to hold bonds of that kind, and to collect their interest in that sort of way, but it is inconvenient to others who make permanent investments to have their principal and their interest both subjected to the risk of loss by transmission, or loss by fire in their own houses. I think it not at all improbable, though I do not profess to be at all versed in finance, that to the extent that these bonds may be held in Europe, if they are coupons, it will stand in the way of that, because it will be necessary either to leave the bonds here in the hands of some agent to collect the interest at the end of every six months, or it will be necessary to incur the risks of transmission across the sea to have it collected.

But what object can there be in making it mandatory on the Secretary to give these securities that form, that may be acceptable in some quarters, objectionable in others, when the bill proposes to leave it discretionary with him? Sir, I distrust the money-dealers, the men whose whole occupation and pursuit in life is to deal in money, and nothing but money. I distrust their whole scheme and their whole plan. It is the purpose of the Secretary of the Treasury, as the officer of the Government, to do this business in such a way as will best inure to the interest of the Government; and I can see no reason for placing him in the power of men who are mere money-dealers, requiring him to issue coupons in such a way as will answer the ends of that invention. I can see no reason of policy or propriety in it.

Mr. PEARCE. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

The amendment made in Committee of the Whole was concurred in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is still another portion of the amendment of the Committee of the Whole, which is to insert at the end of line three, section two—

With coupons for the semi-annual interest attached to the certificates of stock thus created.

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to propose an amendment to this bill that will require some explanation; and I should like to lay it over until to-morrow, as I am unwell.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If the honorable Senator will give way, I will move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will submit the amendment. It is to come after the fifth section. I believe some of the sections are stricken out, and they will have to be numbered again. I propose to add to the end of the bill, the sections which I send to the Chair.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is manifest that that amendment will give rise to a discussion which cannot be concluded to-night, and I propose that the amendment be printed, and that we then adjourn. I move to dispense with the reading of the amendment, and that it be printed; which I shall then follow with a motion to adjourn.

Mr. HUNTER. The amendment is printed. It is a bill introduced by the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is very much altered from the original bill. It wants printing.

Mr. HUNTER. There will be a question of order to decide, and I think we may as well decide that to-night at any rate. ["No!" "No!"] This is a bill to increase the rates of duty.

Mr. SIMMONS. Not at all; not in the slightest degree. There is no rate of duty in it.

Mr. HUNTER. This bill proposes to assess the rate of duty, as I understand. If the Senator says it is not, I shall wait to hear him.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois moves to dispense with the reading of the amendment, and that it be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

RIGHT OF SUFFRAGE.

SPEECH OF HON. JOHN KELLY,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

May 24, 1858.

The House being in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. KELLY said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: When the bill to admit Minnesota was before the House for discussion, a few days since, I sought the floor for the purpose of presenting my reasons why it should be admitted as a State; and in my preliminary opening, I stated to the House that I intended to direct my remarks to that provision in the bill which gives to aliens who have declared their intentions to become citizens the right of suffrage, and to discuss the benefits accruing to the country from that provision of the bill; but being interrupted by gentlemen upon technical points of order, and ruled out of order by the Speaker on the ground that I was not confining my remarks to the merits of the bill, I had to succumb to the decision of the Chair. I could not, at that time, nor can I now, comprehend the force of the Speaker's reasoning on the occasion referred to. But, sir, I conceived it my duty to forego my convictions on the issue in dispute, and to seek another opportunity to give my views, not only on the bill itself, but on matters relative thereto, which were pertinent to that bill.

Mr. Chairman, at the early part of this session, it will be recollected that the honorable gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MARSHALL] introduced a bill on the subject of our naturalization laws; and at a later period a resolution was submitted by the honorable member from Tennessee, [Mr. ZOLLICOFFER,] which passed this House, relating to foreign paupers and criminals. The bill from the Senate for the admission of Minnesota has encountered, and will encounter, much opposition on the part of certain gentlemen, because of what is known in its constitution as the clause giving to aliens the right of suffrage, under certain limitations. These three measures, although differing in their character and details, and I will also add, differing essentially in regard to their merits, have presented a topic which has been fruitful of discussion in this Hall and elsewhere, and on which I now propose to offer a few general remarks—I mean, sir, the expediency of making any fundamental change in our naturalization laws as they now exist on the statute-book. So far as this question affected the Minnesota bill, I will merely remark in passing, that I am too much of a State-rights man to violate the integrity of State sovereignty by going behind the constitution which the people of that Territory present to Congress, if I find it to be republican in its character, and in accordance with the simple requirements prescribed by the Constitution of the United States. It is for the people of Minnesota, or any other State of this Union, (in the legal mode of expressing its sovereign will,) to grant the rights of its elective franchise, or any other rights pertaining to its sovereignty as an independent State, as it may deem most expedient and proper. That is a right which I, sir, would not violate by subjecting it to the caprice or tyranny of any foreign sovereignty, either State or Federal. If such a question should arise in the State of New York, as a citizen of that State I would express my opinion, and take a part in its decision; but I cannot, and never will I, sanction by any act or vote of mine, the power of Congress to erect a Star-Chamber tribunal, before which to arraign the independent sovereignties (which constitute us the great Republic of the earth) for the manner in which they may each choose, in its own view of what is best for its interests and prosperity, and according to law, to exercise its own inalienable and reserved prerogatives, especially as respects the qualifications of its own citizens.

Admit the principle to-day in regard to Minnesota, and our southern friends will soon improve the precedent by arraigning before the bar of this House the constitution of my own State, because it confers the right of voting on colored gentlemen, under a property qualification. The precedent will also be used in a similar way of usurped authority against Massachusetts and other free States that have special legislation on the subject, and it may be converted into an engine of oppression, caprice, or tyranny, in its application to the slave, as well as to the free States of this Confederacy. Entertaining these views in regard to the alien clause of the Minnesota constitution, I must confess that it was not without surprise as well as disappointment, that I listened to the speech of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. GARRETT,] He felt it to be a great hardship, that he and his colleague, who represented two hundred thousand constituents, should have less power in this body than the new State with her three Representatives, sent here by her hive of aliens and half-blood Indians. Sir, this slur upon Minnesota was unmerited, and comes with a very bad grace from the Representative of a State, that has carried its notions of State-rights as far, at least, as any other member of this Confederacy.

If the gentleman has a right to dictate to Minnesota the genealogical and probationary qualifications of her citizens, by a parity of reasoning I have a right to ask the gentleman how many negroes there are among his one hundred thousand constituents, and why their rights to be represented on this floor are paramount to those of the industrious, hard-toiling emigrant, or the civilized and resident half-blood, who is "to the manner born?" This objection wears a novel, and I must be permitted to say, a rather suspicious aspect coming from a Virginian statesman, and I trust that it is not ominous of "coming events" in that staunch stronghold of Democracy, the Accomack district. The fling at the aboriginal voter (the Indian half-breed) comes with a bad grace from the Representative of a State whose proudest families trace back their heraldry to the English emigrant, Rolfe, and measure their nobility by the proportion of the blood of Pocahontas that courses through their veins.

This alien clause in the Minnesota constitution is a two-edged sword, which the gentleman from Virginia ought to handle with care.

The gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN] also arrays himself in opposition to this bill, and while he disclaims for the Black Republican party a concurrence in his sentiments, he would wish us to consider that he speaks only for himself. This is a new plank in the Black Republican platform, and it is proper that the gentleman's party should receive a share, at least, of the benefits of its discovery. He is one of their recognized spokesmen and champions, and I wish it to be known in Indiana, in Michigan, in Illinois, and other western States, where citizenship and progress are synonymous terms, and the spirit of fanaticism is not permitted to obtain a foothold.

But is there not something significant in the very emphatic manner in which the gentleman from Ohio assured the House that, in his objections to the suffrage clause of the Minnesota constitution, he spoke only his own views, and not those of any other parties or persons? Who are the parties or persons for whom he made this special disclaimer? It was not for State-rights men, of any of the parties into which this House is divided, for they stand upon principles which are too firmly bedded in the Constitution to be shaken by every wind of doctrine that comes from the pestiferous region of fanaticism or expediency. We fear no traitors in the noble band of conservative patriots who belong to the State-rights school. They will not invade the sanctity of State sovereignty. It is not likely that the disclaimer was put forth on behalf of the self-styled Americans; because it would be needless, inasmuch as we know what their views are upon the subject of alien suffrage and Democratic suffrage, and even upon constitutions and laws when they stand in the way of modern Americanism. Besides, I have always given the gentleman from Ohio the credit of not being recognized as authority on subjects connected with the Know Nothing ritual. My great respect for the gentleman may have led me to do him more justice in that regard than he is in reality entitled to. Still, I think it is clear he did not make his disclaimer on behalf of the Know Nothing party. There is, therefore, no difficulty in pointing to those for whose especial benefit the declaration was made. The Black Republicans wish to kill the Minnesota bill, but they are, forsooth, the peculiar friends of the foreign-born citizen. Their leaders all profess this ardent affection for them when their rights are assailed, or their privileges are endangered—especially before elections. They are, therefore, in a dilemma; and the gentleman from Ohio throws himself into the breach as a martyr to Black Republican integrity.

35TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Ho. OF REPS.

Mr. GOOCH. Will the gentleman give way for a question?

Mr. KELLY. I will.

Mr. GOOCH. The gentleman proposes to have the doctrines of the gentleman from Ohio ingrafted upon the Republican platform. I would ask him if he intends to have the doctrines of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GARNETT] ingrafted upon the Democratic platform?

Mr. KELLY. No, sir; the gentleman from Virginia acknowledged here that he was speaking for himself.

Mr. GOOCH. Did not the gentleman from Ohio do the same thing?

Mr. KELLY. The action since taken by the Republican party in relation to that bill satisfies me perfectly that they did not want to admit Minnesota at all.

Mr. GOOCH. I would like to ask the gentleman by what rule it is that a gentleman of the Democratic party speaks purely for himself when he claims so to speak; whilst a member of the Republican party cannot speak purely for himself when claiming to do so?

Mr. KELLY. If the action of the Democratic party had been in consonance with the views expressed by the gentleman from Virginia, it would have been another thing; but the action of the Republican party was in consonance with the opinions expressed by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. PALMER. I would ask how the Republicans voted on the Minnesota bill? I think a majority of them voted for it.

Mr. KELLY. That is true; but after they were forced into that position, and not before. It is a very singular fact that when the final vote was taken upon the admission of Minnesota, a great number of gentlemen, who were prominent in their opposition in the preliminary stages, all of a sudden changed over. Now, what brought that about I am unable to say, unless it was that they were afraid to put their names on the record against it.

Their method of defeating the admission of Minnesota reminds me of the patriotic Quaker in the early settlement of the American colonies. His settlement was very much exposed to a band of fierce and hostile Indians, who frequently stole his property, and had killed one or two of his settlers. He had made up his mind to retaliate by exterminating his dangerous neighbors, but the ritual of his creed forbade the shedding of blood. He had a stout, active, serving man, whose assistance he invoked. He asked him what he would do if he had the savages in his power. "Why, cut the rascals' throats," was the answer. "Well, have thee a good knife," said the master, "and meet me at five in the morning." In the morning they met as appointed, and the Quaker thus addressed his man: "Thee will see wicked work to-day;

the settlers are going out against the Indians, and thee may accompany me, as we may have an opportunity of doing some good. Thee knows I cannot shed blood, nor could I ever be guilty of so great a crime; but as the savages might not recognize me as a man of peace, and might attack me, I will take my big club in my hand, and thee must keep right close to me all day." Off they went to the unsuspecting wigwags; and when the fight began the Quaker could be seen with his club brandishing about him right and left, and every Indian the master knocked down the man behind him dispatched by cutting his throat. This is the way in which the Black Republican party proposes to kill off the alien, and get rid of the bill to admit Minnesota. The gentleman from Ohio will merely club the alien voters, shove aside the citizen of foreign birth, and his friends will be at his back to cut the throat of Minnesota. Their former votes on the enabling act show this to be so. We can account for their present hostility to the admission of Minnesota on no other ground than hostility to it because of alien suffrage, and their unwillingness to abandon those Know Nothing patriots who cling to their cause with so much fidelity, and, I fear, at great sacrifice at home, during the contest which was just closed by the admission of Kansas.

If this is a new dogma in the Black Republican creed, the country should know it; the Democratic party should know it; and I am determined the adopted citizen shall know it; because they have resorted to every blandishment, every art, every inducement, to shake the unswerving loyalty of that class of our citizens; in which they have been, so far, signally unsuccessful, if we except a handful of their natural allies, the Red Republicans of our large cities.

Mr. BLISS. As my colleague [Mr. SHERMAN] is not now here, I would like to say for him that the alien-suffrage clause of the constitution formed not the chief ground of his opposition to it. It was only a minor objection with him; and, were that the only one, I think, though I know not, that he would have voted for the bill. The principal grounds of opposition, as he expressed in his speech, were the irregularities and violations of law in forming the constitution. I say that for him. For myself and the Republicans generally, so far as I know their views, I say that they had no opposition to the bill on that ground.

Mr. KELLY. I do not design to discuss that matter any further. There was certainly a desire evinced by many of the Black Republicans to defeat that bill when it was before the House. Whether it was because the alien suffrage clause was in the bill, I cannot say; but I am strongly inclined to the opinion that that was the cause of the opposition of some of them, at least. Now, the members of the Democratic party, with one or two exceptions, voted for the bill from the beginning to the end. You will recollect, sir, that when the enabling act was before the last Congress, many gentlemen on the other side of the House changed their votes, and voted against that bill, because it contained a clause permitting aliens to vote.

Mr. BLISS. Unnaturalized aliens.

Mr. KELLY. Allow me to say further, that I have never yet heard it asserted or maintained by any foreigner that he desired the right of suffrage, or any other privilege to which he was not entitled under the Constitution of the United States. The only reason why these new Territories give the right of suffrage to aliens is as an inducement to foreigners to go to those Territories, so that they may be filled up, and may grow rich by the development of their labor and settlement. Aliens have never memorialized nor petitioned Territorial Legislatures for the suffrage privilege; it is their own voluntary act, induced by reasons most beneficial to their future growth and prosperity.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Chairman, it strikes me that the erroneous statements which my colleague has made have arisen from the fact that he intended to speak before the debate and vote were had on the admission of Minnesota. If he had listened to that debate, he would, in my judgment, have discovered that the great argument made against the alien clause in the constitution of Minnesota was made by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. SMITH,] a distinguished member of the Democratic party; and when the vote was taken, he would have seen that a great majority of the Republican party voted for the admission of Minnesota, and many of those who did not do so placed their opposition to it on other grounds than the alien-suffrage clause.

Mr. MAYNARD. I would like, before the gentleman from New York [Mr. PALMER] takes his seat, to ask him a question for my own information, and the information of those with whom I am associated. I wish to ask the gentleman whether we are to understand that the Republican party—or, in common parlance, the Black Republican party—to which the gentleman belongs, is in favor of or opposed to extending the right of suffrage to unnaturalized aliens?

Mr. PALMER. I cannot speak for the Republican party, or, to use the gentleman's classic and elegant phrase, the Black Republican party.

Mr. MAYNARD. It is not my expression.

Mr. PALMER. It is not mine. I am not in the habit of using epithets, or calling names; but, sir, for the whole session I have sat here and listened to these epithets of opprobrium coming from gentlemen of the slave States, and I will hear them no longer without throwing them back again. Now, sir, in regard to the question. For myself, I do not agree to the doctrine that unnaturalized aliens should be entitled to the rights of suffrage in this country; and I do not understand that the Republican party accedes to that doctrine; but I do not undertake to speak for them.

Mr. KELLY. With these brief remarks on the question of alien suffrage in Minnesota, I will address myself to the main question presented by the proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky. Do the naturalization laws require amendment? The gentleman says they do; and proposes, among other things, to extend the term of probation from five to twenty-one years. This is a tangible proposition. It has body, substance, and age, to recommend it, even if it be devoid of liberality or merit; and yet, I think the gentleman deviates somewhat from his characteristic liberal spirit of justice in not adding a few years more, so as to make it exactly twenty-five. This would at least have the merit of being more just; for then no foreigner coming to our country would be compelled to bear arms in defense of the nation, or take part in its future wars. His citizenship would begin at the very period when the laws would exempt him from military service. This would be the legal effect of the extension proposed by those who think, with the friends of the gentleman from Kentucky, that the period of probation should run within a few years of a quarter of a century.

But, sir, may I be allowed to ask what is the object of such an extension? Is it to prevent future emigration to this country; and, as a consequence, to divert it to other lands? To some extent this object is already attained. I cut the following evidence of the fact from a late Massachusetts paper:

"A great number of Irish are now emigrating to California and Australia. One day last week there was quite an exciting scene at the eastern depot in Salem, Massachusetts, when several took their departure, and in some of the cases the parting of friends was very affecting. Some eight or ten recently left Newburyport for the gold regions, and a Lawrence paper says that hundreds and perhaps thousands of people are preparing to leave that city—those who have the means intending to go to California."

Or is it to create among us a large dissatisfied, discontented, and consequently dangerous class, to whom citizenship is almost absolutely and completely denied? Is it not to turn away from our shores the tide of emigration, and say, in so many words, to the stout hearts and strong hands that seek to throw off old Europe's thralldom,

"Stranger, return upon thy ocean path;
Here sweeps the flood of patriotic wrath?"

Shall we say, come as helots; but not as citizens? The question is soon answered. This country is not yet ready to reject the hardy and industrious emigrant. The policy of our fathers must still be our policy. The natural increase of our people does not augment our population rapidly enough to utilize our vast territory. Not only is the wide West calling upon the hardy sons of toil—men to break prairies, level the forest, work the mines of wealth yet hidden in that unexplored country; but Virginia, too, "the Old Dominion," which two and a quarter centuries ago was offering its bounties to emigrants, now calls on the emigrant commissioners at New York to try and turn to its untilled fields a stream, at least, from the tide of foreign emigration.

35TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Kentucky will next feel the want; and were we to-day, by our legislation, to adopt the gentleman's narrow, anti-American policy—were we to repel instead of encourage the sons of toil to come and settle among us, and thus dry up that source of national wealth and prosperity—language would fail to give utterance to the curses, loud and deep, that would be echoed along the borders of that gallant State, that has still within her so many enduring monuments of her early emigrant founders. I need not, sir, recur to the chivalrous daring and dauntless enterprise of the patriotic Celts, who stood side by side, and shoulder to shoulder, with the intrepid Boone, in the settlement of Kentucky, in 1746. The graceful pen of her own eloquent historian, Marshall, (the relative of the honorable gentleman on this floor of that name, from Kentucky,) enshrines in all the graces of style and diction, the memories of the McAfees, of Benjamin Logan, Simon Butler, and of McLeellan, and Hogan. These men, he tells us, were all pioneers of Kentucky, and were the first to explore the country beyond the Ohio. The same hardy race of backwoodsmen also sent out the first successful pioneers of population on the greater current of the Mississippi, to mark along its banks the sites of future settlements.

Referring to these gallant Celtic emigrants, Marshall says, (volume I, chapter 3:)

"For enterprise and daring courage, none transcended Major Hugh McGrady—a Harland, a McBride, and a Chaplain, deserve also to be mentioned."

This is the language of Kentucky's historian. Indeed, sir, I know of no prescription better calculated to allay the feverish apprehensions which disturb the honorable member from Kentucky, in regard to foreign immigration, than to carefully read and thoughtfully ponder the entire first volume of his relative's history. It is the best cure I could recommend for the modern Americanism of that gallant State.

A periodical which takes no part in politics, which is devoted to commerce, and to questions of political economy, (Hunt's Merchant's Magazine,) devotes a considerable share of its well-filled pages to the consideration of the value of immigration to the several States of this Union. In a late number, we read as follows:

"The adoption of any measure by the Government or people of the United States, which could in any way tend to prevent or divert the great tide of emigration, of labor and capital, from Europe to our shores, would only find its parallel, in its disastrous effects, with what we read of the expulsion of the Moors from Spain, and the Huguenots from France.

"In the year 1849, the whole number of foreigners arriving at the different ports of the United States was two hundred and ninety-six thousand. If we estimate the value of the labor, the skill, and the capital of each of these emigrants at only $100, we have an augmentation of the national wealth, in a single year, of more than twenty-nine million dollars. When we reflect, however, that the great majority of these people are able-bodied men and women, accustomed to hard, persevering labor, many to skilled labor; that many also possess, in money or implements, varying amounts of capital, the estimated value of each to the country which we have given, will appear too inconsiderable. Estimating the value at $500, (less than one half that of an able-bodied negro slave,) we have the enormous sum of $148,000,000 added to the wealth of the United States in a single year; and it is thus that I have always accounted for the undisputed fact that, in cities of large population, property is tenfold more valuable than elsewhere."

Who would wish to send this mass of living wealth to some rival land, and prevent Minnesota, and like new States, from participating in its material benefits? or who would shut against it this great Republic—the hope of mankind, the center of human liberty in the world.

But we hear stump orators constantly declaiming about pauperism, poverty, and vice! What says the authority I have just quoted?

"Of the few who become a charge, or are consigned to prison for petty offenses, what is the expense, compared to the wealth which the mass of emigrants actually constitute?"

The State which I have the honor, in part, to represent receives more than half of the whole emigration; and is consequently more exposed to the evils here suggested. She levies a tax on each emigrant; and this money constitutes a fund, directed by commissioners, who apply it to the relief of emigrants who have been less than five years in the country. By this prudent legislation of New York, no town or county is chargeable with the relief of an emigrant during that period. If there is pauperism among the emigrants within these five years, they themselves pay the expense of relieving it, and State officers dispense this extorted charity. What New York has done, other States may do, and thus prevent the spread of the pauperism which gentlemen so much dread. If other States find themselves burdened, let them use the remedy which they have in their own hands.

Of the extent of relief afforded by emigrants to their less fortunate companions by this process, some idea may be formed from the annual reports of the commissioners of emigration of the State of New York. In 1857, as appears by their last report, the commutation money received by them from emigrants amounted to $369,289; besides having in their possession, in coin, $6,740,436; being sixty-nine and a fraction dollars for each person arriving here, including men, women, and children. Nearly all of this commutation money was laid out in the support of the various institutions under the charge of the commissioners.

Prate not then of foreign pauperism. The State that bears it does so because it chooses to bear it. If it exists, she has a ready, simple, and efficacious remedy.

But it is alleged that this emigration brings to our shores many men of bad character, who soon fill our penitentiaries and prisons. Statistics are adduced, chiefly from large cities; but to these very statistics I appeal for a refutation of the charge. In New York, Boston, Cincinnati, and some other large cities, the foreign element is almost, if not fully, equal to the native population. And is it not natural to expect that, out of such large numbers of emigrants, that many of them should be excitable, when our laws offer no check to the sale of poisonous compounds vended as common beverages? These madden their victims; quarrels ensue; their humble condition in life gives them no right to indulgence, and they are therefore dragged off to the police office, and figure as criminals. But the real criminals—the assassins, the burglars, the counterfeits, the forgers, the unfaithful public officers—these are not found in any greater proportion among the foreign-born citizens than among our native countrymen.

Let immigration become more a subject of concern with State Legislatures; let them inpose upon it the proper guards and checks, and instead of keeping alive a spirit of illiberal hostility, and forming a pretext for anti-republican combinations, it will become a source of wealth, and an element of prosperity and progress. The people of Minnesota see the benefits to be derived from the hardy hands of the patriot emigrant who seeks a home in this land, partly to better his condition, but more to gratify his love for its institutions, and to raise his family of children to revere and defend its emblem of liberty with his and their hearts' blood, as has been proved on every battlefield in which our country has been engaged with her enemies.

Stop emigration, and you check the growth, prosperity, and the development of your country, and direct elsewhere that which would be so beneficial to you. England failed at Sebastopol, and in the Russian war was inferior to France. Why? Because the stalwart army that would have fought her battles had been driven from Ireland by oppression, and had, as free citizens of our own Republic, labored with an ardent zeal to elevate themselves, and to advance the country. "Cursed be the laws that deprived me of such subjects," said George II., as he saw the Irish brigade in the French service drive his best regiments before them. "Cursed be the laws that deprive me of such subjects," cries England, in her hour of trial. Nay; proud Albion stoops to send her emissaries to our land, to seek and to lure with gold the emigrants whom her tyranny had driven from her borders. And you, who would suspect the loyalty of adopted citizens, tell me, did the Irish-American, or patriotic German, or any other foreigner by birth, then hasten to put on the livery of England? Did one turn his back on his adopted country, to take back his old allegiance? England, it is true, made some Red Republican converts—men who have neither religion nor patriotism—who were compelled to "leave their country for their country's good." Of these, I believe that a few were induced to join the British standard. Such people as these have a home nowhere.

Even now, when England is struggling to regain India, where she has had but a partial foothold, she looks once more to Ireland, and mournfully beholds her diminished population; but beyond the Atlantic she sees her expatriated subjects, prosperous themselves, and contributing to the prosperity of their new home. Deeply now does she regret that she had not turned the tide of emigration to India; that she had not offered such inducements of liberty and happiness, as would have enabled her to raise up three millions of European colonists, where she, until lately, had but Government officers, and slaves worked up to madness in their struggle for freedom. But it may be thought that there would be some political danger from an immigration as large as we have had. The cry is raised that our liberties are in danger, and Congress is called upon to see that they suffer no detriment. What has been the real extent of this immigration? According to the statistical returns, the total immigration from September 30, 1819, to December 31, 1855, was four million two hundred and twelve thousand six hundred and twenty-four, to which Bromwell's accurate work adds two hundred and fifty thousand for the thirty-six years preceding, making a total of four million five hundred thousand as the whole foreign immigration since the close of the revolutionary war. But this subject has been raised to the dignity of a question of national political economy, and has been thoroughly examined by the different national associations, whose annual meetings in various parts of the Union, are already productive of so much benefit to the real substantial interests of the country in its unexampled career of prosperity and progress.

At a recent session of the American Geographical and Statistical Society, held in New York, the section on "political statistics" examined and discussed this question in some of its bearings. The chairman (S. P. Dinsmore, Esq.) presented some information, in regard to immigration into this country, which won general attention. I give a few extracts from this paper pertinent to the point I am considering:

"It is interesting to compare the results of population in this country, as now exhibited in our census tables, with the results which would have been, had there been no foreign immigration.

"In 1790 the population of the United States, including whites and free colored persons, was 3,321,930. Now the careful calculation of the tables shows that the annual increase of population, by excess of births over deaths, is 1.38 per cent (138 in 10,000) in this country—the largest increase of any country in the world; the like increase in England and Wales being 1.25; (125 in 10,000); in France, .44; in Russia, .74; in Prussia, 1.17; in Holland, 1.23; in Belgium, .61; in Portugal, .73; in Saxony, 1.08.

"At this rate of increase of population, augmented by the excess of births over deaths alone, we find, availing ourselves of the elaborate tables of Louis Schade, Esq., that we should have had in this country, in 1850, 7,555,423 inhabitants, instead of 19,987,573—a difference of 12,432,150. So that, while in the increase of population in this country since 1790 the elements of excess of births over deaths have given but 4,323,493 of population, the increase by and through immigration has given over twelve millions—the proportion being one of national increase to three of increase through importation of population.

"If we may measure the value of inhabitants to a State by the worth of the monuments which industry leaves on the face of the earth, having meanwhile taken from the earth its daily food, we may reckon from these data that immigration has given to us three fourths of the farm improvements, three fourths of the cities and towns built, three fourths of the miles of railroad constructed, throughout the length and breadth of the land.

"And it will not be forgotten that the kind of population which immigration has brought us has been mainly of the proletary or productive class. It is the foreigners who have done the work. The natives, born on the soil, have considered themselves the class—nati consumere fruges—born to consume the fruits of the soil. Compute, for instance, the actual creating force of the New England and other native emigration to the West, and omit the consideration of its capacity in organizing labor, and I think we shall find that the average amount of real productive toil of each native-born western man, after deducting from his time what the exigencies of horse-raising, whisky-drinking, attending agricultural fairs, and speculating in town lots have required of him, his actual productive toil has not exceeded six hours in each week. But the foreign emigrant has had no such license granted to him. The necessities of his daily life have required an aggregate of fifty hours' labor per week, spent in adorning and enriching the earth, and in raising from its bosom the fruits to supply the consumption of the people.

"If we may compute the worth of each immigrant and descent of immigrants, on the valuation of slave labor—that is, counting Caucasian blood as worth as much as Ethiopian blood, and assuming the value of each woman and child at $400, the aggregate cash value of immigration since 1790, and its fruits, will be found to be $4,972,860,000, or nearly five thousand millions of dollars. Another fact which should not so long have escaped the attention and comment of commercial statisticians, is the enormous amount of coin which has been brought into this country by foreign emigrants."

A letter was here read from John A. Kennedy, Esq., superintendent at the Castle Garden emigrant depot, showing by a careful and systematic inquiry, extending over a period of seven-months, that the amount of money—

"Almost entirely in coin, brought on the average by each emigrant, man, woman, and child, landing at that port, is $100. Taking the total number of emigrants who have arrived in this country at about three million, we may, without hesitation, set down $200,000,000 as the amount in coin which they have brought to our shores. That amount is with us, hoarded, and in circulation among the people. If it were not trespassing on the domain of the society's 'section on finance,' observed the speaker, it would be curious to calculate of what amount of paper currency, so large a sum of specie might be made the basis, at the rate, for instance, observed in New England banks, of twenty dollars in bank notes to one dollar in coin. Fortunately, however, for the business of the country, annually aggravated and periodically exploded by undue issues of bank paper and bank credits, the greater part of this coin remains hoarded, or in circulation among the people who wisely prefer to trust themselves, rather than banks of issue. It was the steady flow of this money brought by foreign emigrants, as well as of money carried by native emigrants into the western States of the Union, at a rate perhaps of $100,000 per day, which, in 1856, sustained the enormously inflated prices of everything in the West, when otherwise they must have fallen upon the fall of nearly one half in the price of breadstuffs, upon which alone the West relies to pay debts and buy manufactures."

While Europe is utterly unable to support and sustain the natural increase of her population; while wars, pestilence, and famine, together with emigration, seem necessary, in the order of Providence, to keep it within such limits as the productions of the earth will sustain, we are blessed with a vast territory which our natural increase of population cannot possibly occupy for centuries to come.

The new States which have been admitted into our system, have all been cleared, and, to a great extent, cultivated by our emigrant population, who, wending their course westward, literally cut a track through our illimitable forests, dig our canals, build up our railroads, and finally settle down on the farms which their industry has won, as free citizens of this great Republic.

This movement is appreciated in the proper quarter, and would be by every true-hearted American, were it not for the baneful influence of partisan bitterness. I cut from a well-known journal the following paragraph which will show the truth of this:

"EMIGRATION TO OUTAGAMIE COUNTY, WISCONSIN.—We take great pleasure in announcing that intelligence has been received from Holland that over one hundred families will embark for Little Chute and the adjacent country in a few weeks. There is abundance of good land in Centre, Freedom, Kaukauna and Buchanan, which can be purchased at from two to five dollars per acre, with a ready market almost at their doors. We welcome the Hollanders. They are a thrifty, industrious, and honest people, and make excellent citizens. There is room for thousands upon thousands in Wisconsin."—Appleton Crescent.

But not only as cultivators of the soil do they contribute to our national wealth, but in the building up of our great manufacturing establishments. I clip from the last number of Hunt's Magazine the following paragraph:

"In the Merchants' Magazine of March, 1854, (vol. 30, pp. 322-327,) we published an article entitled 'The Mineral and other Resources of the West—Perry County, Indiana,' by F. Y. Carlisle, Esq., of Indiana; in which a particular account was given of Perry county and of its largest town, Cannelton, and its condition and prospects as a manufacturing place. We are now informed by the Cannelton Gazette that a colony of Swiss and German emigrants have purchased a large tract of land adjoining Cannelton, and are building up a manufacturing city. They have now running one cotton mill at full speed, with a capital of $300,000. The Gazette claims that this movement has the certain elements of success, and that the great cotton manufacturing district is to be on the coal fields of the lower Ohio."

It is true that in some cases the industrious German citizens retain their own language even for some generations after they have settled among us; but I have yet to learn that this class of citizens in Pennsylvania who still speak the tongue of their emigrant forefathers, are less patriotic than those around them who belie and disgrace their immediate ancestors, by joining in the shouts of fanaticism and bigotry. They also publish newspapers in their own language, but though generally unintelligible to us, I venture to say, that no paper circulating among our German citizens advocates any treason or countenances doctrines hostile to our Government. They love this country, as their former rulers hate it. The despots of Germany, the worthy sons of sires who sold their subjects to make English soldiers during our revolutionary war, are already opponents of emigration. These rulers, that loathe the name of Republic, hire their agents to write fictitious letters from America, vilifying our institutions; and these letters are paraded through their official papers; but this they evidently would not be forced to do, could they but find in the German papers here similar tirades on the country and its Government. Where, then, the danger from the large body of emigrants in the country? They may be rendered dangerous by oppression and illegal tyranny, I admit, and it would be a proof of their unfitness for citizenship if they did not entertain a high enough opinion of liberty to peril everything for its preservation and enjoyment.

But the annals of our country furnish no instance of disturbance or rebellion against the constituted authorities on the part of such citizens. The whisky insurrection, Shay's rebellion; Burr's treason, Dorr's revolt, the native rebellion in 1844, and that but lately in Kansas, were not instigated by them. In none of these was the standard of revolt raised by the emigrant or adopted citizen. In none did they flock to it, or rally around it to overthrow the acknowledged authorities. Where, then, I ask, is the danger to our liberties, of which we hear so much? The foreign element is scattered and intermingled with the mass of the people, animated with the same feeling, buoyed up by the same hopes, dreading the same evils, assimilated to us in a manner to excite the wonder of all observing travelers. The danger only exists in the brains of prejudiced men. In the absence of all proof of its existence; of any, even the slightest, evidence on which to base a fear; we may deride it.

There is, gentlemen, no danger to fear from emigration, were it even to increase fourfold; but while there is a total absence of all proof of danger, of all possibility of injury from that source, I point to the unexampled prosperity and progress of the country, which has ever been more rapid as emigration increased; and political economists may hereafter show how a commercial crisis is almost certain to follow, if not immediately result from, a sudden falling in the tide of immigration. For seventy years our laws have welcomed the foreigner to our shores. For seventy years we have trusted the emigrant with the rights of freemen. Peace and plenty has reigned in our land, no abuse of the privilege has affected the Government; and yet gentlemen are alarmed. To use the quaint phrase of O'Connell, when referring to the many acts of the British Government in Ireland, "the danger is, that the immigrant is suspected of being suspicious."

The cause of the emigrant citizen has thus been eloquently defended by one of the proscribed class, a man acknowledged to have but few superiors in the country. He says:

"In point of loyalty to this country and its institutions, I shall not admit any inferiority of patriotism, in personal comparison with the truest patriots of the land. But how has it been? The programme of your institutions was exhibited in European soil. They came here, it is true, for their own interests, under the faith of what that programme implied. They breathe the atmosphere of the country, which is heaven's own gift, not yours. They slake their thirst at the streams or fountains that gush from your valleys and mountain sides. They sometimes commit faults, and even crimes, and in such cases the majesty of the law is thoroughly vindicated in their regard. They carry your palaces on their shoulders up to the very summit. They excavate the internal channels of commerce from lake to ocean? They pass capacious needles through the base of your mountains, and the steam engine supplies the thread. They sometimes faint by the wayside of human life, and then become, like others, more or less a burden on the public. They die; but before death they look forward to the privilege of having a grave, which will be a small curtailment of a territory that extends from the southern boundaries of Canada to the northern limits of Mexico, and from the Atlantic to the Pacific ocean. What more do they ask? True it is, they have liberty of conscience, and after certain preliminaries they are entitled to vote; but these were of your own appointment, proclaimed and boasted of over the world long before their arrival."

Do you repent of these appointments? Has the country become ashamed of its own magnanimous acts?

Thus far, I have considered immigration in itself. I have shown it to be a positive gain, and an advantage to the country; with no drawback sufficient to impair, to any considerable degree, the good it confers; that it is attended with no danger to our institutions; and that to divert it elsewhere will only be to build up a rival Power at our expense. But I am told that there is no hostility to immigration; that our naturalization laws, passed long since, should now be extended; that there is not now as great necessity for immigration as formerly, and that we should seasonably and gradually begin to make the inducement less. This sounds most reasonable, if any good reason could be shown for it; but will gentlemen tell me that the area of our domain is becoming too small for our present population, or that business, mechanically and commercially, is declining, or that the depressed state of our financial system is such as to terrify us in making too rapid strides until we can again see our way clear? This argument is too fragile and unsound to stand the test of inspection, or the foresight of the practical American. Extend the naturalization laws for twenty-one years! Better, sir, that you prevent immigration altogether, by enacting that foreigners shall not be citizens at all, than to impose such an insuperable barrier to the future condition of those who seek your shores to become, like yourselves, defenders of the country against the common enemy of free institutions. The adopted citizen has generally and wisely supported the Democratic party. I can conceive how a large number of the Black Republican party, and those particularly who represent the eastern States, are in favor of the extension of the naturalization laws.

Mr. GILMAN. I should like to ask the gentleman to what party he refers?

Mr. KELLY. I refer to the party to which the gentleman belongs; and I remind him that in the State of New Hampshire they have a restriction prohibiting foreign-born citizens from voting.

Mr. GILMAN. And I desire to remind the gentleman from New York, that when that very proposition was submitted to the people of Kansas it received its strongest support in the strongest Democratic town in the Territory.

Mr. KELLY. It would seem that the war upon the foreign population of our country proceeds upon the hypothesis, that citizenship and voting are synonymous terms, and that foreign voting and Democracy seem to be inseparably connected. Gentlemen forget that citizenship and the right of suffrage are not necessarily united. Women are citizens, but have no voice in our elections; not even in our municipal elections for officers who disburse the taxes which they have to pay. The minor is a citizen, but has no vote even for Federal officers in the several States.

By the Constitution of the United States, article one, section two, "the electors [of Representatives] in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature."

By section three, "Senators are to be chosen by the Legislature of each State." By section four, "the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed by the Legislature thereof." By article two, section one, which treats of the election of President, it is enacted, "that each State shall appoint, in such manner as the Legislature may direct, a number of electors," &c. Hence it will be observed that the right of voting for Representative, Senator, and President, is not one inherent in citizenship, but one to be conferred by the Legislatures of the several States.

The Representatives from Indiana were chosen by voters with whom citizenship, under the Constitution of the United States, was not a necessary qualification; and, on the other hand, the member from Rhode Island saw many citizens—adopted citizens—excluded from voting for him by the laws of his State. This is not, therefore, the place to alter the elective franchise of the several States. The Federal Government gives citizenship, and gives it wisely, after five years' probation. The several States have the sole right and power of deciding on the qualifications of electors of State and Federal officers. Congress cannot alter these qualifications; and were it to make citizenship depend upon an unreasonable residence of twenty-one years, it would only render it contemptible. Half of the States would at once, by law, make American citizenship no longer a necessary qualification for a voter; and the heretofore glorious privilege of being an American citizen, for which so many have crossed the ocean, would be but an empty name.

If, therefore, adopted citizens have in any State abused the right of voting, let that State see to it; let it, like New Hampshire, insist that the Senators and Representatives of its Legislature be of the Protestant religion; or, like Rhode Island, require adopted citizens to own a certain quantity of property; or, with some other States, require them to read and write, or add such new qualifications as they deem best suited to attain their object. Nearly all of the New England States allow the negro the right to vote, in defiance of the decision of the Supreme Court that they are not citizens. Each State may better the elective franchise as it will, either by property qualification, by religious tests, by prolonged residence, or by education; and as the power rests with them, so does the right.

But suppose that Congress extends the term of probation to ten, or twenty years, and that the States generally retain citizenship as a qualification for the exercise of the elective franchise: what will be the result? A danger greater than has ever yet met us is suddenly thrust upon the country. Then the immigrant who arrives, and seeks, by the influence of his genius, ability, skill, or honest toil, a home in the country of his adoption, is debarred from the rights of a freeman; he is governed, but not one of the sovereign people—a helot, not a citizen. The discontent will deepen and widen; a determined combination will arise, and plots and plans be formed, not only by these disfranchised emigrants, but by designing politicians, to effect a change in the Government and laws. The fact of the existence of a large body of men, discontented and dissatisfied, suffering from what they must deem a wrong and unjust distinction, will be taken advantage of by designing, unscrupulous, and ambitious men. One party after another will court and cajole them, and the elective franchise at last be accorded as a party bribe, and the suddenly-admitted voters become the arbiters of the elections. There would be but one hope of relief from these evils: and that is, the Japanese laws of non-intercourse with the rest of the world. Our decadence would date from that time, and in after ages some South American Republic would take the place of the North American Republic of the nineteenth century.

I hope, Mr. Chairman, that I have shown the gentleman from the Louisville district that his views on the naturalization of foreigners are wrong, and erroneously conceived; and also the representative from Tennessee, that his preconceived notions of paupers and their emigration to this country are not so well founded as he supposed, or so inimical to the prosperity and future progress of the nation; and last, though not least, the gentleman from Virginia, whose conceptions would be enlarged, I think, by a visit to parts other than the Accomac district.

The gentleman's individual argument, together with that of his colleague, [Mr. SMITH], is no indication that Virginia will ever stoop so low as to countenance or approve the unholy and unconstitutional war upon adopted citizens and their guaranteed rights, which has so often deluged our cities in blood, and has brought so much disgrace and dishonor upon the nation. Nobly did she stand forth before the nation and the world when this war was at its fiercest height, and threw herself between the enemies of the Constitution and the South. She fought the battle bravely; but she fought it in the name and in behalf of the South. She drove back the restless hordes of innovators, who would indoctrinate her people in the pestiferous principles of northern fanaticism, and would lay sacrilegious hands upon the enduring monuments of ancestral glory which the McDowells, the Breckinridges, the McDuffies, the McGruders, and other names not unknown to fame, have scattered along the base of the Blue Ridge.

The gentleman from the district immediately adjoining the seat of Government, may unite with his colleague from Accomac, and join the crusade against the foreign-born citizen. In this he yields, perhaps, to the necessities of his border locality, and it may be to his contiguity to the commercial metropolis of a neighboring State. But he does not speak the sentiment of the gallant old State of Virginia. He does injustice to the overwhelming majorities that carried the present distinguished Governor of that State into the first office in the Commonwealth. He may speak the sentiments of his district, or, perhaps, rather of its antiquated metropolis, but it is not the voice or the sentiment of the State of Virginia. I think I am warranted in making the assertion, by the result of the last gubernatorial election in that State, and also in indulging the hope that the future of Virginia will not belie her glorious past.

Sir, this very fidelity, not only of Virginia, but of the entire South, to principle, when she had everything to gain and nothing to lose, (for foreign emigration generally seeks a northern or western resting place,) is one of the brightest jewels in her diadem of proud supremacy. I therefore cling to her with a devotion almost equal to that of her own sons; and while she has made so many sacrifices for the Constitution and equal liberty, craven must be the northern heart, that draws its political life-blood from the national Democracy, that would abandon or desert her when the same spirit of fanaticism and bigotry assails either her rights or her honor.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. As I entered the Hall, the gentleman from New York was entertaining the committee by a reference to the early history of Kentucky, as written by my ancestor of my own name, and was recommending its repudiation to me to correct me in what he is pleased to term my antagonism to immigration. The gentleman claimed that the early and distinguished pioneers of our Kentucky civilization and settlement were Celts, or of Celtic origin; and he named our Harrods, and Harlans, and McAfees, McBrides, and Logans, as falling within the class to which he referred. Never was a gentleman more mistaken. Of all these men, so justly celebrated on the historic page, none were Irishmen, and only one, so far as I know from history or tradition, was of Irish origin. Finley was our first pioneer; Daniel Boone our second, in 1769. He was born in Maryland—where his ancestors had lived and died—moved thence, first to Virginia, then to North Carolina, whence he emigrated to Kentucky. Of James Harrod's nativity nothing is known. The McAfees were Virginians, from what is now Botetourt county. Ben Logan was the only man of all these who was of Irish descent, and he was not an Irishman.

Mr. KELLY. Who were his parents?

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. They were Irish persons who had at an early age emigrated to Pennsylvania before the war of the Revolution, when all were British subjects. They were married before the Revolution, and moved to Virginia, where Ben Logan was born. He served two campaigns before the American Revolution, and had retired as a soldier, and was married, and lived where Abingdon now stands, before his emigration to Kentucky, which took place in 1775. If the gentleman in his avarice for Celtic reputation claims him as an Irishman, he might as well claim me, for my maternal grandfather was an Irishman, who was also among the early settlers of Kentucky. If he claims the McAfees and McBrides, merely because they have Mc to their names, the claim of the Irishmen may take in the title to almost our entire people.

I have read the history of Kentucky carefully, and I have no recollection of a single one among all her early celebrated characters who was of foreign birth. They were born in the colonies, and had learned those lessons of personal independence which led our forefathers to win the civil liberty we now enjoy, and I fear shall be so negligent of as sadly to abuse. I return to the gentleman the advice he proffered to me, to read again the history of Kentucky.

Mr. KELLY. The gentleman has said his grandfather was an Irishman. I am glad to hear it. I have no doubt that the gentleman may attribute the solidity of his system to that fact.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I should think it very possible that it may have come from the other side. My grandfather, on the other side, was a Virginian. My whole stock on both sides runs back to the Revolution.

Mr. KELLY. The question, then, is only a question of time. I do not restrict the Celtic element in this country within such narrow limits. I am willing to concede that the names I have cited may have been planted originally either in Maryland or Virginia before they appeared in the vanguard of Kentucky civilization; but they were Celts for all that; and they have left behind them the unmistakable and indestructible marks of Celtic bravery and true courage. But, sir, these are incidents, not the substance of this controversy. I only desired to point to the ungrateful spirit of Americanism, which would ignore its own blood, and tear down the monuments of our colonial or revolutionary glory, because they perpetuate the names as well as the deeds of our Celtic forefathers. I care not if you trace them to the very moment they first set foot on these shores: you cannot go behind that, unless you claim for them an aboriginal lineage. Where you stop I shall begin; and be assured, in tracing back the current of blood to its parent fountain, I shall need no better compass to guide my steps to the Celtic source than that which the McBrides and McAfees supply. The ear-mark is there; it needs no historian to fix its origin.

But, sir, may we not hope that a better day is beginning to dawn upon our country? We have had enough, and more than enough, of this rancorous spirit of partisan warfare. It is time we should forget those feuds that would separate brother from brother and friend from friend, and meet once again on the common platform of true, constitutional, American nationality. When our liberties are menaced, and the foe man dares to invade our soil, we stop not to ask the birth-place of our ancestors, or the period of our own or our fathers' emigration. Are we true and loyal to the Constitution of our country, and ready to peril our life in its defense? That was the revolutionary standard of citizenship; let it, in the name of God and of liberty, be ours also. Our adopted citizens have, in no instance, proved themselves unworthy this standard, and they are not likely to degenerate in future time. The German and the Irishman of to-day are no less patriotic and ardent in the cause of human freedom than the German and the Irishman of the Revolution. We may, perhaps, sooner than we imagine, need the bravery of all our sons. A wily enemy is lurking about our borders. Her emissaries and agents are marauding about the waters of our southern States, and already our flag has been insulted and our citizens maltreated by these arrogant intermeddlers. We may need the union of all true hearts and bold hands. Let us not palsify the national strength by unmeaning distinctions and illiberal proscription. Our truest glory consists in our birthright of freedom: Our freedom is but a name without the virtues of our sires.

KANSAS AND THE ADMINISTRATION.

SPEECH OF HON. A. H. CRAGIN,

OF NEW HAMPSHIRE,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

May 24, 1858.

The House being in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. CRAGIN said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: Having failed to put the Le-compton fraud and swindle through this House naked, and thereby fasten slavery upon the State of Kansas against the known and expressed will of her people, the godfathers of the monster have concluded to clothe it in garments of gold, and send it back to the people, and if possible, bribe them to adopt it as their legitimate child. It is to be taken to the Territory of Kansas with a bribe in one hand and a scourge in the other. It is hoped that its residence, in the pure, polite, and refined society of Washington for the past few months, has so improved it, as to induce the people of Kansas to forget its base origin, and to receive it as the virgin offspring of popular sovereignty. But if they will not accept the bribe as the price of its adoption, apostatize from their faith, and bow down and worship the Moloch of slavery, they are to be punished, and doomed to remain a Territory for an indefinite period of time.

The bill which has passed Congress, and received the approval of the President, speaks to the people of Kansas in the following language: "It is the desire of the present Democratic Administration that you come into the Union at this time, provided you will come with the Lecompton constitution. We know that you loathe and abhor that instrument. We know that you have protested against it in the most earnest and solemn manner. You claim, and we admit, that it is the workmanship of a minority, and that it is spotted all over with fraud. But feeling that it is the only chance to make Kansas a slave State, we have used every means in our power to force it upon you. In this we have failed. We are still anxious that you should take it; and as an inducement, we offer you admission and public lands worth $5,000,000. But if you refuse this bribe, and will not become a slave State, you shall be deemed unfit for admission, and must remain out of the Union until you have a population nearly double that which you now have, and lose the benefit of the public land, much of which we have already advertised for sale." In other words, "We admit that your present population is sufficient for a slave State; but it will require forty or fifty thousand more inhabitants before you can even apply for admission as a free State."

I will state the proposition contained in this law, in the language of Colonel John W. Forney, the gallant defender of the rights of the people. In the Press of April 24, he says:

"By a careful analysis of the report, it will be seen that the present proposition tenders a distinct bribe of large land grants, as an inducement to the people of Kansas to accept a form of government which they utterly loathe and abhor. It says, in so many words, to the people of Kansas: You must accept this bribe, coupled with the bill of abominations which you have again and again condemned, if you wish to come into the Union without delay; or, if you are perverse enough to spurn the bribe, you shall be deemed guilty of contumacy, and shall remain out of the Union until it shall legally appear that you have a population large enough to entitle you to elect a Representative on the ratio of representation established by Congress."

I can think of but one transaction in sacred or profane history with which to compare this. The Bible records it as follows:

"The Devil taketh him up into an exceeding high mountain, and sheweth him all the kingdoms of the world, and the glory of them:

"And saith unto him, all these things will I give thee, if thou wilt fall down and worship me.

"Then saith Jesus unto him, get thee hence, Satan."

The slave power, in this latter transaction, personates the Devil, and says to the people of Kansas: "All these things will I give thee, if thou wilt fall down and worship me."

The people of Kansas will make the same reply—"Get thee hence, Satan."

It must be confessed that this proposition is an adroit and cunning scheme. If the history of the noble men of Kansas did not furnish us an ample guarantee of their fidelity and devotion to principle, we might fear that they would falter in this hour of trial and temptation. They have suffered as no people ever suffered in this country since the formation of our Government. For wishing and honestly striving to make their future home, and the home of their children and children's children, a free State, many of them have been murdered in cold blood. Their property has been stolen and destroyed; their houses burned down; and their wives and children rendered homeless and homeless, for no other cause. Because they have refused to sanction the grossest acts of usurpation and fraud, and abandon their dearest rights as American citizens, the President of the United States, in imitation of George the Third, has stigmatized them as "rebels" and "enemies of their country." They have stood through all these trials, and many more which no pen has written or tongue told, the true and devoted champions of liberty. They have shown an attachment to principle only equaled by the men of the Revolution. I will not doubt their fidelity. They will spurn the bribe, and bury the Lecompton constitution so deep that neither earthquake nor flood can find it. They will demonstrate to the world that principle and right are more valuable than gold; and that money and public lands have more power in Washington than in Kansas.

This measure is hailed as a compromise, as an offering of peace. It is no such thing. It is only equaled by the Lecompton constitution itself, in its mean, deceptive, and shuffling character. It prolongs the controversy, and adds fuel to the fires of agitation. It adds one more chapter to the history of the efforts of the Democratic party to make Kansas a slave State. It is only a change of policy to attain the same end—the end which the last and present Administrations have labored so hard to reach—to wit: the enslavement of Kansas.

The first movement after the passage of the Nebraska bill, was one of violence and invasion from an adjoining State. The ballot-box was wrested from the rightful voters and converted into an engine of oppression. Under this usurpation the territorial government of Kansas started. Cruel and unjust laws were enacted by the usurping Legislature, all having for their object the establishment of slavery. Ever since then, the struggle has been between the people and the usurpers. The minority have labored to retain their ill-gotten power, and to fasten slavery upon the people. The majority have labored to throw off the usurpation and regain their natural and legal rights. The former and present Administrations took sides with the usurpers, against the people, and upheld them in their work of subjugation. When the people refused assent to the odious laws passed by their oppressors, the President quartered large bodies of armed men in the Territory, for the purpose of enforcing these laws and strengthening the hands of the invaders.

When it was ascertained that the people would not submit, a plan was devised for driving them from the Territory. Their crops were destroyed; their property stolen and burned; their lives were threatened, and oftentimes taken. This game failing, another was devised. It was known to the leaders of the pro-slavery party that a large majority of the people were in favor of making Kansas a free State. It would not do to trust the election of the next Legislature to honest, legal voters. They resolved to try ballot-box stuffing and forged returns. They thought it would be just as right and legal for one man to manufacture five thousand votes as for five thousand men to come all the way from Missouri to vote. It was less trouble and much safer. They abandoned the Cincinnati platform, and planted themselves on the Cincinnati Directory. They counted upon success; for they supposed they had the game all in their own hands; but Governor Walker and Secretary Stanton were too honest men for the managers of this diabolical game. They refused to receive a return of one thousand six hundred votes from a precinct which could not cast one hundred legal votes. When these returns were rejected the tables turned, and the people, to some extent, regained their rights. For this act of justice and right Governor Walker and Secretary Stanton, so far as the public know, never received one word of approval from the President or his Cabinet. It is evident that there was disapproval at the White House. From the hour that it was known that the Oxford and McGee returns had been rejected, Governor Walker and Secretary Stanton were doomed men. The slave power demanded it, and the President dared not refuse. The game of making Kansas a slave State was likely to be blocked. This could not be tolerated.

The bogus Lecompton convention next took the matter in hand. They attempted, by assuming legislative powers, to supersede the newly-elected Legislature, and to deprive it of all power to act. They sought, by their action, to remove the government of the Territory, and to set up a temporary government of their own, with John Calhoun at its head.

The election had demonstrated that a large majority of the people were for making Kansas a free State. The Lecompton convention resolved to form a pro-slavery constitution, and put it in force without the approval of the people, and against their will. The game of invasion and fraudulent voting and forged returns had not saved them, and they now resolved upon the bold game of making Kansas a slave State by their own action, and the aid of a Democratic Congress. They refused to submit the constitution to the people. I know there was a pretended submission of the slavery question; but every man of common sense knows that the contrivance was such that Kansas must be a slave State, whichever way the people might vote. The submission was a cheat and a swindle.

It was beyond dispute that there were at least twelve thousand free-State voters in Kansas, to less than three thousand pro-slavery. If, therefore, Kansas was to be made a slave State, a constitution must be forced upon the majority against their will. The three thousand must in some way rule the twelve thousand. This was the game of Calhoun and his confederates in Kansas, Missouri, and the whole South. That has been the game in Washington for the first five months of this session. There is not a man in this Hall who does not know that the Lecompton constitution is condemned and repudiated by an overwhelming majority of the people of Kansas, and that they protest against admission under it. Yet, sir, it has been pressed here with a pertinacity worthy of the noblest cause.

The President has bent all his energies to put Lecompton through, "naked," and thus trample upon the first and dearest rights of the people. He has begged and implored. He has shed tears of grief over the representatives of the people's rights, because they would not do this thing. He has almost refused to be comforted; so anxious is he to do the bidding of the slave power. I trust he may live to thank God that his efforts failed; and to regret the unmerited abuse he has heaped upon the people of Kansas. I hope, moreover, that he may live to see this Government brought back to its original policy and purity, and Freedom once more enthroned the goddess of America.

Having failed to subdue the heroic people of Kansas, by armed invaders at the ballot-box, and a standing army in the Territory; and being convinced that fraudulent votes and forged returns will not make Kansas a slave State; and finding that the Lecompton contrivance cannot be forced through Congress, the game now is, as developed by the conference bill, to combine bribery with fraud; and, failing in that, to punish the people by keeping them out of the Union for years to come.

The past history of the people of Kansas is a glorious one, and I have no doubt the future will be even more glorious. Kansas will be made a free State in spite of usurpation, violence, fraud, attempts at bribery, and threats of punishment. She will be made a free State by the long-suffering, virtue, intelligence, fidelity, and patriotism of her people.

I propose briefly to examine the conference bill, and compare it with the House bill, known as the Crittenden-Montgomery amendment. The bill, which has become a law, does not pretend to submit the Lecompton constitution to the people for a direct vote upon its merits. It would not do to subject that infamous thing to any such test. It is hung up to await the acceptance of a proposition in itself known to be extremely desirable to the people; the question virtually submitted being, "will you take three million five hundred thousand acres of land with the Lecompton constitution attached, and run your own risk of getting rid of the latter, or will you suffer the inconvenience and hardship of a territorial government for an indefinite period, with no assurance of land gifts, when you are able to become a State?" I admit that the law provides an indirect method by which the people, by first stultifying themselves, may strangle the constitution. The question of land grants is submitted, and upon the vote upon that question alone, is to depend the immediate admission of Kansas. The adoption of the land proposition is made the condition precedent. If the people vote that down, Lecompton falls with it; if they adopt it, Kansas is at once a State in the Union, with the Lecompton constitution fastened upon them. They are compelled to vote against what would be of advantage to them, what they desire, in order to get rid of a hateful constitution. They must vote against what they want, to wit:

35TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Kansas and the Administration—Mr. Cragin.

HO. OF REPS.

immediate admission and reasonable land grants; to prevent having imposed upon them what they do not want, to wit: the Lecompton constitution. By this law they cannot come into the Union, except they come in as a slave State.

In the event that the people vote down the land proposition, their action is to be interpreted as indicating a desire on their part to remain out of the Union; and they are to continue a Territory until they have ninety-three thousand inhabitants; or, failing in that before 1860, one hundred and twenty thousand. They are compelled to tell two lies in order to get rid of one great lie. They must say that they do not desire admission at this time, and that they do not want the lands, in order to avert the calamity of having the Lecompton constitution thrust upon them.

If the proposition is voted down, as it certainly will be, the whole question is left open to agitate the country, and to return here at each session of Congress, until the State is admitted into the Union. This law is no settlement of the question. It only removes it temporarily from Congress. It will return again to plague the inventors. The end of the Kansas agitation is, apparently, further off than when this Administration came into power. The country will hold those who have delayed and prevented a fair settlement of this question, to a strict and fearful accountability.

The bill that passed this House, on the 1st day of April last, submitted the Lecompton constitution, the thing in dispute, fairly and squarely to the untrammelled and unbiased judgment of the people, for their adoption or rejection. No bribes were offered for Lecompton; the adoption of no land-grant proposition was made a condition of admission. The only question presented to the people was, whether they would have Lecompton, or some other constitution. They were perfectly free to vote down Lecompton, and then as free to adopt another constitution to suit themselves, and in their own way. By that bill Kansas was admitted into the Union, absolutely and finally. By it she might at once become a free State. By the law, as it now stands, Kansas can only be a slave State. Had that bill become a law, the whole controversy about Kansas would have been settled, and forever removed from Congress. Agitation upon that question would have ceased from that hour. But the party in power refused the settlement, fair and honorable as it was, and choose rather to open the flood-gates of agitation anew, and continue the strife for two or three years longer. The country will hold this Administration responsible for the failure to settle this question on the basis of that bill.

Heretofore the friends of this Administration have falsely charged that the Republican party were anxious to keep this question open for political effect. The Republicans have been anxious for two years to settle this question by admitting Kansas into the Union as a free State, knowing that a very large majority of the people desired such admission. The Democrats have prevented that admission; and now that they cannot succeed in forcing her into the Union as a slave State, against the will of her people, they have determined that, if she will not come in that way, she shall not come at all. Theirs is the responsibility of keeping this question open.

But it is said the conference bill gives no more land than did Crittenden's bill; that they are exact copies, so far as the land grant is concerned. This is true, sir; but the grant now offered is on different conditions and under different circumstances. It is now offered on condition that the people will come into the Union under the Lecompton constitution. If they will not do that, it fails. It is made the condition of admission. The adoption of the land grant carries with it, as a consequence, the Lecompton constitution. The people cannot take the land without at the same time taking the constitution. Both are hitched together, and both must stand or fall by a single vote.

By the Crittenden bill the two propositions were distinct and separate—one could stand and the other fall. The people could take either, or neither, and still be in the Union. They could accept the land grant, and reject Lecompton. Now the acceptance of the land grant must necessarily and inevitably adopt Lecompton.

By the Crittenden bill the State was admitted; and the people were left free to vote down Lecompton, and adopt a constitution of their own making. The land grant offered no inducement in favor of the Lecompton swindle, as it certainly does in the law as it now stands. The State was to be admitted, whether the people took the land or not. If they accepted the grant, it was to be binding on the Government of the United States; but it in no way affected the admission of the State, or the constitution that it might adopt.

In the one case, Kansas was to come into the Union with such constitution as the people should adopt; and they were then, or afterwards, free to accept the land or not. In the case as it now stands, Kansas must come into the Union, if she come at all, with the Lecompton constitution. If she will not take the land, and with it Lecompton, she is denied admission.

The Crittenden bill is an honest, fair, manly, straightforward, and statesman-like measure—leaving the question of the constitution to the people, where it rightfully belongs. The conference scheme is dishonest, unfair, crooked, and unstatesmanlike. It is debasing in its tendencies—corrupting the public morals. The examples of the Government will be followed by the people. Fraud and bribery have already become so frequent in matters connected with elections, as to endanger the purity of the ballot-box, and to threaten the very existence of our republican system. Demagogues and scoundrels will pattern from this measure, and in future we may expect an increase of double dealing, trickery, fraud, and bribery. Such legislation is unworthy a great and Christian nation.

It is a sad commentary on the true doctrine of popular sovereignty. It seeks to circumvent the people, and, by gifts and threats of punishment, to induce them to take a constitution which does not embody their will, and which receives and deserves their execration.

The friends of the Lecompton constitution dare not submit the naked thing to the people. They know that four fifths of them are against it, and that, if they could only get at it, in that shape, they would give it immediate burial. It would also demonstrate to the world the wickedness of the attempt to force it upon them. They have, therefore, given it a sugar coating, hoping that, for a consideration, the people will gulp it down.

There is one other significant difference between these two measures. By the Crittenden bill, in order that the election might be fair, four commissioners were to have charge of matters connected therewith, namely, the Governor and Secretary of the Territory, appointed by the President, and the President of the Council and the Speaker of the House of the Territorial Legislature. Two appointed by the President and two elected by the people. The people were to have an equal chance. But by the bill prepared by the conference committee, one more is added to the board, to wit, the district attorney; thus giving a majority to the friends of the Lecompton constitution. By the law any three of the board constitute a quorum, and can act. This is pure "popular sovereignty," as practiced by the Democratic party. This change was made for some purpose, and it will be difficult to convince the country that it was not done to control the election, and give facilities for fraudulent voting and forged returns. Kansas has long been fruitful ground for the basest election frauds by the friends of this Administration; and it would be strange if seed so plentifully sown would not produce another crop. To cap the climax the bill should have provided that the returns be made to John Calhoun, and deposited in his candle-box.

It is very evident to my mind that the Administration will bend all its efforts to carry the election for "proposition accepted." No expense will be spared to make Kansas a slave State. Everything that endangers this result, so far as they have the power, will be removed. Already has District Attorney Weir been removed because he would not worship Lecompton, and a man by the name of Davis appointed, to aid in the work of making a slave State of Kansas. Secret agents of the Administration will be sent into the Territory to influence the people to vote for Lecompton. Of course they will all be free-State men.

They will tell the long-suffering people of Kansas that they have only to come into the Union, and that they can immediately change Lecompton into anything they choose. This will be in perfect keeping with the trickery of this law.

It is well known that the most valuable lands in the Territory are already advertised for sale. The times are hard, and the settlers find it impossible to raise the money to pay for their lands, in order to save them from this sale. They have asked a postponement of the sale for one year. Their reasonable request has not been granted. The sale has been postponed till November, with an intimation from the Administration, that there will probably be no difficulty in granting a further postponement, if Kansas becomes a sovereign State. That is, if the people will take Lecompton, the Administration of James Buchanan will give them longer time to pay for their land. The necessities of the poor are to be taken advantage of, in order to induce them to do what they abhor. Like the exacting money-lender, the men now in power promise an extension, for a consideration, namely: the acceptance of the Lecompton constitution. An Administration that has urged and begged Congress to force this spurious constitution upon the necks of an unwilling and protesting people, will not scruple to use all the means at its command, to accomplish the same thing by bribery or by a pretended election.

I have full faith that the people of Kansas, if they have anything like a fair chance, will spurn the bribe, maintain their integrity, and treat every man as a traitor who advocates admission on such degrading terms.

Beyond all this, the conference bill enunciates a new principle—one that has already attracted the attention of the country. The doctrine that it requires a greater population for a free State than for a slave State, is distinctly implied in this measure. I suppose this doctrine is to become a new article in the pro-slavery Democratic creed. Whether this new invention is to be labeled "State equality," or christened with some other popular name, I know not. Call it by what name you please—we accept the issue! It is a degrading and insulting distinction, and the North will resist it. The most ingenious doughface in all the free States, cannot invent a reason why Kansas should be admitted as a slave State with her present population, and denied admission as a free State till her population has doubled. You have thrown down the glove on this issue: we shall take it up. We will go to the people with this issue. Upon our banners we will inscribe: "The rights of the people. The immediate admission of Kansas as a free State. No distinctions in favor of slavery." If there are not members enough in this House two years hence to admit Kansas without delay as a free State, I shall be greatly mistaken. I think it will be much easier to convince the people of the free North that it is vastly more proper to keep the men who voted for this new principle of "equality" out of Congress, than that Kansas should be denied admission as a free State, with conditions, that, in the opinion of these gentlemen, qualify her for admission as a slave State.

The political grave-yard received large accessions when the Nebraska bill passed; and the mourners still go about the streets. Again its gates will be thrown wide open, and many will go in thereat. The race of doughfaces has not increased for the past four years, and this measure is likely to prove a Noah's flood to the remainder. Already has this Administration a fearful account to settle. Its supporters on this floor and elsewhere will be punished not only for what they have done and attempted to do, in respect to Kansas, but they will be arraigned before the country for betraying great trusts—for repudiating solemn pledges, and for obtaining power under false pretenses. By the common law, as well as by statute, in most of the States, the obtaining of goods, money, and other valuable things, by false pretenses and false tokens, is declared to be an offense, and is severely punished. The fact is as notorious as the election itself, that throughout the northern States the Democratic party, in the campaign of 1856, inscribed upon its banners the motto "Buchanan and free Kansas." The sincerity with which they promised to make Kansas a free State, and the seeming indignation with which they repelled the charge of a want of fidelity in their presidential candidate to this policy, defeated the inflexible Fremont, and elected the supple Buchanan. But for these reiterated pledges, the so-called Democratic party would have been defeated in every free State in this Union. Had the people of Pennsylvania dreamed, in the fall of 1856, that the chief business of the first eight months of a Buchanan Administration would be wheedling and dividing the free-State men of Kansas, and then, by fraud and force, securing the apparent adoption of a pro-slavery constitution; and that, during five weary months of this Congress, the whole Federal power and patronage would be prostituted to forcing upon that people a government which they abhor; and that, failing to do this directly, it would try to effect it by a dark and devious policy, as deceptive as it is despicable—I say, had the people of the land of Penn and Franklin dreamed that such would be the Kansas policy of Mr. Buchanan, they would have beaten the Democratic ticket in the "Keystone State" by thousands upon thousands.

I repeat, then, that not only will the people of the North scourge this Administration for what it has done and attempted to do in respect to Kansas, but they will compare the record of its actual deeds with the pledges it made when asking public confidence, and will mete out punishment accordingly. Human nature always feels more indignant at being circumvented by trickery and hypocrisy than at being beaten in open, manly conflict. Cornwallis, who drove Greene before him in fair, manly battle, is a name honored even in America; while that of Arnold, who, by false tokens, obtained the command of West Point that he might betray it to the enemy, is the synonym of falsehood and treachery the world over.

The Republicans, who asserted that Buchanan would ply all his arts to make Kansas a slave State, and would prove the most ready tool of the negro oligarchy that ever occupied the presidential chair, have not been deceived. Their predictions have been verified. Their present hostility to his Administration is natural. The assault they will make upon it hereafter will only be the warfare of consistent foes.

But what name shall I give to that summary punishment which thousands upon thousands of betrayed Democrats are eager to inflict upon the Administration at the earliest opportunity; men who were honest in their pledges of "free Kansas," who promptly indorsed the promises of party leaders in the great contest of 1856, who implicitly relied upon the sincerity of their presidential chief? Cheated by their leaders, betrayed by their chief, taunted by an incensed people, they will deride the man, and repudiate the party that has deceived and disgraced them.

Sore and sure as will be the chastisement that this large class will inflict upon the Administration, it will be mildness and mercy itself, when compared with the terrible retribution that another portion of Mr. Buchanan's supporters have in store for him and his retainers. I allude to that most respectable body of them called "conservatives," "old-line Whigs," or "no-party men." In the very crisis of the contest, they threw their weight into the trembling balance, and awarded him the victory. Towards the close of the conflict it assumed such a shape as to give these men great influence over the result. Especially was this true in the preliminary October election in Pennsylvania, the pivot on which the whole canvass finally turned. These gentlemen were, no doubt, partly influenced to join the standard of Buchanan by his wanted respectability of character, his mature age, his great experience in public affairs, his gravity of visage, dress, and demeanor. They could not doubt that so venerable a personage must be a conservative. I have always thought that the white cravat and doctor-of-divinity like air in general, of the Wheatland sage had not a little to do in luring to his support this high minded and somewhat aristocratic body of men. But the chief motive that influenced them, probably, was his express and implied promise, that he would deal fairly by Kansas; that he would rebuke pro-slavery "fanaticism," as well as "abolitionism;" that he would set his face against "sectionalism;" that he would not wink at "fillibustering" on the ocean, nor "border-ruffianism" on the land. They believed most sincerely that should a state of things arise in Kansas such as has now involved her affairs in a net-work of frauds, perjuries, forgeries, ballot-box stuffing, and rascalities of all sorts, Mr. Buchanan was the very man to crush such crimes with the weight of his authority, and to vindicate the cause of justice, honesty, and fair dealing in that Territory.

That these conservative gentlemen, whose votes turned the scale in favor of Buchanan, have been most woefully deceived in him, is beyond all question. That their pride of character has been deeply wounded at finding themselves classified among the supporters of an Administration that protects and honors thieves, forgers, ballot-box stuffers, and rogues in general, is very certain. That their pride of opinion has been sorely mortified at being duped by the Pecksniffian morality of the author of the Connecticut clerical epistle, is most true. Men thus galled in their tenderest points will not only embrace the first opportunity to dissolve this uncongenial alliance, but will take swift vengeance upon those who wheedled them into such position. Of all the ingredients of that retribution which is soon to be poured out upon the pro-slavery Democracy of the North, the most bitter, the most destructive will be the hot indignation of these cheated "conservatives," these deluded "old-line Whigs," these betrayed "no-party men."

The gathering in the political heavens is ominous of the coming storm. The tempest that swept the free States in the autumn of 1854, when the people visited their wrath upon the party that had just "removed the old landmarks" by obliterating the slavery prohibition of the Missouri compromise; and the tornado that careered through the North two years afterwards, prostrating so many aspiring men, and though not wholly successful in its objects, yet most salutary even in its partial effects, and full of hope for the future, will prove to be but gentle gales when compared with that retributive hurricane which, in the approaching autumn, will scathe the Lecompton Democracy as with the besom of destruction.

Are we mistaken in the signs of the times? Turning the eye towards the setting sun, can we doubt that the young State lying beyond the Sierra Nevada will sustain her able representatives in the Senate and in this House in their opposition to the Lecompton fraud? As to the five growing States of the Northwest, which were saved to perpetual liberty by the immortal ordinance of 1787; and the State, not less prosperous, which was consecrated to freedom forever by the Missouri compromise; and the vigorous new State just admitted to the Union, will they not all vindicate the cause of free labor by sending a delegation to the next Congress that will be a unit on questions like those which have divided men and rent parties during the present session?

As to Pennsylvania, her favorite son has ascended to power. He has disappointed her hopes. He has soured her spirit. The charm is gone. The spell is broken. She will break her chains and stand forth redeemed, emancipated, and disenthralled. Let him who doubts this, ponder the result of the recent election in Philadelphia, and be assured that what has been done in May on the banks of the Delaware and Schuylkill, will in October be repeated on the banks of the Susquehanna, the Juniata, the Monongahela, the Alleghany, and the Ohio. As New Jersey suffered with Pennsylvania in the struggle, and shared with her in the triumph of the Revolution, so, too, has she generally followed the lead of that great State in all political changes; and so will she now. It would also be belying the whole history of New York, a State that gave to the war of Independence the sword of a Schuyler and a Hamilton—that gave to the constitutional era the pen of a Jay and a Livingston—and that has given to the counsels of the Republic and the cause of freedom the services of a King, a Clinton, a Tompkins, and a Wright, to question that in a crisis like this she will cast her "Empire" weight into the scale of liberty.

I hardly need speak for New England; for since this Congress has been in session she has begun to speak for herself. The emphatic voice of New Hampshire, Connecticut, and Rhode Island, recently uttered against this Lecompton crime, will in due time be reiterated by Vermont, Maine, and Massachusetts. Those who now misrepresent the sentiment of New England in these Halls will soon have leave of absence. They will not appear here at the next Congress, nor will anybody of like faith succeed to their seats. "The places which now know them will know them no more forever." No human being outside of a nursery or a lunatic asylum doubts that, in the next Congress, glorious New England will present an unbroken front in the cause of freedom.

Speaking for my own State, I can certify to her fidelity. When her own son, sitting in the presidential chair, forced upon the country the Kansas-Nebraska act, she turned her back scornfully upon him, and set her feet indignantly upon his Administration. But so much more does she detest the policy of James Buchanan, that in comparison therewith she is beginning to look upon that of Franklin Pierce with a feeling akin to complacency. I know the people of New Hampshire well. Her White Mountains are not more firmly rooted to the earth than her sons are grounded in the cause of civil and religious freedom. In that most solemn and eventful hour of the Republic, on that memorable 4th of July, 1776, her Representatives in Congress were the first to vote for the Declaration of Independence; and her people will be the last to abandon the principles of that immortal charter of human rights. Whoever else falters in the hour of trial, they will be found faithful. Whenever the trumpet calls to battle, they will rally to the standard; and

"From their tall mountains to the sea,
One voice shall thunder, WE ARE FREE!"

ORIGIN OF SLAVERY.

SPEECH OF HON. PHILEMON BLISS, OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
May 24, 1858.

The House being in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. BLISS said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: During the crowded Lecompton debate, I refrained from seeking the floor, chiefly because I desired to see the new opponents of the Kansas outrages, and especially my colleagues, learn to stand and, if possible, to walk alone; and also because the subject itself was one I could with great difficulty coolly consider. I could reason with a highwayman, if I had no more effective weapon; I might also remonstrate with a pickpocket; but I could find no fit words for discussing, in a republican representative body, the propriety of forcing a dark despotism upon a protesting people, upon one of our own young States, especially as this was to be done in the name of Democracy and of "popular sovereignty." If the statement of the proposition would not carry its own damnation, no parliamentary language of mine could fitly describe it; and the mind that could for a moment entertain it, is entirely beyond my reach.

And when the Administration and its masters, foiled in the naked wickedness, incubated with those whose plighted faith, if not their principles, should have been their guard, and hatched the nasty substitute—a substitute establishing the principle of non-submission, while claiming to provide for its effect, though coupled with conditions fraud-inviting and deeply insulting to Kansas, to freedom, and the North—I watched the new-born men to see whether a soul had been actually given them. More in pity than in anger, I saw them fall before they had well learned to stand; saw them, with mouths full of valiant words, swallow naked and degrading insults; saw them yield to a dominant absolutism, though not a complete, yet a real, and to us and them degrading victory.

By a lawless enforcement of lawless dicta, slavery exists in all the Territories; and we have now the precedent that such Territory may at any time become a slave State; but, if it cannot be forced or bribed to receive a slave constitution, it must continue a slave Territory; must wait for the last jot and tittle of preliminary requirement.

I had faintly hoped to have been spared this cup of degradation; but why should I? Ever since the slave interest has succeeded in overriding every other interest; ever since the enemies of free labor, the contemners of free speech, the assassins of free thought, have established the reign of terror in nearly half these States, have I seen but a single purpose, a "one idea," an absorbing object, prompting and guiding their every scheme.

Gentlemen seem astonished at the bald wickedness of striving to force upon an unwilling, a protesting people, a despotic fundamental law, and the balder meanness of tendering them a bribe and a threat to receive what could not thus be forced. Yet, where the end is the supremacy of force, where that end has been for years the steady, unremitted object, with no variableness, and scarce a shadow of turning, how can we wonder? Shall the means be more holy than the end? The Leecompton scheme of fraud and usurpation, the preparatory outrages—the forays, the robberies, the burnings, the imprisonments, the murders—all perpetrated by, or under the eye of, Federal officials; all sustained, directly or indirectly, by Federal bayonets, and the disgraceful finale, may well astonish and alarm! Yet they are but acts in the one grand drama.

The success of these champions of force is no less surprising. Representing but a section of this Union, and that section, from the blighting influence of their rule, comparatively weak and poverty stricken, men wonder to see them able to control the federation and realize every sectional scheme; able to give a construction to the fundamental law one way against the wants of commerce, of creative art, and the necessities of personal protection, and another way in favor of despotic interests; to see them make solemn contracts to subserve such interests, and break them for the same end; to see them able to sectionalize and pack the supreme judiciary; to strike down the habeas corpus and trial by jury; to involve us in war upon the weak to rob territory for slavery, while yielding to the strong that which was free, and to which "our title was clear and unquestionable;" to see them able to proscribe all high-minded men, driving from the public service those of all sections who believe in the harmony of the Decalogue, the Declaration, and the Constitution—making tests that would have excluded Franklin and Jefferson and Jay from the pettiest office; to see them make cringing slaves of northern boasters, dooming to the curse of the serpent, "upon thy belly shalt thou crawl," every applicant for Federal favor; to see them cause in this Hall parliamentary law, respected upon other questions, to be so often overthrown upon questions of slavery; and make the courts of the federation, eager and bloodthirsty after a fugitive from servitude, powerless against the piratical apostles of foreign propagandism. Men, too, wonder, ay, they are sore amazed, to see the apostles of force able to place this Government in league with conspirators against one of its Territories, sustaining them in ballot-stuffings, forgeries, and every political crime known among men, to cause it to employ all its powers to fasten upon this Territory a form of State government it loathes and detests, giving as the chief reason for the damning crime the fact that it does thus detest it! Ay, and their wonder grows to astonishment as they behold Representatives of spasmodic virtue glad to be permitted to aid to the fell end by bribes, by threats, and by invited frauds!

Whence this omnipotence for evil? Yet we should not wonder. These are the necessary results of the different spirit and resolution, the different manner and purpose, that have hitherto distinguished the controversies between the friends and opponents, if opponents they may be called, of human enslavement. The friends of absolutism have been all will, all energy, all perseverance in their work; while their opponents have met them by temporizing, now expostulating, now faintly resisting, and finally always yielding. The former have seized a great idea as the basis of their civilization; and steadily keeping it in view, have subordinated every other consideration. The latter, intent upon gain and peace in its pursuit, have ignored all fixed principle, been blind to any great end, and have substituted a shuffling expediency for an enduring purpose. The "I will" of the one is met by the "please don't" of the other; and "I'm afraid I can't" is the bravest response to the grim "you shall;" and while the former have kept their representative men in the middle of the conflict, the latter have sought to send into retirement all whose earnestness of resistance has seemed to make reality of the sham. Even the brave champions of "the equality of the States" and "the sovereignty of the people," after consistency has been made more safe than surrender, as they meet the frown of the accustomed master, eagerly yield both, by a dishonorable discrimination against a free constitution, and by tendering a brave people a bullying bribe to accept an oft-rejected slave one.

We often hear the shuffling and the inconstant denounce the decided as abstractionists, as men of mere ideas; and with blank self-complacency congratulate themselves as devoted to the actualities of life, and not its mere notions—as though the ideal were not the only human actual—as though the mere material wants of men were more than those of the swine. The ruling idea shapes all things. Before the world sprang forth from the hand of the Creator—before tree or animal assumed form—it first stood clearly out in His mind, and he pronounced it good only as it realized the ideal. So the artist, before he touches the chisel, first elaborates and places the form on its pedestal in his own mind; and his subsequent labor is not for his own eyes, but to enable others to see what to him is already more clear than it can ever become to them. That form inspires to virtue or lust, to devotion or sensuality, according to the idea that inspires and guides the arm. So with society, whether political or religious, social or domestic. It is based upon an idea—yea it is itself an idea, and its ends are but ideal—and such society is a blessing or a curse; it civilizes or barbarizes; it promotes happiness or misery, virtue or vice, holiness or sensualism, according to these ends.

And we hear the same class of materialists denounce the world's workers as "men of one idea;" as though any man could breast the current or stem the tide, could wake the sluggish race, give form to society, and soul and sentiment to man; or even achieve those less difficult, though, to vulgar eyes, more striking material triumphs that send the steam engine along the mountain slope, or the lightning upon its quiet post-boy errands, who is not controlled by a leading, absorbing, all-conquering idea. A resolute purpose, a steady zeal, must burn in his soul. An unshaken constancy, a granite principle, a great ideal end must take possession of him, must overpower and drive out the seductions of indolence or sense, must dispossess the idols that would preoccupy or divert him, and bear him "onward, right onward," to his goal, and with a steady momentum that first excites the derision, next the wonder, and finally takes captive the will of those around him. Tell me who has the most enduring purpose, and, with anything like equality, I will tell you who will conquer. The sure proscriptions of their enemies, the derisions of the brainless, are the certain tribute to their power; and if borne as heroes alone can bear them, the pledge of their triumph. But I pray the scoffer to point me to the achievements of those who are not men of one idea; who have no controlling purpose, no fixed faith, but are floats, tossed upon every wave, waifs cast upon every shore, butterflies wafted upon every breeze.

Were I to indulge in personal illustration, I might point to men of my own section—men of great opportunities, and who have become illustrious or an offense, according to their faith, their fixedness of purpose. I might instance our Websters and Van Burens, who, seeing the right, spasmodically struggled against the wrong; yet "loving the lap of Delilah more than the rough tents of Israel," yielded to treacherous caresses, and became but the sport of the common enemy. Those who might have carved themselves a name on which the hopeful would come from afar to look; who might have given their country a faith; bowed to the superior will of their enemies, and are laid, and are waiting to be laid, in the forgotten graves of the vulgar great.

I might also point to our Adams—and my colleague will pardon me for adding our Giddings—whose fidelity, whose will, amid storms of foes, and, what so much more tries a great man's soul, the shrinking of coward friends, boldly met, breasted and overwhelmed the tyranny that had stifled this House, and restored, what to lose is to lose all—freedom of debate, to this, the people's Hall. Ay, and more; that will, that resolution, is taking captive the honest, the free masses of the land, and the fresh impositions of mad tyranny, instead of cowering and discouraging, but inspire them to eager labor and patient waiting for its sure overthrow.

I might also instance from the champions of force, from those who have fought so well in a cause so bad, the name of Calhoun, the John Calvin of the propaganda. Constant in his labor, undiverted by personal hopes or party ties, with only a band, scarce a twelve, of acknowledged followers in the national councils, he has finally, by his fidelity and by his and their perseverance, furnished the dogmas and controlled the action of the party of absolutism. He affected no consistency but in the one idea. He was pure in his life, yet the apostle of systematized violence, and unchecked lewdness. He was clear in his logic, yet he ran to the most opposite conclusions. Starting out with the boldest and most outspoken opposition to Democratic principles, he and his followers have given laws to the Democratic party. Holding the Union to be subject to the will, and its measures to the veto of any State, they have indirectly dictated the policy that makes States but subject provinces, and their authorities the sport of the pettiest Federal official. Constantly talking of constitutions and laws, they as constantly labor to turn back the tide of civilization, and reenthroned the "law of the strong hand." Yet there was method in all these inconsistencies, a resolute purpose running through them, a will that has wrenched from coward partisans the stamp of State, and made current guineas of them all.

I have often been surprised to see men apparently so unconcerned of the power of a great idea. They would erect that most sublime of creations, a just State, by appeals to mere pecuniary interest, as though interest alone ever worked in that direction, ever withstood the lower instincts—as though, untampered by the sentiments, it ever appealed but to the merest avarice. It needs a high passion, a noble enthusiasm, an elevated principle, to work the beneficent revolutions of earth. True, our highest interests are in harmony with them, like the sympathy of the elevated spirit and body. The body should be fed; but "man lives not by bread alone."

The honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. THAYER,] himself distinguished for a great—a Teutonic idealism—has told us of the power of organized emigration. I deeply sympathize with him and his idea, and only fear that he too greatly relies upon mere interest. How long would his Kansas emigration have stood the bloody foray and the Federal frown, had it not been recruited and sustained by the sentiment, the idea, that burned in the northern mind? There was no organization in the West, and yet, without the aid of the men and women of the West, impelled by their ideas, rather than interests, the whole machinery of organized emigration would have been impotent against the mad fanaticism of the border.

Organized emigration, based upon the idea of justice as well as interest, impelled by a generous enthusiasm, a passion to plant States whose future will be great and stable, as embodying and looking to this great idea, will be, must be, successful. But devoid of it, the quiet enthusiasm that resolutely plants and patiently waits for the sure and immortal growth, becomes the mad foray that knows not to plant, but essays to build by overthrow. That natural love of power and of property, that, as tempered by justice, teaches us to acquire influence over men by vindicating their rights, and dominion over things by the patient accumulations of labor, without this guard, inspires demagogism, ballot-stuffings, and coup d'états, swindles, and embezzlements. Wherein differed the colonists of Plymouth and Philadelphia, from those of Port au Prince and Mexico? or the founders of Lawrence from Buford's brigands? Their interests were the same, and if interest alone governed their conduct should have been the same, and yet, one would found society upon justice, the other upon force; one would base property upon "the law of nature," the other upon "the law of the strong hand;" one would make an Ohio, the other a Cuba. See to it when you send your legions on, that the scepter of justice leads the column, that the holy passion of its worshippers shall so firmly enthrone it as to eternize its rule!

And if my voice could reach all who work and lead others that work for the great end, I would warn them against the temptations of temporary expedients, the diversions from that strict principle which alone can lead to that end. It is not the broad and easy road that leadeth through the wilderness, and there is no safety amid its devious paths but in following the pillar of cloud and of fire. Though its track may seem circuitous, though it may lead us back through the desert, even from the sight of the promised land, till the slaves that dare not possess it shall have hid in the sands their coward bones; yet behind the Divine pillar will flee rock and desert, Midianite and Amorite, till the land shall be reached, and by a people who dare possess it!

I have spoken of the energy and success of the slave domination, yet I see in the near future its hastening end. I see it because tyranny itself has become demented. The wisdom that controlled its energy has departed. Its strength was in its moderation as well as firmness; it has become wantonly arrogant and insulting. Its allies have been conservatism and ignorance; frightened at its recklessness, conservatism is driven to oppose its mad pretensions; while its bald crimes open the eyes of ignorance itself. Like the harlot past power of seduction, it flaunts its very nakedness to the disgusted eyes of those its decent garments were wont to entice. I see it also in the new spirit of its opponents. Casting aside dead issues and entangling alliances, they have finally accepted the issues of a debauched democracy. Firmness begins to meet firmness, and resolution resolution. Senators from presidential steps may sling their weak threats.* Representatives may redeem their transient faith by guttering deeper to a hired mob;† applicants for seats that the people have refused them may make the heart sicken at their servility; yet like the wine-bibbing aristocracy at the mad feast of Antoinette, they but darken their own sure doom.

And here I would pause. I have hitherto, during this session, declined speaking upon the slavery question, and would not do so now but that the assailants of freedom and free institutions on the one side have been chiefly met on the other by arguments only upon the specific questions before us; and thus some suppose us unwilling to meet this great question in any form, whether by bill or argument, gentlemen thrust it upon us. The argument of the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. Kerr,] this evening, following up the dicta of those synods of chief priests and elders, that impiously charge the iniquities of slavery upon the religion of Him whom their prototypes crucified, is but a specimen of the continuous agitations of the propagandists. While I desire not unnecessarily to enter upon abstract discussion, I am always ready to take up the glove, and without following the line of argument of any one gentleman, I will proceed in the invited road.

I have alluded to the idealism of the propagandists and the singleness of their devotion. As fully as my remaining time will permit, I propose to show WHAT and WHENCE is this idea.

It is simply the idea of FORCE as the origin, the base of property; and SUBJECTION the law of government.

Society, itself an idea, takes its form and its character, its influence and its life, from the idea that inspires it—from the ideal ends for which it is shaped. The chief end of society, of its most complicated machinery, must be the security of property. The instinct of property is within us all; its necessity is absolute; and society cannot exist which does not look to its protection. There can be no personal security, no security in life, liberty, and the social relations, without security to labor and its accumulations. The basis, then, of property, must give color to the whole character of association.

The modern basis of property is the law of nature, the law of justice; the subjects of property are the inferior animals, the earth, and its products; and the propria are the accumulations of honest labor and honest exchange. I know of no other radical distinction between the ancient and modern civilization than in the idea of property. Though the law of nature or justice came to be anciently studied, though the more elevated clearly apprehended many of its maxims, yet, in the constitution, the foundation of property, it had no actual force. That was property which the law, the State made property, and it made anything property that, outside the State, could be seized and held, whether men or things. The Roman robber went forth to conquer, and whatever he could seize by the strong hand, became his own. It mattered not whether it was his neighbor's ox or his neighbor's wife, his flocks or his children, his farm or himself; all yielded to the robber-right; and the spoils—mancipia—became but a term for property.

As society advanced the manner of seizure became systematized, and ripened into the ancient law of nations; and that law was such a system of brutality, such a system of robbery and wrong, that humanity would fain turn its sickened head away. I will not give details, but merely allude to them as compendiously referred to by Wheaton:

"'Victory' in their [the Roman] expressive metaphorical language, 'made even the sacred things of the enemy profane,' confiscated all his property, movable and immovable, public and private; doomed him and his posterity to perpetual slavery." &c.—Wheaton's Law of Nations, 25.

The same author introduces his work by the following allusion to the fundamental idea of Pagan civilization:

"The laws or customs, by which the mutual intercourse of European nations was regulated, previous to the introduction of Christianity, were founded on the prejudices which regarded the different races of men as natural enemies. With the ancient Greeks and Romans, the terms barbarian, stranger, and enemy, were originally synonymous. Nothing but some positive compact exempted the persons of aliens from being doomed to slavery the moment they passed the bounds of one State, and touched the confines of another. And though, according to the Roman law, in its more improved state, an alien, with whose country the relations of friendship and hospitality did not exist, was not technically considered an enemy [hostis], yet his person might lawfully be enslaved, and his property confiscated, if found on Roman territory. During the heroic age of Greece, piracy was universally practiced." &c. &c.

Pagan authorities did not decide what might be held as property, whether the earth and its products, the inferior animals, or man. They made not the modern distinction between men and things. That was not alone property over which the common Father had given us dominion—they knew not His law. Though Justinian in the light of Christianity pronounced property in man contrary to the law of nature; though his annotators could faintly hear the inward voice that, to all who have ears to hear, clearly vindicates each man's right to his own person, to the society of his own wife, and the custody of his own children; and hence, repudiates the idea that they can be the property of others; yet this idea contravened no law of property as handed down from their Pagan ancestors, and they could but recognize it. The civil law failing to designate what might be property, it is not strange that whatever could be subjected to one's dominion, whether men or things, came to be regarded as his property, and that mancipium—manu captum—the seized—was one of its legitimate terms.

We hence see the rottenness of the whole Roman system; that the splendid civil code—the highest perfection of Pagan reason, and which alone of Rome is immortal, because it so failed in the foundation of law, because it traversed not the law of force as the basis of property, but sanctified and sanctified the robber-maxims of the age, was utterly impotent to save the State. We, hence, cannot wonder that the ancient States met only enemies without, while nourishing only enemies within. We cannot wonder at the oppressions that drove men mad, at the corruptions that banished virtue, at the monopolies that converted whole districts into slave principalities, at the dishonor of labor, and at the idleness and spoil-huntings that made of the people but a worthless rabble. We cannot wonder that the army become the only staff of the State, and the commander its imperator; and finally, when the army failed, that the State itself fled for shelter to that grave its foul diseases made its only fit refuge.

States should be immortal. Their analogy is to the soul, not the body; to an idea, itself immortal; not organized matter, itself perishable. Justice, equally administered, rejuvenates society, overthrows abuses, and clothes a people with immortal youth. But power, wielded without justice, corrupts and effeminates the possessor; inflames those who feel its weight; and, sooner or later, rouses them to successful resistance to the effeminated tyrant. Despotic States are but a tower on the sand-hill. So long as active labor can replace the shifting pile, can repair the action of torrent and storm, that tower will stand. But sooner or later the laws of nature will vindicate their supremacy. The laws of nature, or of God, whichever you term them, are immortal; and States to be immortal must harmonize with them. Those brilliant republics and that great Power, whose brightness still dazzles, and the shadow of whose greatness still awes the world, ignored those laws, and of course fell. In many respects modern civilization has never excelled them. In the dignity of ideal philosophy, and the graces of diction and external beauty, we are little more than imitators. Yet, in all appreciation of the objects of society; in the dignity of justice, and the graces of the soul—not in the sentimentality that dreams with Plato over the tortures of a slave, or moralizes with Seneca at the banquet of lust—but in that dignity that makes the chief glory of the State to consist in the protection of the weak within, while dealing with the strictest honor toward the weak without; and in those graces that send a Howard and a Nightingale upon their errands, they were little better than the savages of our own forests.

But modern civilization and modern law, imperfectly as they are yet developed, have a different history, and are based upon a different idea. We have not been in the habit of giving sufficient importance to the influence of Christianity and the Jewish records. The story of our common origin, of the origin of all property in the Divine grant to the common head, both in the beginning, and when the second father of man went forth from the ark; the dim glimpses of justice and equity, of oppression and its punishment, seen through the veil of the Pentateuch and the early Jewish annals; the authoritative announcement of the principles of natural law in the second table of the decalogue; the anathemas upon injustice burning in the pages of the chief prophets; and the crowning glory of all, the teachings of the Divine man, establishing universal brotherhood as the normal relation, and universal love as the highest duty, have furnished the grand idea of modern civilization! Force is no longer the base of property. The first lesson in modern law makes broad and impassable the distinction between men and things. That is property which God has made property. The stranger is no longer the enemy—the enemy no longer the slave. The law of the strong hand yields to the law of justice; and, as the idea of the artist brings out the form, gradually, imperfectly, according to the imperfect material, and the more imperfect skill, so the great idea of justice as the basis of property and end of law, starting out with the overthrow of the robber dogma of property in one another, is guiding us onward and upward, though on a rugged road and with halting steps, yet surely on to its complete realization.

I cannot better illustrate the contrast between the ancient and modern theories of political morals than by opposing to the maxim attributed by Thucydides to his countrymen, that "to a king or commonwealth nothing is unjust which is useful," (Thuc. Hist., vol. 6,) the following declaration of the younger Pitt, in opposition to the slave trade:

"The argument which, in his [Mr. Pitt's] opinion, ought

* The night after the passage of the Toombs-English substitute, a celebration was had in front of the Presidential Mansion. Following the President and Mr. Toombs, Senator GWIN, among other things said, "If she [Kansas] rejects it it is then let Kansas shriek and let her bleed, [applause,] for she shall never come in until she has sufficient population."—Washington Union, May 2.

† Mr. ENGLISH and others addressed a crowd of Government employees the same night on the avenue, and seemed chiefly concerned for fear "niggers" would be held in too high esteem.

to determine the committee was, that the slave trade was unjust. It was such a trade as it was impossible for him to support, unless it could be first proved to him that there were no laws of morality binding upon nations, and that it was not the duty of a Legislature to restrain its subjects from invading the happiness of other countries, and from violating the fundamental principles of justice."—Clarkson's History of the Abolition of the Slave Trade, vol. 2, page 243.

Could England in all her administrations have had the wisdom to realize this noble sentiment; could she have withstood the barbarism of her greedy capitalists, by the Christianity of her common law; what dishonor would not have been saved to her! what woes, what blight, to us, as well as to the groaning East!

It was a necessity that the ancient civilization should fall. It could no more live in the light of the Christian idea than the altars of the Aztecs or the feasts of the Fejees; and the grander the structure, the more imposing the pile of this Bastille of human hopes—based as it was upon a lie, upon moral quicksands—the more complete the ruin. True, this ruin is not without its use. It is a great quarry, with many a fit column for the new temple based upon the rock.

It is a mistake to mourn over the collapse of mere force and the consequent and necessary anarchy. It could not be otherwise. They were the prelude to a higher civilization. They became essential to make way for the gradual infusion of the idea of justice as the law of society, the law of property; and dark as was the transition, and seemingly hopeless as was the long fermentation of human passions, yet, slowly emerging from that chaos, a form of society is arising that may become immortal; for the curtailment of its abuses and the development of the race is made possible by the gradual adoption, throughout Christendom, of the Divine idea. The steps to that end are already many and long; private property is no longer subject to lawful capture; private forays are piracy; prisoners of war are no longer slaves; cities cannot lawfully be devoted to pillage, their inhabitants, men, women and children, delivered to the sword, or made to pass under the yoke as property; even the high seas, so long the safe field of robbery, are being embraced, and but for an act of this Administration might ere this have been embraced in the protection of the great idea; and in all lands—shall I be forced to except my own?—the yoke is being broken, the scourge is being exchanged for the contract, and the handcuff gives way to the school-book.

And the struggle now is, to turn back the tide of civilization, to supplant the idea of justice, to reënthrone the law of force. Hardly a proposition, hardly a measure, meets with any favor that has not this end in view. For that the dominant interest has broken faith, spurned every constitutional guarantee, proscribed all but self-sold slaves, debauched the judiciary, enslaved the Territories, made provinces of the States, and all to substitute the robber right for the Divine grant. Ay, and for that it has compassed heaven and earth to give life to the Lecompton villainy. Its central organ in February last indorsed a threat of disunion unless the principle of Lecompton be ratified; unless the slave interest be allowed "to retire from Kansas with our drums beating and colors flying," exclaiming, "why not give us the shell while they [the North] have the kernel?" "Is it not enough that they have an overwhelming majority in Kansas?" The President, in pressing Lecompton, admitted that its reign would be short. Why then press it, but that the principle of Lecompton is precious to the one-idealists? and why so precious? Only because, first, it is the work of a lean minority, and is scornfully rejected by the vast majority; hence the idea of SUBJECTION is enthroned over "the consent of the governed;" and second, and mainly, this constitution alone proclaims the atrocious dogma that the right of property in man is as inviolable as the right of any other property, and is above constitutional sanction! Hence the idea of old force, instead of God's GRANT, as the base of property.

And which, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, prefer you, the ancient or the modern, the Pagan or the Christian idea? In which age will you place us? On which slope of the piling centuries shall we travel? Gentlemen defend the property idea of force from the fact that it is ancient, that all heathendom recognized it, that it was the idea of the Greek and the Roman, the Scythian and the Arab, the Ethiopian and the Indian. I never doubted the fact, but have often wondered whether gentlemen really desire to turn back the shadow upon the dial, to reënthrone moral chaos and bring back night again!

The gentleman from South Carolina has just told us of the fetter-fastening, the slavery-loving, the force-enthroning religion of the Cross. It well becomes him to give such a blasphemous exegesis of its holy maxims. He might naturally understand that the exhortation to resist not evil, to meekly turn the cheek to the assailant rather than meet force by force, justifies the evil-doer and smiter. With the same instincts that guided a Laud and a Stafford, he might readily infer that the duty of passive obedience enjoined upon the hopeless subjects of the old despotisms justly applies to those who are themselves responsible for the public liberties; and that this exhortation to servants to obey their masters, and to subjects to respect the powers that be, justifies the slave shame and the bloody scepter! The Christian slave might not resist the master, though he fed his fish ponds with his flesh; nor the Christian subject rebel against the Nero, though he lighted the gardens with his flaming body; and yet it takes gentlemen of his school to see that this submission can justify either. Such doctrines may for a time flourish in the dark places of the earth; yet still the world moves on!

I have shown partially WHAT and partially WHENCE is this idea, as well as alluded to the character and fate of the civilization based upon it; but I have not done.

The foundation of slavery is not the idea that there may be property in those born of slave mothers—that is but its application; but it is one of property in man, and in any man who can be subjected to dominion. And the question as to who shall be made property is merely one of expediency. If you may enslave the infant, though begotten from your own loins, because you had before enslaved the mother, why may you not enslave your criminals or paupers, the hopelessly indebted, or those seized in battle? If you may take all your slave's earnings, deny him power of accumulation for himself, and make all his accumulations yours, why should you be bound to respect the private accumulations of an enemy or a stranger? You take the one and his earnings because you can; why not the other and his earnings if you can? You were long in the habit of stimulating African chiefs to hunt men and women for your benefit; and some of you are now trying to revive the work. Also, I see it seriously proposed in yonder State to enslave some thousands of her people, and already is their property seized by a discriminating tax. Your Federal judiciary, against all law and against all decency, have paved the way by denying them the necessary result of birth and residence; making them permanent strangers and aliens; and you have only to follow the invited result of a barbarous edict by making them slaves.

If the idea is once admitted that force, and not the law of nature, makes property, then any man, or any man's earnings, may be seized and subjected to another's dominion. It is not a question of birth; it is not a question of race; nor is it so regarded by the propaganda. The amalgamation tendencies of slavery are constantly bleaching out the African. I have, since a member here, contributed to purchase for redemption white Virginians, and to prevent their forced denizenship of the brothel. The more honest advocates of slavery have already repudiated the idea that it should be the sole condition of any race, and many of them would impose it upon all hand laborers. In the Senate and in the House, during this and other sessions, leaders of the great slavery party have boldly proclaimed the condition of the laborer that of substantial slavery, and that the northern free laborer was far worse off than the bought and sold chattel of the slave plantation. A Senator from South Carolina says that "the man who lives by daily labor, your whole class of manual laborers, are essentially slaves." In harmony with the tone of the propagandist press, the Charleston Standard says that "slavery is the natural and normal condition of the laboring man, whether black or white;" and the Richmond Examiner, whose editor now issues semi-official thunder in the Washington Union, truly says, that "the South"—i. e. the slavery party—"now maintains that slavery is right, natural, and necessary, and does not depend upon differences of complexion. The laws of the slave States justify the holding of WHITE MEN in bondage."

The gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. TAYLOR,] who never speaks what he has not well considered, in his remarks of the 29th of March, elaborately defends, as I understood him, or predicts, the enslavement of the Asiatic upon the Pacific coast; and all who justify slavery from the Old and New Testament, and early Christian teachings, thus only can justify white, and not black slavery. The miserable induction of the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. KEITT,] if it prove anything, can only prove that the dusky races of the Mediterranean may rightfully enslave the light-haired German and Briton, for such was the "apostolic slavery," he defends.

Except in America, slaves are not even generally of the negro race. It is but quite recently that the ideas of modern civilization have made any progress, have gained any foothold, upon the southern and eastern shores of the Mediterranean; and within our own memory the slave trade was as brisk along its ports as between the slave marts of the United States. The captives are, indifferently, Africans, Europeans, and Asiatics. White Englishmen and white Americans were there lawfully held and worked, sold and scourged as slaves, as lawfully as any slave is held in Virginia; and our first maritime war was to overthrow, to destroy, these property rights. And these rights in white Americans and Europeans were held sacred though all the Turkish States until they yielded to the principles of natural law—to the genius of universal emancipation. No man can defend American slavery on principle without defending Turkish; especially as the latter was much milder and more Christian than the former.

But gentlemen here claim that the property idea of man in man applies equally to the apprentice and child as to the slave; and thus, by the common law, man may hold property in man. This was the only reply of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] to the denial of my colleague, [Mr. BINGHAM.] According to Webster, an apprentice is "one who is bound by covenant to serve a mechanic or other person, for a certain time, with a view to learn his art, mystery, or occupation, in which his master is bound to instruct him." Now, which is property, the master or apprentice? The rights are mutual; the obligation is mutual; the interest is mutual; and the whole is created by contract. The apprentice is property, is he? Can he be bought and sold; descend to heirs or creditors, be denied the legal relations of husband and wife, parent and child, the right to hold property and acquire knowledge, his whole being subjected to the will and for the sole benefit of another? Hear Judge Ruffin on this point, while dismissing a complaint for an assault upon a slave by shooting. He says:

"This has been assimilated at the bar to the other domestic relations; and arguments drawn from the well-established principles which confer and restrain the authority of the parent over the child, the tutor over the pupil, the master over the apprentice, have been pressed on us. The court does not recognize their application. There is no likeness between the cases. They are in opposition to each other, and there is an impassable gulf between them. The difference is that which exists between freedom and slavery; and a greater cannot be imagined. In the one, the end in view is the happiness of the youth, born to equal rights with the governor, on whom the duty devolves of training the young to usefulness, in a station he is afterwards to assume among freemen. With slaves, it is far otherwise. The end is the profit of the master, his security, and the public safety: the profit, one doomed in his own person, and in his posterity, to live without knowledge, and without the capacity to make any thing his own, and toil that another may reap the fruits."—State vs. Mann, 2 Devereux, North Carolina Reports, 263.

I will not blaspheme the holy relation of parent and child by dwelling upon the idea that the child is the chattel, the merchandise of the father. In some barbarous countries, where the law of the strong hand has not yet been supplanted by the Christian idea, such is the fact; and I blush to say that in some of the American States a class of illegitimate children may lawfully be, and sometimes are, sold like cattle by their own fathers or half brothers and sisters.

True, there is in one sense a property in an apprentice and hired servant, as in all contract rights. The people have a property in our services; the parent has a property in the instructor of his children; the ward in his guardian; the hirer of a chattel in the thing hired. But are we, is the instructor, or the guardian, or the chattel, the property of him who has an interest concerning them or it? The grand base idea of the relations are antipodes. The one is founded on contract, on free will, with mutual rights; the other, as applied to man, on naked force, with no rights; the one is an obligation—a temporary use; the other an absolute subjection—a subjection that can only be enforced upon things, never upon man.

I have spoken of the fact that the property idea of the ancient States was not based upon natural law, as given us in the books of Moses; that their codes did not define the subjects of property, but indiscriminately subjected to be treated as property whatever could be seized and held as such; that they confounded the Divine distinction between men and things, and enthroned force in the robes and on the seat of justice.

But this was no peculiarity of the old civilization. It pertains to paganism and barbarism everywhere; and the idea that man can hold property in man has been naturalized in the United States; not from the common law, which had ignored even serfdom before the settlement of the colonies; not from the civil law, into which it had been incorporated during the rotten reign of the tyrant States, and from which it had been purged by the genius of Christianity; not from the law of nations, which cannot define property, which has no municipal authority, but simply pertains to the relations of States, not of individuals, and which, in that relation, had long abolished throughout Christendom the practice of enslaving prisoners of war; but it was incorporated in the customs of the colonies, and based alone upon the laws of the chiefs of the Guinea coast. I have heretofore, and in a former Congress, spoken of this fact, and I allude to it again in view of the frequent boasts of the antiquity and universality of slavery, of the argument that it must be according to the laws of nature, because practiced everywhere by man in a state of nature, i. e. in a state of barbarism. I desire to show these boasters, these men who affect to despise everything pertaining to Africa or the African race, that they are indebted to that country and to that race for the fundamental idea of their politics and their political morals. I before quoted the opinion of Chief Justice Marshall upon this point, and I give it again. After showing that the enslavement of captives was once lawful, he adds:

"Throughout Christendom this harsh rule had been exploded, and war was no longer considered as giving a right to enslave captives. But this triumph had not been universal. The parties to the modern law of nations do not propagate their principles by force; and Africa has not yet adopted them. Throughout the whole extent of that immense continent, so far as we know its history, it is still the law of nations that prisoners are slaves. The question then was, could those who had renounced this law be permitted to participate in its effects, by purchasing the human beings who are its victims?"—Wheaton's Law of Nations, page 635.

The same idea seems to be recognized by the supreme court of Georgia in Neal vs. Farmer, (9 Georgia Reports, page 555,) where Nesbit, Justice, on page 580, says:

"Whence did he (the Georgia planter) derive title? Either directly from the slave dealer, or from those who held him, and he from the slave captor in Africa. The property in the slave, in the planter, became thus just the property of the original captor."

A Senator from Virginia, [Mr. MASON,] when pressed to the wall for the legal origin of slavery, claimed that it was established in the colonies by the common law of England; and see how he makes it out:

"If the honorable Senator from Maine desires to know what maxim or provision of the common law treats slaves as property, I will say to him that the common law of England, so justly called the consummation of human wisdom, recognized everything as property which was the subject of property in the country from which it was brought, unless prohibited by some positive law of that realm; and thus it was, that when slaves were first landed in Virginia, there being no law there but the common law, they were admitted as other property, that law recognizing that as their condition in the country whence they were brought. The condition of property did not attach to them after they reached the soil of Virginia, but they brought it with them. Such has been the law from that day to this."

"How that property arose it is not so easy to determine. The publicists tell us that, at the dawn of civilization, a prisoner of war held his life at the mercy of his captor; and, as the latter might deprive his prisoner of life, it lay at his discretion either to kill him or to keep him in life as his property. Such was certainly the practice in the earlier days of the Romans. History tells us that such has always been, and yet continues, the custom among the negro tribes in Africa. Certainly there the natives sell their own race as slaves; they sell to each other as they sold to the white man while such sales were allowed by the laws of the white man. Thus it was that the ancestors of those now held in bondage on this continent brought from Africa with them their condition as property. How it was acquired there, can now be a subject of conjecture only, and would be an inquiry as fruitless as vague."—Speech in Senate, March 15, 1858.

That is, the common law of England made men property in the colonies who were held as property in Africa, and, because they were so held. All who could be seized and sold, and their descendants, were, by African law, property; therefore, these persons, when brought to the colonies, carried the African laws with them, and they, and the descendants of their women forever, were to be merely property! The mistake of the Senator was not in the fact of the adoption of the African laws of servitude, but in the statement that they are adopted by the common law. The common law had nothing to do with them. They were in derogation of its first principles. The common law, as expounded by its commentators and its courts, adopted the law of nature, as given in Genesis, as the basis of property; and it was only because corrupt ministers, mercenary corporations, planters thirsting for wealth, and cruel slave traders, conspired to substitute the African code in the colonies for the common law, that we find slavery there and here.

Judge Tucker, the eminent Virginian, speaking of the introduction of the common law into the colonies, says:

"Local circumstances, likewise, gave an early rise to a less justifiable departure from the principles of the common law in some of the colonies, in the establishment of slavery—a measure not to be reconciled either to the principles of the law of nature, nor either to the most arbitrary establishments in the English Government at that period—absolute slavery, if it ever had any existence in England, having been abolished long before."—Tucker's Blackstone, 388.

The celebrated Virginian should have known that the common law naturalized the laws of all countries, at least as to property brought from them. Like the gods of the provinces incorporated by the Romans into its concrete hierarchy, the diverse laws of property of the diverse types of civilization were adopted by this all-gathering common law. If the English or French sailor, who had been captured by the Algerine, and by his law enslaved, should be brought by his purchaser to England or her colonies, the common law continued him property because he was so held whence he was brought. So the French banker would have carried his franchise, and John Law might have flooded the world with his paper money as well from London or Boston as from Paris. To such absurdities are men driven.

The common law indeed! Why, the truth simply is, that the common law did and does not create property, but recognizes and protects as such everything that is—claimed as property? No, but everything that is property by the laws of nature and the laws of Christian States; and never, as the merest tyro knows, does it sanction the idea that man can be the subject of property.*

True it is, "and pity 'tis 'tis true," that the African codes in relation to the subjects of property were naturalized in the colonies. True it is, that those who were held as property by those codes were so held after transfer from the prison-ship to the slave plantation, and the blunderbuss and the scourge became the emblems of authority there, as in their distant home. True it is, that every mother's child, according to the law of the black and arid continent, became the merchandise of him who had enslaved the mother. True it is, that these codes were at times, as revenge joined hands with avarice, extended to the Indian as to the African captive; and it is equally true that European blood was unable to dissolve the chain thus wrought from foreign links. And true, alas! it is, that these African codes have so banished the common law of property, have so overturned the fundamental idea of the civilization of Moses and of Christ, of modern Rome and of Westminster, that in the jurisprudence of this federation and of half these States, scarce anything is sacred but the right of one man to enslave his fellow-man.

I have said that the base idea of human ownership was force. I have shown it to be so in the ancient codes, and I ask attention to the law of property in those countries whence we have naturalized it.

The Senator from Virginia before quoted seems at a loss to know how this "condition of property," so "brought from Africa," was "acquired there." It is no subject of "conjecture" at all, and I will show those who partake his doubts that the inquiry is neither "fruitless" nor "vague."

As these African States have not favored us with any code or volumes of institutes, or commentaries, or decisions, from which we can ascertain their laws, or such of them as have been incorporated into our own system, I am compelled to rely upon the customs of the country. "Custom is the highest law," and by its observation we can see the "process" by which man becomes property, and the idea which lies at the base of the African law of property.

Gray and Duchard, in their Travels in Western Africa, (p. 191,) describing the manner of waging war, say:

"The general object of these detachments is the attack of some small town or village, the inhabitants of which, together with their cattle, they carry off." "Several of these parties were sent out during our stay in Bondo, and, with one or two exceptions, came off victorious—if the word can be made use of with propriety in describing the exploits of a horde of plunderers, whose chief object is, invariably, the obtaining of slaves, for whom they always find a market, either with the traveling merchants of the country, or the Senegal vessels at Galam."

Captain Canot, a modern slave dealer, in his experience in the business, gives the manner in which he acquired a boat-load in an emergency, at the mouth of the Matican river, coast of Guinea. I give an extract (page 228-9) to show the workings of those laws of property which the common law has so kindly domiciled among us:

"Next day we proceeded to formal business. His majesty called a regular 'palaver' of his chiefs and headmen, before whom I stated my démarche, and announced the terms. Very soon several young folks were brought for sale, who, I am sure, never dreamed at rising from last night's sleep, that they were destined for Cuban slavery. My merchandise revived the memory of peccadilloes that had been long forgotten, and sentences that were forgiven. Jealous husbands, when they tasted my rum, suddenly remembered their wives' infidelities, and sold their better halves for more of the obnoxious fluid. In truth, I was exalted into a magician, unroofing the village, and leaving its crime and wickedness to the eye of justice. Law became profitable, and virtue never reached so high a price. Before night the town was in a turmoil, for every man cudgeled his brain for an excuse to kidnap his neighbor, so as to share my commerce. As the village was too small to supply the entire gang of fifty, I had recourse to the neighboring settlements, when my 'bankers' or agents did their work in a masterly manner. Traps were adroitly baited with goods, to lead the unwary into temptation, when the unconscious pilferer was caught by his ambushed foe, and an hour served to hurry him to the beach as a slave forever. In fact, five days are sufficient to stamp my image permanently upon the Matican settlements, and to associate my memory with anything but blessings in at least fifty of their families."

Again: on page 332, in speaking of the natives amid the slave factories of the Gallinas, the same author says:

"In proportion as these upstarts were educated in slave trade under the influence of opulent factors, they greedily acquired the habit of hunting their own kind, and abandoned all other occupations but war and kidnapping. As the country was prolific and the trade profitable, the thousands and tens of thousands annually sent abroad from Gallinas, soon began to exhaust the neighborhood; but the appetite for plunder was neither satiated nor stopped by distance, when it became necessary for the neighboring nations to extend their forays and hunts far into the interior. In a few years, war raged wherever the influence of this river extended. The slave factories supplied the huntsmen with powder, weapons, and enticing merchandise, so that they fearlessly advanced against ignorant multitudes, who, too silly to comprehend the benefit of alliance, fought the aggressors singly, and, of course, became their prey."

This "condition of property" in man is acquired in Central and Eastern Africa by the same "process of law" as in Western. Sheikh Mohammed, of Tunis, the great Mohammedan traveler, described the slave expeditions of Darfur and Wadai. For the full narrative I must refer the curious student of African slave law, if his philology is at fault in the original Arabic, to De Perron's French version, or to chapter nine of St. John's English abridgment of the work. In those more regular and stable Mohammedan kingdoms a distinguished subject is commissioned to raise a gazwak, or slave hunt, and becomes, for the time, the sultan of his troop. This troop invades some Pagan community, named in the commission, seizes all who can be found, occasionally halts to divide and assign the spoils, continues the hunt till, satiated with robbery and blood, the chief drives home his horde of human property, regularly "acquired" under African law. If the obstinate Pagans resist, of course they are slaughtered without mercy; if, when surrounded, they "yield without resistance, the sultan takes the chief as a prisoner, treats him honorably, gives him a dress, and afterwards liberates him; but he seizes on all the grown men, the youths, the women, and girls, leaving only the old people and those who do not seem to be in a state to undergo the fatigues of a journey." The author narrates with becoming coolness the horrors of these hunts; says that from the frequency of the commissions the market would be glutted, but that from fatigue, exposure, and cruelty, but a small portion of the captives survive, and fewer still are able to reach Egypt. About the same compunction seems to be felt by these hunters as by a boat load of Nantucket whalers after their prey, or a troop of prairie Indians in pursuit of a buffalo, or a United States marshal in chase of a fugitive slave. Since the destruction of the Egyptian market by the "fanatical folly" of the Turks in overthrowing the slave trade, these hunts are doubtless profitable; and, indeed, there is great danger that, by the persevering efforts of Moslem and Christian Europe, even Africa, the hitherto impregnable refuge of the idea of property in man, may yield to the progress of Christian civilization. It may then be a question whether this law of property, after it shall have been overthrown in this, its most ancient and faithful seat, will survive in those countries that have thence derived it.

So in Bornou, Mr. Denham, and more recently Dr. Barth, describe the manner in which this "condition as property" is "acquired" by men and women, according to the laws of the State. It so closely resembles the method described by the Mohammedan traveler, as to induce me to believe that this State, as well as others through which these gentlemen traveled, acknowledge the same code and bow to the same fundamental idea of property. Usually the execution of law is left to its ministers; at least strangers do not feel called on to enforce it. But full examination has satisfied me that "legal process" upon the coast of Guinea may be served as well by the stranger as by members, or even ministers of State. I accordingly find that, as commerce becomes dull, either from deficiency in its staple or the means of purchase, the foreign slavers, with the alacrity of true law and order men, often lend themselves to enforce the laws of the land. Thus, after the manner of the native hunter, we find them stealing by night upon some defenseless village, and while the inhabitants are dreaming—some of their pastimes and their loves, and some, especially those who feel the cares of State, of the coming hunt to supply the white man's ships, all are seized, bound, and driven to these ships; and the blaze of their empty dwellings lights the march that converts—and by methods long sanctified by African law—a village of savages into cargoes of valuable property. This method of conversion was more common when the early captives, in their "condition as property," were brought to the American colonies; and I cannot find that the legality of the mode, except by "New England fanatics," in an instance or two, was ever seriously questioned.

The method by which this "condition of property" was made to "attach" to the transported Africans would be thus perfectly plain, but for the fact that some of them were not seized in the hunt, either by regular State commissioners or on individual account; but their "condition" attached to them from the earliest infancy. It is found that by the African customs, as well as by those of the ancient States I have before spoken of, all children of slave mothers are seized and held as property. How this is done has puzzled many a wiser man than I, and I may not have hit upon its legal solution. But my desire to relieve the doubts of those who trace their rights of property to African laws, has induced me to give the matter a careful consideration.

By the slave laws of our States, a slave can make no contract, and cannot unite in lawful marriage. In the absence of any accessible code or decisions of the Ethiopic States, and in deference to the opinion of the Senator before quoted, I infer that "the condition" in which the slave is here held, in this respect as in others, was "brought from Africa" by his "ancestors." All the children, then, of slave mothers, are, by African law, necessarily bastards; and bastards, as all lawyers know, can have no father. The mother, being herself but property, can have no interest in the child; and the law permitting no other parent, and foundling hospitals and asylums being unknown, it has no protector. In this emergency, the master, who, having the lawful custody of the mother, is always constructively present, and is the only one who has a right to be present, is kindly authorized by law to seize or make a prisoner of war of the child; and as with all prisoners, it is simply a choice between death and slavery. Were slave marriages lawful, so that the child could have a father, it is quite uncertain in what "condition" it would be held; it would probably depend somewhat upon the demands of commerce. But born thus destitute, the harmony of the African code becomes apparent in authorizing its immediate seizure, under the rules that regulate the intercourse of the strong and the weak.

Thus we see the Senator was too easily discouraged, for I have plainly shown how the "condition of property" was in all cases, both by adults and infants, "acquired" in the mother country. The only puzzle is, how this African law should be permitted to override the common law, or the law of England, in the colonies, as the supremacy of the latter was expressly provided for in the colonial charters. Chief Justice Marshall seems to doubt whether "those who had renounced this law" could be "permitted to participate in its effects;" though it is not believed the present Chief Justice would have any doubt upon any such question.

The Senator, however, cuts the knot by making this same common law the instrument of its own overthrow, by recognizing "everything as property which was the subject of property in the country from which it was brought," &c. But this hypothesis fails to reach the children of slave mothers born here, unless it means, as I suppose it does, that, by this curious operation of the common law, the whole African slave code was imported, and war, after the manner of the African slave hunts, of her kidnapping and baby seizing, became forever crystalized in the colonies.

Thus began the Africanization of the colonies, the subversion of the common law by the law of force, by the code of the man-hunter. So long as mere avarice dictated law, blind money-getting wrenching gold from torn muscle and rifled soil, Africanism ruled the day. But as the public conscience awoke, stimulated by the labors of Edwards, of Whitfield, and of Wesley, and especially of the brave followers of Fox; as the common law vindicated its supremacy at Westminster; and as the attention of the colonists was so attracted to its free maxims and free methods as to force resistance to ministerial absolutism, the black and bloody code began to be regarded as a hostile intruder. The American Revolution was but an act in the great drama of English hereditary resistance to oppressive laws. It but followed the struggles for the restoration of the laws of the Confessor, the strifes at Runnymede, and the combats with the Stuarts. It was but the emancipation of the common law, and placing it under the control of popular sovereignty—a resumption by the people of the guardianship of its maxims and its methods. The people assumed the mastery, and reorganized government to protect, not infringe rights. Africanism was frightened at its new master; and it is no wonder that the Guinea code fled from the gaze of a people burning with a regenerated love for a free and a Christian civilization. It only begged for time to set its house in order, a little indulgence to fold its limbs with decency, before being thrust into its waiting grave. Alas, that this indulgence was given it! that this African serpent was permitted even for a moment to fix its basilisk gaze upon the young sovereignty, charming by its very hideousness.

And the struggle now is, not between the North and the South—no, indeed! the friends of the common law in the South are in the closest sympathy with its friends in the North—but between systems, between civilizations. It is the misfortune of the South that the African code, the law of force, is fastened upon it; deeply do I sympathize with that misfortune. It is the misfortune of the South that the champions of that code are grinding her in the dust; with what alacrity would I aid her to shake off the tyrant rule, and leap to the position given only by the law of justice! It is the misfortune of the South that her fame is involved in the frauds and crimes her terrorists commit in her name; I would relieve her from the stain by snatching power from these her terrorists. It is the misfortune of the South that she is drunk with the cup of Circe; I would not even reproach her with the deadly lethargy; but going backward would spread the mantle while arousing her from the charm of the drugged position. The South is not alone responsible for her condition. The North has helped it on. Even while our old statesmen were, as they supposed, dissolving the spell, New England, as the price for a navigation monopoly, consented—ay, herself held the cup for a deeper draught—and ever since, northern slaves and northern hucksters have vied in the deep lullaby.* No, we have no controversy with the South; but the struggle is between fresh Freedom, flinging off the manacles of barbarism, both the old and the new, and fetid Force, long driven from the Tiber and the Thames, coming from its refuge in the dark fastnesses of the Niger to breathe its stifling breath upon the Potomac and the Mississippi.

ADMISSION OF KANSAS.

SPEECH OF HON. JOHN A. GILMER,
OF NORTH CAROLINA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

May 24, 1858.

The House being in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

MR. GILMER said:

MR. CHAIRMAN: I desire to say a few words in reply to the speech made by my colleague [Mr. Shaw] on the 20th of April last, and during my absence. I regret that he is not here this evening; but I feel compelled to proceed with what I have to say in reply to that extraordinary speech, and to do so even in his absence. I feel justified in doing so, for, on last Saturday, when I was prepared to go on, finding that he was not present, I desisted, but gave notice of my intention to speak at the earliest opportunity. That remark was published in the papers this morning, and therefore his absence is no fault of mine.

Mr. Chairman, I think that that speech was an unfair one; unjust, untrue, prevaricating, and unworthy of the gentleman who made it. I have read it over, and I have read it carefully. I have looked to see in it the views of a statesman. I have looked to see justice in it. I have looked to see in it fair dealing. Yet, sir, I am troubled to give to it the character which it deserves. If I were this evening called on as a witness in court to tell what I thought was its character, my answer would be like that of a witness examined in respect to the character of a simple old lady, who, when asked if he knew her general character, said, "I think I do. I think that I do know her general character. I know it well." "Please go on, then, and tell what it is." "Yes, sir, I know her general character, and it is generally believed in the neighborhood where she resides that she is a woman unworthy of common sense, and guilty of fits." [Laughter.]

My colleague waited from the 30th of March to the 20th of April to reply to me, and in commencing his remarks he made an apology that he could not sooner get the floor. I conceive there was no extraordinary anxiety on the part of my colleague to reply, or he could have done so time and again before the day he spoke. My excellent friend from Virginia, [Mr. LETCHER,] a portion of my speech being a reply to his report on the question of population in the Territory of Kansas, remained and very easily got an opportunity to reply to what I had said in relation to his report. He remained and made an argument which I think, as things now stand, he will hardly stand up to. He undertook to insist before this House and the country, that there was no doubt but that in Kansas there was a requisite population to entitle her to admission as a State into the Union. Nobody on the other side insists on that now, nor indeed on either side of the House. Before, it was contended that Kansas had a sufficient population for a State; but the English conference bill admits indirectly, but substantially, that there is not half population enough. And, sir, I would not have felt myself justified in giving the vote I did for the compromise bill, well knowing the want of population, were it not for the extraordinary circumstances that surrounded this extraordinary case, and the importance of getting rid of this national excitement.

My colleague charges me with having denounced the Green amendment, and then of having voted for it. He improperly charges that I maintained the same doctrine in the North Carolina Senate in voting for Governor Graham's bill; and yet he comes forward and himself defends the views of the Executive on that very subject which this Green amendment was intended to cover and sanction. How much verity is there in his charge when we come to examine it? Did my colleague ever vote to strike out the Green amendment? Is that true? It is not true. Did the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUITMAN] move to strike out the Green amendment? He never did.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi. When the bill came from the Senate, General QUITMAN moved to strike out the Green amendment; and those of us who believed with him voted for it.

Mr. GILMER. I will show that he did not do it.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi. Do it.

Mr. GILMER. If his amendment had been drawn out in writing, as it ought to have been, nothing about the Green amendment would be in it. Why did he not move to strike the Green amendment from the Senate bill? Why did he move a substitute? If there was a purpose, bona fide, to get rid of the Green amendment, why was not a motion made to strike it from the Senate bill before the vote was taken on the Crittenden-Montgomery amendment? Did he not know that the Green amendment would have been voted out, had he offered simply to strike it from the Senate bill? Every American would have voted to strike it out. Most of the Opposition members would have voted to strike it out. Would it not have gone out, then, if the motion had been properly made? Why not, then, do the thing in a plain, simple manner, so easily done, and which would have brought the House to a direct vote on the Green amendment, and not at the same time against the Crittenden bill? I respectfully express my suspicion that it was done in the way in which it was, that certain gentlemen might indirectly get their vote seemingly against the amendment, when they knew that the motion could not be carried; or, it may be, because they knew that if that Green amendment went out, there were certain Free-Soil men from the North who would desert their ranks. I allude to the northern gentlemen who refused to vote for the Quitman amendment. In fact, and in plain English, the motion was so made, and the vote so taken, as to afford a mere showing, as I suspect—one in behalf of the southern wing, that they were opposed to the Green amendment; and for the northern Free-Soil wing, that they were for it. There is much common sense in this country. The people in due time will understand all this fully. Why make such an extraordinary motion, and then turn round and say that it was moved to strike out the Green amendment? My friends will see that if it had been moved to strike the Green amendment from the Senate bill before the vote was taken between the Senate bill and the Crittenden-Montgomery amendment, the motion would have prevailed, and it would have made the Senate bill more acceptable.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi. Will the gentleman tell me the difference between moving to substitute a bill without the particular section to which he refers, and moving to strike that section out?

Mr. GILMER. If the question had been presented in the latter shape it would have received a majority of the votes of this House; but presented as it was it could not have received such a majority, because all who were called on to vote for the Quitman amendment, were, in the form presented, compelled to vote at the same time against the whole of their bill.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi. Why not, if the effect was the same?

Mr. GILMER. For this reason (the plainest possible) that it was well understood that certain northern gentlemen were supporting the Senate bill because it sustained the doctrine of the Green amendment, who would not vote for it if that was not there, and therefore they did not want the Green amendment out; for if it were out they would lose friends even for the Senate bill.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. The amendment pending to the Senate bill was the Crittenden-Montgomery amendment. The Senate bill contained the Green amendment. The amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi was the Senate bill without the Green amendment, offered as an amendment to the Crittenden-Montgomery amendment. Had the proposition of the gentleman from Mississippi been accepted at the time, it would have superseded the Crittenden-Montgomery amendment, and left us to choose between the Senate bill with the Green amendment and the Senate bill without the Green amendment. The effect of it was never "to say turkey" to us once upon the Crittenden-Montgomery amendment.

Mr. GILMER. Yes.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi. I desire to say that the reason assigned by the gentleman from North Carolina for not voting for the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi, is quite different from that given by the gentleman from Kentucky. Yet both of those gentlemen vote alike, both voting against the proposition of the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. QUITMAN.] One says that if it had been simply to strike out the Green amendment he would have voted for it.

Mr. GILMER. I did say that exactly.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi. The gentleman from Kentucky said he would not have voted for it in the form in which it was presented by the gentleman from Mississippi, while the gentleman from North Carolina says he would, and his party would; yet the gentleman from Kentucky is one of his party.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. The gentleman from Mississippi will do me the justice to say that the reason why I would not have voted for the proposition of the gentleman from Mississippi was, that the effect of that proposition would have been to kill that very amendment of which I was in favor; and we could not have got a vote upon it all.

Mr. GILMER. If the Quitman amendment had been simply to strike from the Senate bill the Green amendment, I, together with a large majority of the House, would have voted to strike it out. This was the fair, regular way to do it. Then the next vote would have been a fair and plain one, to wit: the Senate bill without the Green amendment on one side, and the Crittenden bill on the other. The Quitman amendment seemed to be the result of study, and seemingly offered with a purpose to embarrass us; evidently it was offered in such double and duplicated manner, that, under the rules of the House, those of us who would vote with conservative gentlemen against the Green amendment, would have to vote at the same time against the whole Crittenden bill, which we most approved. In short, the Quitman amendment said to me, "you shall not vote against the Green amendment, without voting at the same time against the Crittenden bill." I repeat, had the motion been made to strike out the Green amendment from the Senate bill, it would have gone out; then the next choice would have been the Senate bill with the Green amendment out, or the Crittenden-Montgomery bill. Does the gentleman deny that?

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi. You would have had your choice. But, would you have voted for the Senate bill, with the Green amendment stricken out?

Mr. GILMER. My colleague [Mr. SHAW] reads from the Lecompton constitution to show that it prescribes a proper qualification for voters, and then in that connection speaks of the Minnesota constitution, notice of which appeared in the papers long after my speech was made. Was that treating my views fairly? What had the Minnesota constitution, irregularly formed and void, to do, then, with the subject under discussion? But I suppose my colleague intended by that sort of statement to have it go abroad that the Crittenden-Montgomery bill did not provide exactly the same safeguards as to the qualification of voters. I can see no other purpose. An examination of the two bills will expose this injustice.

He says further, erroneously, that I took the ground that the people of Kansas would vote down the Lecompton constitution; and that when they came to make a new constitution, they would have the power to seize and take away from the United States eighty million acres of the public lands. And he read as follows:

"Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the State of Kansas is admitted into the Union upon the express condition that said State shall never interfere with the primary disposal of the public lands, or with any regulations which Congress may find necessary for securing the title in said lands to the bona fide purchaser and grantee thereof, or impose or levy any tax, assessment, or imposition of any description whatever, upon them or other property of the United States within the limits of said State."

And then he says I voted against this just and necessary measure of security. Is that true? Did not the Crittenden-Montgomery bill have precisely the same safeguards? and when I voted for one bill in preference to another, both having the same provision in this respect, did I vote against these necessary safeguards? This is another among the many attempts made by my colleague to do me injustice in my absence.

But what did my colleague do? What provision is there for the protection of the right of the United States in the public lands in the bill admitting Minnesota? Minnesota has also the same millions of acres of public lands in her limits, of more value, too. Is there any provision in that bill which secures the United States in her public lands in Minnesota, such as there is in the Crittenden-Montgomery bill, or even in the Senate bill? Not one word. I will attach a copy of this bill to my speech. It is a bill simply admitting Minnesota as a State into the Union, and not a single word is contained in it about reserving the right of the United States to the public domain in the Territory of Minnesota. My colleague voted for that bill—I voted against it.

Now, I wish to show to the committee what a distinguished gentleman from the State of my friend [Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi] says as to the effect of admitting a new State, without in the bill admitting the State, providing for the security of the Government's title to the public lands. I refer to the Hon. JEFFERSON DAVIS. In a recent letter to his constituents he uses this language:

"The consequences of admitting a State without a recognition precedent of the rights of the United States to the public domain, are, in my opinion, the transfer of the useful, with the eminent domain, to the people of the State thus admitted without reservation."

If this view, entertained by the Senator from Mississippi, be true, then our friends who voted for the bill admitting Minnesota without this provision, which my colleague from North Carolina conceives to be so important to preserve our interest in the public lands, have done the very same thing which he undertakes, as I think unjustly and unfairly, to charge me with.

But that is not all, Mr. Chairman. I voted against the Minnesota bill for this reason, among

35TH CONG...1ST SESS.

Admission of Kansas—Mr. Gilmer.

Ho. of Reps.

others, that it contained this extraordinary provision, to wit:

"SEC. 1. Every male person of the age of twenty-one years or upwards, belonging to either of the following classes, who shall have resided in the United States one year, and in this State for four months next preceding any election, shall be entitled to vote at such election, in the election district of which he shall at the time have been for ten days a resident, for all officers that now are, or hereafter may be, elective by the people:

"1. White citizens of the United States.

"2. White persons of foreign birth, who shall have declared their intentions to become citizens, conformably to the laws of the United States upon the subject of naturalization.

"3. Persons of mixed white and Indian blood, who have adopted the customs and habits of civilization.

"4. Persons of Indian blood residing in this State, who have adopted the language, customs, and habits of civilization, after an examination before any district court of the State in such manner as may be provided by law, and shall have been pronounced by said court capable of enjoying the rights of citizenship within the State."

My colleague may account to his constituents for his vote in favor of this constitutional provision.

My colleague not only voted for this, but, according to his own doctrine, voted for a bill the provisions of which give up millions of the public lands.

My colleague draws a picture, and gives his statement as to how northern people got to Kansas. He says nothing about how or for what our southern friends also went there. As to this I had said nothing. It was not my purpose to justify scuffling to get people into Kansas unnaturally and prematurely by either. My purpose here and elsewhere has been to do all in my power to allay excitement on the inflammable subject of slavery, and induce the country, in all sections, to leave this whole question to the result of the usual and natural immigration, and the citizens of the United States—those actually settled in the Territory—fairly and peaceably to decide this question at the proper time and in the proper way.

My colleague says that I based my opposition to the admission of Kansas, under the Lecompton constitution, "in other words, to her admission as a slave State," upon three points, and so forth. Based my opposition to the admission of Kansas, under the Lecompton constitution, "IN OTHER WORDS, TO HER ADMISSION AS A SLAVE STATE!" Now, I ask any candid man to recur to all that I said upon that occasion, to read my speech, and then answer for himself what is the fair dealing of one who, in a reply to it, would say that? Did I not avow that, so far as I was concerned, I was well pleased with the Lecompton constitution, in substance; that I would be pleased to have Kansas as a slave State, should the people of Kansas be satisfied with it; and that I would be satisfied if we could acquire Kansas as a slave State properly, fairly, and peaceably?

Mr. Chairman, the object and design of this I cannot but say (and I do so in all becoming respect) is illustrated by the fable of the boy who tried to conceal the fish, which he had acquired by stealth, under his waistcoat, but staid in market, the tail sticking out below. [Laughter.] He says there was nothing in the Green amendment, but that he regretted to see it in the bill. He quotes it in his speech; he defends, as I understand him, the position taken on that subject by the Executive in his special message; he professes to take ground for the Executive against me; and upon that I am ready to go with him before the people of North Carolina, or the people of the South everywhere. Pray what is the doctrine intended to be covered by that Green amendment? It is that the readiest and quickest way to get slavery out of Kansas is to adopt the Lecompton constitution; for that, irrespective of the checks and limitations in the constitution, the majority of the people can elect a Legislature; and that Legislature can call a convention. The convention thus called can alter the constitution, and give at once power to the Legislature to abolish and confiscate slave property, nothing being said about compensation to the owners who, according to the Dred Scott decision, had gone as rightfully into the Territory with their property as others with other property. Is that a doctrine which is to be defended by southern men, or that is likely to advance the interests of the States interested in the institution of slavery?

As I remarked in my speech, I had supposed that the South had gained something by the principle settled in the Dred Scott decision, and that southern men could go into the Territories with their slave property just as northern men go with any other kind of property. But, according to his doctrine, as soon as the Territory becomes a State, there is this difference between slave property and other property, that the former is particularly liable to be abolished or confiscated. Both went in constitutionally and legally. But as soon as the Territory becomes a State, the rights in slaves enjoyed under the United States Constitution are gone. I was sorry to hear some of our northern friends say that that was their construction of it, and that it could be done without compensation to the owners. What service is the principle settled in the Dred Scott case to the South if that doctrine be true? I supposed that, to carry out that principle truly, southern men were entitled not only to go into the Territory with this species of property, but that, when they came to form a State constitution, the convention, or a subsequent Legislature, could do no more with slave property than had been lawfully brought into the Territory, than they could with any other species of property. The right to prohibit the further introduction of slaves is one thing; the right to legislate for the gradual emancipation of the issue born afterwards is another thing; and the right to abolish slavery, allowing compensation to the owners, is a third thing. All these might be reasonably consistent with the principle settled in the Dred Scott case; but to go the fourth degree, and say that the convention assembled to form a State constitution can give the Legislature power to emancipate or confiscate the slaves that had gone in there rightfully, without compensation to the owners, is going far indeed, and is entirely a different thing. If southern men defend that, I am willing to meet my colleague on that issue in North Carolina or anywhere else.

My colleague tells the story of Pat McGowan. He uses an offensive term for a very clever Irishman in North Carolina, whose true name is Patrick McGowan, and is a gentleman who was door-keeper to the Senate of North Carolina for a number of years, a poor but, as I believe, an honest man; a Roman Catholic; but he discharges his duties promptly, faithfully, and industriously. He was ever kind and attentive to me. I had a personal partiality for this little industrious man, who had a house full of children, and not the wherewithal to clothe and feed them easily. He asked me to sign a recommendation to get him the appointment of mail agent of the Raleigh and Gaston railroad. I did so; he received the appointment, and has filled it with ability and faithfulness ever since. I might say that all this took place before we had any controversy about the principles of the American party; but I do not want to plead off on any such ground as that. God forbid that there should be anything in the principles of the American party to prohibit me, or others, from lending my name or influence in a work of that kind! I think my colleague, if he had searched closely into my public acts, could have found something that would have operated more to my prejudice than this little aid which I gave to one, poor and clever, but whom he contemptuously calls "Pat McGowan." All that he can make out of that little circumstance he is welcome to.

But my colleague says that I have supported the doctrine of alien suffrage. What does he mean by that? If this charge had the least semblance of truth in it, it would be no fault with him. The Senate bill and the Crittenden bill contained substantially the same provisions and safe guards as to this.

My colleague goes into a long history of the Missouri compromise, and winds up with this reason for the repeal thereof, to wit: "That northern men opposed the extension of it to the Pacific." I would reply to this, by asking whether the same majority that repealed the said compromise, could not, by the very same vote, and with the same case, have extended it to the Pacific?

My colleague says he has no complaint to make of my votes on Kansas, but believes they are in direct opposition to the interests of his constituents and mine; and, to be the more emphatic, striking, and imposing, he borrows the phrase "unparalleled outrage" to apply to the positions maintained by me. He turns me over to be destroyed by my constituents. After all this, who would have believed that he, so shortly thereafter, would have come substantially on the same platform with me, and have embraced the self-same "unparalleled outrage," and rejoiced with others over its success as a great triumph, a great measure of peace and quiet to the country? Yes, sir; a great Administration triumph, celebrated by music and singing, speaking, banners, and the firing of cannon. Now, sir, I am pained to see that, among many politicians at the North, there is a scuffling to have the impression created on the country that there is not a submission of this constitution to the decision of the people of Kansas. And I discover the same thing among gentlemen of the South, who are trying to cover up the fact that they came down to this very platform, "unparalleled outrage," to wit: that the people of Kansas are substantially to have the privilege of deciding this very great quarrel among and for themselves. Now I want to make this point as plain as daylight—so plain, mark you, that these southern gentlemen who would charge me as being inconsistent, who supported the principle of the submission of the constitution of Kansas to the people, must apply inconsistency to themselves. I do it by reading the act itself; there is no getting around that. It reads as follows:

"Be it enacted, &c., That the State of Kansas be, and is hereby, admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever, but upon this fundamental condition precedent, namely: that the question of admission, with the following proposition in lieu of the ordinance framed at Lecompton, be submitted to a vote of the people of Kansas, and assented to by them or a majority of the voters voting at an election to be held for that purpose, namely: that the following propositions be, and the same are hereby, offered to the people of Kansas for acceptance or rejection, which, if accepted, shall be obligatory on the United States and upon the said State of Kansas, to wit:

Here follows what the people of Kansas are to vote for or against.

And what is that, pray? Why, simply whether she would accept the quantity of land which she would get any way—the same that Minnesota receives—the same that she would get whether she comes in under the Lecompton constitution or any other constitution. Yet gentlemen undertake to argue before the people of the country that it is not submitting the constitution to the people of Kansas. It is true, it is indirect; but it is the same principle, in fact, advocated by those who supported the Crittenden-Montgomery bill. They come as near to my bill as they could, considering that we are all creatures of human pride. Why, Mr. Chairman, you might as well have said, "you shall not vote for Lecompton, or against Lecompton, but you may do this: all those who are for Lecompton may throw into a hat blue beans, but all those who are opposed to Lecompton may throw in black beans; then, when all have thrown in their beans, count, and if the blue beans are the most in number, Kansas is in with Lecompton; but if the black beans are the most numerous, then there is no State of Kansas, and no Lecompton constitution."

But it does not stop there; the act goes further, and shows what is to be done if they thus reject this constitution. It reads as follows:

"At the said election the voting shall be by ballot, and by indorsing on his ballot, as each voter may please, 'Proposition accepted' or 'Proposition rejected.' Should a majority of the votes cast be for 'Proposition accepted,' the President of the United States, as soon as the fact is duly made known to him, shall announce the same by proclamation; and thereafter, and without any further proceedings on the part of Congress, the admission of the State of Kansas into the Union upon an equal footing with the original States, in all respects whatever, shall be complete and absolute; and said State shall be entitled to one member in the House of Representatives in the Congress of the United States until the next census be taken by the Federal Government. But should a majority of the votes cast be for 'Proposition rejected,' it shall be deemed and held that the people of Kansas do not desire admission into the Union with said constitution under the conditions set forth in the said proposition; and in that event the people of said Territory are hereby authorized and empowered to form for themselves a constitution and State government, the name of the State of Kansas, according to the Federal Constitution, and may elect delegates for that purpose whenever, and not before, it is ascertained by a census duly and legally taken that the population of said Territory equals or exceeds the ratio of representation required for a member of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States; and whenever thereafter such delegates shall assemble in convention, they shall first determine by a vote whether it is the wish of the people of the proposed State to be admitted into the Union at that time; and, if so, shall proceed to form a constitution, and take all necessary steps for the establishment of a State government, in conformity with the Federal Constitution, subject to such limitations and restrictions as to the mode and manner of its approval or ratification by the people of the proposed State as they may have prescribed by law, and shall be entitled to admission into the Union, as a State under such constitution thus fairly and legally made, with or without slavery, as said constitution may prescribe."

I tell you, sir, there is, substantially, the principle of the Crittenden-Montgomery bill, this "unparalleled outrage," supported by the friends, who set out with the Senate bill and the Green amendment, that is the identical thing that has been passed, and is now glorified all over the country with shouts and songs and feastings, by the very men who denounced it so bitterly in the beginning.

In reference to the allusion I made to the test oaths imposed by the first Territorial Legislature, my colleague mentions an oath to support the constitution, and an oath to enforce the fugitive slave law. There he stops.

Why does he stop there? To impress, I presume, the southern people falsely that in my speech I complained that the people of Kansas were required to take an oath to support the Constitution, and an oath to enforce the fugitive slave law? Did he not know and well understand me to be referring to the extraordinary oaths which prohibited the people from conversing on and debating the question which, by the terms of the Kansas-Nebraska act, was left for them to decide among and for themselves? Why did he not then go on and argue fairly, and not so unkindly strive to fix odium on me, as he well understood that I was referring to these oaths?

He quotes from northern speeches, from those whose sentiments are unpopular in the South. Then, he asks, "suppose the name of the member from Ohio [Mr. Giddings] was attached?" &c. Why did he not copy from what was said in the South as well as in the North? I read from the Richmond Enquirer. Speaking of Kansas and the Leecompton constitution, the Editor says:

"We still believe that the constitutional convention, although legitimately assembled, resorted to a means of a submission of the constitution entirely at variance with republican principle and sanctioned by no precedent of republican history. We cannot recognize that this constitution has been either formally or virtually adopted, either by the convention at Leecompton or by the people of Kansas. We consider that the mode of submission resorted to was intended to defeat, and did defeat, all fair expression of that popular will to which the schedule of submission professed to defer. Under these circumstances we agreed, with a large number of the Democratic party, by insisting that a constitution legally framed should also be legally adopted, before it could be imposed by congressional action upon a sovereign people; that the Leecompton constitution should be submitted to a full, fair, free submission to the people, who should thus be enabled to elect its ratification or rejection."

That paper, it will be seen, holds that the convention was legitimate, yet believes that it resorted to means for the submission of the constitution entirely at variance with the original design and spirit of the Kansas bill and the wishes of the people. He might have added the views of the Richmond Enquirer in the same connection. What views did I take, or opinions express, in my speech, that could call for congratulation from any Abolitionist? He pointed to none—he could not do it. But he interpolates and adds extracts from the views and speeches of others, and then adds, as I have already said, "Suppose the name of the member from Ohio [Mr. Giddings] was attached," &c. I admit there is a great deal of cunning here. Why did he not select some portion of my speech, and then ask the question whether this man or that man's name attached to it would reflect on me as a southern man? With all this cunning and all this device, I must say, with all respect, that in the nursing and fixing up of this particular part of his speech, my colleague must have had in his head full as much moon as sunlight.

After showing, as I have already done, so much unfairness, and so many errors, and misstatement in my colleagues speech, I will now say what is almost unnecessary, that the attempt he so ungenerously and improperly makes to prejudice me in the eyes of my countrymen, excites with me indifference, at the effects and results he has so lamely and feebly attempted.

Then he attempts still further to prejudice me by saying that the member from Ohio [Mr. Giddings] congratulated me on the speech that I made on that occasion. When my colleague was upon the floor, and gentlemen who were near me at the time assured him that what was alleged did not take place, I should have expected, at least it would be expected, that he would have acknowledged that he had been mistaken; but not so. He had risen to make the speech, and his speech he made as he had fixed it up. What in my speech was there that Mr. GIDDINGS could congratulate me on?

And I would say here, with all submission, that if we could bring about a state of things in this country, when Mr. GIDDINGS, or all others, North or South, would be willing to congratulate themselves upon the platform laid down in that speech, it would be a better state of things than now exists, or I fear will soon exist. I say, in reference to my colleague's statement, however, with a solemn regard to truth, that there is not a word of truth in it. I do recollect that the member from Ohio, in passing up the aisle, some distance from me, on the conclusion of my speech, stopped and made some such remarks as he has stated in his reported reply to my colleague, about my having connected his name with that of Mr. Buchanan. That I believe to be true; no more.

I will conclude with an additional remark in reference to the vote I gave for the compromise bill. It was not such a bill as I fully approved. I should have vastly preferred the Crittenden-Montgomery bill. It was an honest bill. It left room for no double construction. It did not leave room for southern men to say that there was no submission, and for the northern wing of the Democratic party to say that there was a submission. It came forward plainly, honestly, squarely, and did the very thing it professed. True, the bill which passed in substance was the same; only leaving room for this double construction.

But, inasmuch as this odious Green amendment, indorsing the objectionable doctrine which it was intended to cover, was out of it; and inasmuch as it left this question to be settled, where perhaps it is best that it should be settled, the South having nothing to gain, I deemed it best to vote for it. I said to my gallant southern comrades who had fought the battle, that they had, in substance, all that they had been contending for. But my gallant friends considered it their duty to proceed further; and, as their bill was in such a fair, plain, and unquestionable form, they thought themselves justified in pursuing those who had abused and opposed them, until they should bring them to their very terms, word for word and letter for letter; and had they been successful, I am now well satisfied that the bill would have obtained the sanction of the other wing of this Capitol, and would have given to the country a better adjustment and secured the prospect of greater satisfaction than the bill which finally received the sanction of both Houses.

APPENDIX.

An act for the admission of the State of Minnesota into the Union.

Whereas, an act of Congress was passed February 26, 1857, entitled "An act to authorize the people of the Territory of Minnesota to form a constitution and State government, preparatory to their admission into the Union on an equal footing with the original States;" and whereas, the people of said Territory did, on the 29th day of August, 1857, by delegates elected for that purpose, form for themselves a constitution and State government, which is republican in form, and was ratified and adopted by the people, at an election held on the 13th day of October, 1857, for that purpose: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the State of Minnesota shall be one, and is hereby declared to be one, of the United States of America, and admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That said State shall be entitled to two Representatives in Congress until the next apportionment of Representatives amongst the several States.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That from and after the admission of the State of Minnesota, as hereinbefore provided, all the laws of the United States, which are not locally inapplicable, shall have the same force and effect within that State as in other States of the Union, and the said State is hereby constituted a judicial district of the United States, within which a district court, with the like powers and jurisdiction as the district court of the United States for the district of Iowa, shall be established. The Judge, attorney, and marshal of the United States, for the said district of Minnesota, shall reside within the same, and shall be entitled to the same compensation as the judge, attorney, and marshal of the district of Iowa; and in all cases of appeal or writ of error heretofore prosecuted, and now pending in the Supreme Court of the United States, upon any record from the supreme court of Minnesota Territory, the mandate of execution or order of further proceedings shall be directed by the Supreme Court of the United States to the district court of the United States for the district of Minnesota, or to the supreme court of the State of Minnesota, as the nature of such appeal or writ of error may require; and each of those courts shall be the successor of the supreme court of Minnesota Territory as to all such cases, with full power to hear and determine the same, and to award mesne or final process therein.

ORIGIN OF SLAVERY.

SPEECH OF HON. L. M. KEITT, OF SOUTH CAROLINA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

May 24, 1858.

The House being in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. KEITT said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: On a past occasion I made an endeavor, and did not, I trust, entirely fail, to prove that, with the diffusion of the human race upon earth, in the customs of savage hordes and the legislation of early nations—at the origins of human societies and under the precepts of God, directly revealed to his people, slavery, domestic slavery, stood as a constant, primitive, and universal fact, before which the speculations of schools, the reluctance of prejudice, or the whine of hypocrisy are compelled to sink into either silence or acknowledgment. I have appealed to the earliest traditions of mankind; I have gone under the tent of the patriarch, when he spoke face to face "with the Lord out of heaven," and received the promises of the first covenant; I have entered the precinct of the household which contained the father of the family and the master of the bondman merged in one and the same person; I have questioned the usages of nomadic tribes and the legislation of civilized States—nay, I have interrogated the sanctioner of all earthly legislation; I have, not irreverently, interrogated the law of God himself, and each and all of them have armed my postulate with defiant proof that slavery, far from being the work of violence and of wrong, is alike ratified by Divine wisdom and demanded by social requirements.

This, I repeat it, the traditional voices of mankind; the usages of the patriarchal days; the cycles of popular poetry; the enactments of man; and the higher sanctions of the law of God—all of them amply, unerringly, and irreversibly converge to establish.

It does not belong to me, sir, to inquire how those who have foregone the manlier attitude of the antagonist to skulk under the more congenial infamies of the traducer, can ever succeed in scaling this battlement of proof. For my part, aside from all human authority and legal defense, I am content impregably to intrench the rights of the South behind the muniments which the hand of the Almighty has reared; or, if for greater security, to plant them upon the summit of the rock where the law was proclaimed; where, with the proclamation of the law was also uttered the fiat which sanctioned slavery, and settled the relations between the master and the slave. And here, sir, I cannot, in this connection, omit reference to a fact which struck me with peculiar force, in the sequel of my inquiries. It is a strange thing, yet no less true than strange, that in this consecration of the Divine will, the commandments themselves, given in the voice of the thunder and the flash of the lightning; those commandments which recognized and confirmed the previously existing rights (Exodus, chapter xx., verses 10-17) should, without any interposition of other matter, be immediately followed by precepts settling and regulating the character and status of slavery. (Exodus, chapter xxi., verses 2, 4, 6, 7, 20, 26, 27, 32.) Yes, turn to that Book, which, in all the things of human life, is one of perpetual relevancy, because it is the Book of eternal wisdom and truth, and any thinking and honest man must also be struck with this peculiarity in this question of slavery, which the Almighty, in his decrees, has seen fit to consecrate, but which some of his miserable, presumptuous creatures, in their superior wisdom and holier claims, would damn into an abomination and a sin. As in our organic law its creators, after the declaration of the objects and principles of government, gave the most prominent place to the duties and inhibitions—marked, in a specific form for the framers, the expounders, and the executives of the supreme law; so in the Divine constitution, after the declaration of the moral law and of the requirements of Divine worship, out of the multiplicity of precepts which He had to impose, and which He did impose upon His people, God seems specially to have selected this question of slavery to make it the subject of a particular determination of duties and delegation of powers, enjoined and conferred on Moses, the organ and exponent of His law.

That law, Mr. Chairman, endured in its fullness, as the expressed will of the Maker, until it pleased Him again to reveal that will to His creatures and to send His Messiah as the witness of that revelation. It remained in vigor, unmodified and unchanged, save in the necessities of the new scheme, among which slavery was not reckoned, by Him who emphatically declared, "I am not come to destroy, but to fulfill" the law, which He committed to His ministers in their prosecution of His divine mission. By them it was transmitted to their successors, and by these, in an unbroken line, to the succeeding agents who continued that work. And thus, sir, down the steep of ages, until our days of new lights and modern improvements, when it is sought to substitute a sickly philanthropy for the salutary precepts of the Creator, our days of fanatical innovations and dissolving doctrines, in which the voice of the Romillies, the Wilberforces, and the Clarksons, denouncing the law of God, found an echo in our own second-handed Abolition conferences, in our modest revisers of the olden creed, and northern editors of a new code of Christianity. From negation to negation they have gone on repudiating the traditions of the original code; repudiating the customs of the past which it sanctioned; repudiating the formal instructions of the earliest apostles; repudiating, when they did not actually criminate, the silence of the Savior himself; they have gone on thus, until, in one crowning act of impious insolence, howling for "an anti-slavery Bible and an anti-slavery God," they have repudiated the written law of the divine Legislator, and ex cathedra declared his own institution and consecration of slavery to be a defilement and a crime. If we, sir, who claim a twofold guarantee for the rights of the slaveholder, in the legal sanction and the Divine injunctions, which I take to be the very duramen of the institution and its growth, are tainted by such defilement and guilty of such crime; if these men, instead of being impious maniacs and malicious slanderers, are the assertors of truth and the vindicators of right; then shall we have to reverse the injunctions of the apostles delivered in the prosecution of their ministry, and baptized in the holy spirit of knowledge and truth; shall have to load our souls with the guilt of the blasphemer and condemn the Savior for his silence on this question of slavery, or interpolate His teachings dispensed to those apostles as the muniments of their approaching ministry. Then, sir, shall we be compelled to rend asunder the slavery record of Exodus, extended over the chapters of Leviticus, and reaffirmed in the second promulgation of the law through the precepts of Deuteronomy. Compelled, sir, if these men are to escape the stigma which should attach to them as willful falsifiers of the word of God, to pervert every line of Scripture, and blot out the decalogue itself; which, embodying the sum of our moral duties and religious obligations, embodies also a recognition of slavery.

But we of the South, with no claim to self-sustaining godliness and with no impudent pretensions to reform or amend the word of God, must be content to abide by its precepts, and cling to its securities. We cannot, therefore, consent that it shall be so lacerated as to pluck away from its prohibitions, not a denunciation of slavery, but that command which should forbid them "to bear false witness against their neighbor." Hence, sir, respecting that law, in all its bearings, we respect it in its bearing upon slavery, where its recognition by man is corroborated by the sanction of Heaven. It has the authority of covenant and time for its applications in human societies. It has the authority of apostolic instructions, and of Christian practice. It has the authority of the canons and decretals of the Church, when there was but one Church on the face of the earth. It has the authority of imperial rescripts and royal decrees, not condemned by the spiritual dicta of the Church. It has the authority of parliamentary statutes, of colonial regulations and State laws, which recognize its concordance and fitness with slavery. Slavery, sir, under that law, has claimed and obtained the assent of universal custom and right; and we contend that a disinterested renunciation, or pious non-user of a right, on the part of any individual, community, or State, can never disparage the authority of that law, affect the sanctity of our rights, or pervert their exercise into an imputation of wrong. No, sir; we cannot allow those men, unmasked and unbribed, to mutilate the record for purposes of malice, of falsehood, and of strife. The municipal law of modern times is but the binomial affirmation of the Divine law of ancient days; and upon both we stand, and shall ever stand, as a tower of impregnable strength.

Painfully aware am I, Mr. Chairman, that this is not the place where the question of slavery, in this view—I mean in the religious view—should be discussed. But when the assault is not confined to the declarations of conferences, and the decrees of synod; to the rabid vituperations of the rostra, and the scurrilous amenities of the pulpit; when the trained and prompted retailers of secular slanders and holy falsehoods come here, where all meet upon an equality of political rights, whatever distinction may be marked by a sense of personal dignity, and the despotism of gentlemanly nurture—come here, and upon this floor, "like hounds let loose from leash," day after day howl in our ears that we are "men stealers," that we are breakers of the Divine law; that slavery has the curse of God upon its head; and that our maintenance of the system is a sin in His eyes; we may be pardoned for overlooking the proprieties of place, and even "wer't in a church," not refrain from repelling the assault where it is made, and the falsehood where advanced. Why, sir, even those who profess to stand by our rights modify the admission by the salvo that slavery, though a shocking thing, is our own business and concern. They justify their gingerly advocacy of what they call the rights of slavery, as existing in the States, by the complimentary avowal that "our people are not their people, and our God their God." That our people and our God are not their people and their God, we have abundant and satisfactory proof. The burning sense of wrong that kindles the southern heart; every pulse which, in the southern bosom, beats in answer to the voice of justice, tells us that our people cannot be their people. That their God is not, and cannot be our God, we have the evidence in their persistent repudiation of His law, and their willful perversion of its precepts.

For the delicate allotment in the former case, of the sum cuique, Mr. Chairman, and the proper discrimination between our people and theirs, they have the due acknowledgments of one, at least, who would regret to find misconception or confusion existing on that score. For the duality of the godship, in the latter instance, I am not otherwise prepared, nor is it quite my province to account. I am, however, reminded of the congratulations of the Roman poet:

"O! sanctas gentes, quibus hæc nascuntur, in hortis Numina?"

congratulations addressed to "that holy race whose gods in gardens grow;" whilst mine may not be withheld from the people; not ours, whose inventive genius, among others of its achievements, has secured for them a patent northern god, in a Yankee heaven. I am satisfied, sir, to give wide berth to this horrid idol of northern contrivance—horrid indeed, sir, if we are to judge of its character by the madness and impiety to which its baleful spirit is driving its fanatical worshippers. I give it wide berth to cling to the God whom we acknowledge in reverence and truth, the God of our fathers; who has smiled, and who continues to smile, in kindness and protection, upon both master and slave; the God of our fathers in the trial times of our struggle, whose light they invoked in the deliberations of the council-room, and to whose might they appealed in the arbitrament of the battle-field; the God who breathed wisdom in their councils, and gave power to their arms; the God who, in the day of ordeal, with the scales of justice in His hand, swayed the beam on the side of victory and right. This, sir, is our God—the God whose paths we have striven to pursue, and whose mandates we have labored to obey. This God the very brotherly spirit of our northern friends has differed from theirs.

In the prosecution of this duty to the South, and in vindication of its traduced and slandered people, to Him and to His law, its permissions and its guarantees, I confidently appeal to shake off the responsibility which the repeated assertion that slavery is a sin, because it is an assumed violation of the justice of God, seeks to impute to us as breakers of the Christian law in the maintenance of the institution in our political and domestic society. Why, sir, the news current upon your streets but yesterday tells you that a religious conference—a religious conference!—at the North, following scores of other conferences of the kind, by a vote of fifty-one against thirty-five, passed resolutions—affirmed resolutions, decreeing us and our people of the South to be violators of the law of God, and of the teachings of His Son. The duties of the headman, performed on some of the more distinguished felons, were wont, in times past, to borrow a relative dignity from the character of the criminals. But the office of an executioner, discharged even on these saintly culprits of ours, can be but loathsome at best. Hence, sir, I shrink from branding these pious perverters of truth with the stigma due to the falsehoods which they, with fiendish malice and unstinted breath, daily drive against the institutions, the morals, and the religion of the South. Were it not for the obligation incumbent on this discussion to pluck the mask from the face of error, and to champion the sanctities of truth, I would scarcely waste the breath to ask them to point out to us where Christ taught, where Christ hinted, that slavery, as He found it established by the will of His Father, uttered on the heights of Sinai—that slavery, as He found it under the derivative authority of human legislation, is a violation and a breaking of His Divine precepts? Humbly and reverently, sir, have I scanned those precepts; not to falsify, not to warp, but to understand and respect; and nowhere yet have I been able to find a line that will either screen our slanderers from the guilt of willful obliquity from the paths, which, in this respect, He has marked for our feet, or subject us to the charge of a departure from His intents in the same respect. It is our sincere acknowledgment, on the contrary, that His teachings, without conceit of ourselves, or disparagement of others, are a guide to our lives, and a sacrament to our hopes; and we keep them sacred and free from the thousand worldly stains by which, through their prostitution of religion to political and secular ends, our traducers blur the holiness and deform the beauty of His worship, in persistent contempt of His admonition, "My kingdom is not of this world."

Much as the fact may exercise the incredulity of our northern friends—credulous in all else that promises full scope for the pursuit of serious follies and fanatical aims—I assert this, in the name of a high-thoughted and generous people, whose only guilt is blindness to the refined civilization, and rebellion against the self-seeking morality of a self-righteous North. I do it in the name and on behalf of the mothers of the South, before the moral splendors of whose home-virtues and exemplary lives the fame of the Roman matrons dwindles into an empty boast. I assert it in the name and on behalf of the daughters of the South, who, rich in every endowment that adorns the female character, give assurance that this patrimony of quiet and purifying virtues shall long continue unflawed by the rude contact of the public rostrums, or unshamed by dabbling in the vagaries of women's rights. I assert it in the name of the younger sons of the South, the spes altera Romæ, the future hope of our Republic, held to the memory of lofty deeds, and sworn to patriotic service. But especially do I assert it in the name and in vindication of a pure and enlightened clergy, who sustain high purposes with high dignity, and justify their ministry by the teachings which their Master taught.

35TH CONG....1ST SESS.

When, therefore, Mr. Chairman, the attempt is made, in the name of religion, to put our moral and social character under the ban of the world's opinion; when made by the arm of fanaticism, led by falsehood, to assail the institutions and endanger the peace of the South; it is neither out of place, nor against propriety, for us to go even to the armories of Christianity for a weapon of defense. I trust, sir, that the same spirit of fairness which sustained my reference to the primitive sources of unerring wisdom and truth, and guided the investigation into the other sources of authority, will not fail me in further inquiries directed to the record of the Gospel, which time has handed down to us as the voucher of the doctrines of Christ.

On His advent, sir, slavery was a universal fact, growing out of the rights laid down in the original law, and acknowledged by every tribe and nation, whether now lost in the darkness of ages, or once figuring in the geographies of the inhabited earth. Neither He, as the promulgator of the suppletory law, nor His apostles, as its subsequent heralds, ever denied the law in that particular, or preached in condemnation of either the right or the fact. The founder of the new code taught the unity of God in a trinity of persons. He taught the fall of man and the regeneration through His merits. He enforced the necessities of meekness, justice, temperance, and charity. He rebuked the pride of human will and of human intellect, and sustained all orders of men by the doctrine that the highest of the spiritual virtues can be linked with a lowly estate, a chastened will, and a trusting faith. From the summit of that mount, to which every sincere Christian looks for the law of his duty, He, in minutest details, uttered all the offices of those who claim to be the followers of His Gospel, but in nothing, save the redemption of marriage from the bond of the Mosaic law, and in its consecration under a holier form, did He enjoin any innovation in the social scheme. He provided ample means for the emancipation of his creatures from the spiritual bondage; but nowhere did He proclaim the abolition of legal or domestic slavery. He drew closer the family tie—stripped the husband of much of his irresponsible authority, and raised woman up in the scale of social influence. He inculcated good works on all—each in his degree, and enjoined purity of life and respect for the fraternal authority and the conjugal bond. This, and more, He has left to us as memorials of a mission still spreading through the civilized and uncivilized world. But I ask to be pointed to the record, where He gave one word of mandate, where He uttered one syllable of reprobation regarding the relations of master and slave—relations recognized by the Government under which His Gospel and its precepts were dispensed. It is, on the contrary, a singular and noteworthy fact that He universally abstained from any reproving allusion to them. He talked to the doctors and of the doctors, never loath to wrest the law to their own purposes, whether clad in the Jewish gabardine, or the New England cloak. He talked to Pharisees, and of the Pharisees, whose self-righteousness has lost no presumption by grafting on the Puritan stock. He talked to hypocrites, and of hypocrites, whose unbroken lineage has run through time, and conquered space from the shores of Genesareth to the base of Plymouth rock. But I call for the allegation of a single instance, when, in the midst of Galilee, a conquered Jewish province, ruled by a Roman procurator, with slavery existing under the Mosaic law, and slavery existing under the heathen law, He once spoke to slaves or against slavery. I find, on the other hand, that, on His entrance into Capernaum, he heals the slave of the centurion, and has no rebuke for slavery, but praises for the officer's faith.*

No, sir, nothing of condemnation, nothing of even reproof from the Savior's lips, for the "vile wretch,"—the "man stealer;" who, according to the approved Yankee formula, "held his brother man in bondage." If ever, Mr. Chairman, an opportunity was offered to stamp with reprobation, this lately devised curse, and ungodliness of slavery, surely this healing of the centurion's slave held out that most golden opportunity. Had one of our pious go-betweens—one of our religious brokers here upon earth—but stood next to the Savior, and found the chance of whispering his puritanic suggestion, well might He have said to the Roman officer: "you profess that this slave is 'endeared to you,' and yet you keep him in bondage against my Father's law and mine. You have appealed to the power which He gave to me to raise him up from his bed of palsy, and I have raised him up without money and without price; will you not alike evince your acknowledgment of my ministry, and your affection for your slave, and restore him to that freedom, of which you deprived him, in defiance of nature, of man, and of God?" No, sir; wrapped in His own imperscrutable knowledge of all things—unaided even by the lights of our modern improvers, not a word of rebuke, not one of remonstrance, passes His Divine lips, but instead, come the words of eulogy, that set up the soldier as a pattern for Israel, whilst the right of the master and the protection of the slave are sanctioned in the faith of the believer. It is vain for these godly expounders of ours to speculate upon ignorance, or rely on fanaticism to distort the teachings of Christ to the support of their interested, malicious, and selfish crusade against an institution devised by the will of God, and accepted by the law of man. In the words of the Pretor, sir, non ita scriptum legis carmen—this is not the sacramental language of either the Divine law, or of Him who expounded its precepts. In the multitude of subjects upon which He discoursed with His disciples, you find no mention of slavery; in matters upon which He gave them instruction and charge, never did He breathe the name of slave except in the frequent use which He makes of the relations between master and slave to illustrate those between God and His creatures.

I therefore challenge our detractors to point out to us where He condemned slavery, or denounced the master who owned the slave. In what passage of His conferences with His disciples? In what line of His preachings to the multitudes? In what word of His mandates to His apostles, and in what last injunction, when He laid in their hands the destinies, not only of the world, but the destinies of the hereafter also of that world? On the contrary, sir, you find Him recognizing all the obligations of the social scheme in the midst of which He lived, and moved; and taught all of them, down to the payment of tribute to Cæsar, recurring even to His power of miracle to provide the means of its payment. He recognizes all the subordinations of political life, and among these He specially recognizes the subjection of the slave to the master, when, warning His followers of the duty of faith in Him, He expressly enforces His admonition by the dictum that "the disciple is not above his teacher, nor the slave (it is δουλος in the original text) above his master." In His foresight of the influence of His mission on all the relations of heathen life, He tells His disciples that He has come to set the father against the son, the daughter against the mother, the friend against the friend. But I nowhere find that He told them that He had come to overthrow the standing order of things, that He had come to stir the untutored passions of the slave, to break the tie that bound him to his master, and set him up against his lawful authority. In that Divine foresight of the dissensions which the adoption of His creed by some, and its rejection by others, would introduce in the family and the State, He told His disciples He had come to bring, not peace but the sword. But, sir, I am yet to find that He ever commended that sword to the hand of the slave, with the invitation—nay, with the injunction—to sheath it in the master's throat. If there be a record of it, it must be in some precepts of the "anti-slavery god," and written down in some edition of the "anti-slavery bible," which northern fanatics have created for their rule of faith. To the chapters of that bible of intrusive, meddlesome, and ever dissatisfied contrivers of isms, was reserved the high privilege of correcting the laches of the Savior, and of putting, in His holy name, the torch and the knife in the hands of our slaves—pointing the former to our roofs, and the latter to our throats.

Well, sir, if the Savior did not reprove, nay, did not even mention legal or domestic slavery; if He left no instructions and no charge to His disciples touching either its abolition or its sinfulness, let us see whether those disciples did not, upon the organization of the visible Church, and its entwining with the offices of a new form of society, either from their own authority, or from that of their Master, denounce the institution. Open the book of eternal truth, and you will find that in His teachings He never went beyond the race of Abraham.

To them the promise had been made, and to them He came in its fulfillment. When, therefore, He had revealed himself in the form of humanity; when He had forced upon them the testimony of His mission, and of His power, by a concordance with prophecy, and by His working of miracles; when, in the prospect of His death, which He knew to be impending, He gave the last of His charges to His immediate followers; among them was the injunction to preach the Gospel to all the nations of the earth. In the discharge of their duty, that Gospel they did preach, and preached it as its precepts had been orally delivered to them. If, then, in His mandates He had enjoined them against slavery, or if, by virtue of some grant of power not recorded, and which might have been made to them, they had found anything contrary to His instructions and His charge, in the fact and usage of slavery, unquestionably would they have recorded the fact in His Gospel of truth; unquestionably would they have raised their voice against the continuance of an institution of which they knew God Himself to have been the founder, and warning a slave not to obey a master who had neither religious nor legal right over him; unquestionably would they have rebuked, or rather condemned the master, not merely for claiming obedience, but for holding his "brother man" in that condition which demanded obedience. Now, sir, we find nothing of the kind. As their Master had abstained in the case of the centurion, so they abstained in the general fact of relations between master and slave. Against this no contrivance of malice and no refinement of sophistry can avail. The Savior taught for a period of nearly three years, and of these teachings He left no record written by Himself. The task of embodying them in what we now know as the canon of the New Testament, devolved upon His ministers. As they received so must they have handed down to us. Now, sir, nowhere will you find slavery mentioned by them as an abomination and a sin. They have not so handed it down to us; they therefore did not thus receive it from the Savior's lips. But if not thus laid down, either from the oral declarations of the Savior or the written record of His words, slavery cannot, therefore, without perversion, be called an abomination and a sin. And yet we are seriously told, within the last three weeks we have heard it sanctimoniously repeated, that slavery is a damning sin against the Divine law; a hot-bed of corruption, tainting everything within its atmosphere; everything, even to the most sacred relations of the domestic circle. Whence, would I ask, do those kind men of the North, who are not touched by the blight or cursed by the sin of slavery, derive their peculiar contributions to the stock of morality? From what quarter of this Confederacy, under what state of morals, come those daily and hourly revelations of crime which appal the country, and blur its history with the darkest record of social corruption and social guilt? Why, sir, from the pure, saintly, and immaculate regions of the land not tainted by this abomination of slavery! There the most complicated theory of crime finds the meet representative, often the ready agent to carry it into practice; and this not in the sentina Reipublicæ; not in the drains and sewers which swelter with immorality and vice, but in the high places of society, where the corruption and the vice—not begotten by our curse of slavery, nor induced by the influence of its blight—move and live unpunished and unchecked. It were barely doing justice to the better claims of our section to institute comparison between the morality of the South and North. The very slaves whom they hold up to us as reacting causes of corruption, in retribution of the condition in which the law of man and of God has placed them, might well challenge comparison with any laboring class, nor shrink from their standard, whether in the moral or religious scale.

*Once, for all, the fact is mentioned that, in Greek, ἀνδράποδον is a slave by captivity in war; δουλος, a slave by birth; οὐράκιον, a servant, a Yankee "help;" οἰκέτης, a domestic, whether menial or servile; and lastly μισθωτός, one that serves for wages or pay. The word "servant," as a version of δουλος, in King James's translation, is a refinement of language; for δουλος means "slave" and nothing but slave, so born.

Origin of Slavery—Mr. Keitt.

The old law, sir, admitted the slave to a participation in the rites of the Jewish temple, but it did not relieve him from the obligation of bondage which it had itself imposed. Our usage, accepting the law that institutes the slave, allows him to benefit by all the dispensations of the Christian Church. The initiatory rite which was administered to him in the peculiar form of the Jewish creed, is now administered to him in the waters of baptism, which is the Christian substitute for the Hebrew "sign." The partaking by him of the ordinance of the Passover, which was the great Jewish remembrancer, is among us extended to him in the Christian communion which supplanted the Jewish type. In one word, and for all that our systematic traducers may utter in falsehood, the marriage rite is free to the race, wherever their inclination or choice may tend. Indeed, sir, I do not know, that, even among our blacks, the bond is not held in greater sacredness than it has sometimes seemed to be among their betters at the North; for, unless I greatly err, the docket of more than one free State bear witness to the zeal with which some, at least, of our white reverend friends practically comment the precept, "Whom God hath joined, let no man put asunder." My high regard for the virtues of the sex forbids the supposition that the wives of our meek and charitable parsons can justify applications to courts of justice for human decrees to reverse the Divine injunction, and make twain what marriage has made "one flesh." I am compelled, therefore, to think that, useful as these reverend lords may be to foster domestic agitation and kindle civil feuds, they would be but sorry, if not dangerous exemplars, in this respect, for the morality of our black preachers, for such we have among us, who are not yet trained to dexterous evasions of the moral precepts.

But, sir, recrimination is not within the scope of my remarks; and I resume my vindication of the fact and right of slavery on purely religious grounds, and under purely religious authority. I have laid down, sir, that neither from the declarations of the Master, nor from the teachings of the apostles, can slavery, without perversion of both, be called an abomination and a sin. That it is not an abomination is an inconceivable fact, because it was instituted by the Almighty himself, and the institution has remained unrepcaled; that it is not a sin is equally unshaken, because it has been sanctioned by the silence of the Savior, and recognized by His apostles, speaking in His name. I find them in their own record of their acts holding a first council of the Church; I see them, by virtue of the power received from their Head, engaged in debates, and making decisions in matters of faith; I see them, among other acts, after solemn deliberations, repudiating the tenth verse of the seventeenth chapter of Genesis; and this, on essential grounds, because the baptism of water was one of those perfections of the law substituted for the baptism of blood. But in that council, in those acts, I see no reversal, no mention, even, of the forty-sixth verse of the twenty-fifth chapter of Leviticus, which, in the words of God, and with the sanction of His will, makes slavery "a perpetual inheritance" by the precept of a law which the Messiah came to fulfill, not destroy. I go further, and I find that, of the apostles, some, in the discharge of their ministry, confined it to their immediate neighborhood, whilst others traveled into remoter lands in prosecution of their missionary task. Paul was the most zealous and active. Bearing the word to the inhabitants of many provinces, in various countries, he had found them pagans, and he left them Christians in practice and faith. Deeply versed in the law of the covenant, divinely inspired with the spirit of the gospel, not unacquainted with the precepts of the code, he had occasion, in his missions, to approach and decide many of the most intricate questions growing out of the doctrines of the new creed, and the institutes of political society. The conditions of Christianity, embraced by a wife and repudiated by a husband, adopted by a mother and refused by the children, preached to a slave and rejected by the master, suggested new ideas, and startled many scruples in many a mind.

Hence, sir, we find that after he had left them, to pass on to other theaters of action, he is frequently appealed to on some of the most delicate of domestic questions—among them, this poor one of slavery—arising between individuals, who, bound together by the civil law of the land, were severed by religious differences of faith. Well, sir, what lesson does his example supply to the innovators of our holier days? In all cases, with the clearness and precision, which, had he not been an inspired agent, would have marked him as one of the proudest of human intellects, he explains and resolves; he exhorts and enjoins; he permits and forbids. But in no instance on the question of slavery, does he utter one reproving word. As his Master had neither condemned nor rebuked, so he abstains from condemnation and rebuke. As his Master had not disclaimed, so he does not breathe a word against Jewish slavery, consecrated by the law of God; not a word against pagan slavery, sanctioned by the law of the code. The doctrine of the code, sir, on a past occasion, I fully, and I trust unanswerably, explained. The doctrine of the Gospel, as delivered by the Savior on this subject, I think that I have as fully and as unanswerably explained. But, besides the embodiment of precepts in the Gospel, the apostles have left us, in the shape of acts, a record of their ministerial functions, and under the form of epistles, a transcript of their pastoral instructions to the flocks which they had gathered from the various provinces of earth. In those instructions is embraced every variety of questions, social and domestic, which could arise in political societies, infinitely less ramified and complicated than are our systems of polity. To these instructions, therefore, I now proceed to appeal. A reference to the first apostolic council, consigned in the history of the Acts, shows that though various questions of political life had been touched upon, that of slavery did not enter into debate. For such a discussion, sir, the time had, no doubt, not yet come! But it did come, and come teeming with inquiries suggested by the conscience, or urged by the faith of the new converts. Among those was this mysterious question of slavery, the solution of which baffles the most subtle ingenuities of man, for the very reason, perchance, that it is not of his creation and his establishment.

Well, sir, the question came up, and what does the record show? Why, they go to the record of that word which shall not pass away; they scrutinize the rights which it allows; the duties which it prescribes; the obligations which it imposes, and instantly the question is settled in the mind of the Apostle, and the adjustment is uttered, under the spirit of the Divine Master himself. "Servants, (δοῦλοι, slaves,) be obedient to them that are your masters, according to the flesh, with fear and trembling, in singleness of your heart, as unto Christ; not with eye-service, as men-pleasers, but as the servants of Christ, doing the will of God." (Ephesians, chap. vi., verse 5.) And here, sir, will you notice that the inducement, nay, the reason for the obedience of the slave, is, that it is "doing the will of God?" How else could it be, sir? How else, that the Divine Spirit should breathe the words of Divine truth? Had not the will of God been expressed in the original law? Had not that original law established and regulated the conditions of slavery? Had not those conditions been carried out and maintained, when the Savior came with the supplemental law? Had not the Savior, when he proclaimed that supplemental law, declared that its object and essence were "to fulfill—not to destroy?" Did He destroy? Did He mention the portion of the original law which instituted slavery? No, sir; no! Well enough did the Apostle know that He had not. That His Divine lips had been sealed into silence as to an institution which His Father, in His wisdom, had sanctioned, and which He had not, in His eternal council, missioned him to abrogate. Hence, sir, no hesitation, and no doubt; and under the inspired pen of the Apostle, the duty and the obligation are sheerly defined. "Slaves," (I restore the perversions of King James's translators,) "slaves—δοῦλοι—be obedient to them that are your masters; doing the will of God."

But this question of slavery, under the dispensation of the Gospel, was one which touched every man at almost every point of his existence. Unlike our pragmatic advisers of the North—whose forefathers, by a decision of their Supreme Court, blundered into an abolition of slavery, and therefore can have but an intrusive concern in this question—the Ephesians owned slaves in their midst; and hence their anxiety to reconcile their municipal rights with their religious obligations. But this anxiety was not experienced in Ephesus alone. Wherever slavery was found, and the master, or the slave, a convert to the new creed, these very questions of faith and scruples of conscience arose. Hence you find the Colossians, to whom the light of the Gospel had been dispensed; who claimed the honor of founding one of the seven primitive churches in Asia; the depositaries of the faith in its earlier purity, also appealing to the apostle on this all-pervading question of slavery, which touched them in their dearest social and religious interests. As it was settled for the Ephesians, so was it settled for the Colossians. Slaves obey, &c. The mandate is peremptory; it is one of obedience to the master, and it implies his right to enforce it. It settles, therefore, the right of the master in the tenure of the slave, within the limitations which the Apostle assigns, and which the statutes of the land have, in some form, recognized. And here it strikes me that the injunction of the Apostle is, that the slave shall "bide the ordinance of God" in singleness of heart. How long would that condition continue to exist, did those who have taken upon themselves the patronage of the temporal and spiritual welfare of our slaves, possess the power and the authority to carry out their very philanthropic schemes? Why, sir, that very "singleness of heart," which is the appanage of our slaves, they madly, ruthlessly, seek to destroy, or pervert into an instrument of baleful malice. They preach rebellion, too, to the slave against the master, whom the law and the will of God have placed over him.

It is well, sir, for the interest as well as the character of the South, that the indefeasible Word of God has spoken a curse on those who preach false gospel, or pervert the precepts of His law. Were any further proof needed of such preaching of the Gospel, and such perversion of the law, I know not where it can be looked for in its most conclusive form, save in the epistle of Paul to his favorite disciple. If no other muniment for the rights of the slaveholder but that one could be found in the canon of Scripture, that alone were amply sufficient to fence them against the assaults of either fanatic or hypocrite. There is authority from the Apostle of the Gentiles, which commends itself with irreversible force and power to the honesty of such of our northern friends as are honest in this question of slavery; and that authority speaks unmistakably in his epistles to Timothy. They embrace a variety of instructions furnished to the missionary in his ministry to the Church of Ephesus. Almost every relation of life the Apostle draws within the purview of his sagacious mind, and makes the subject of his pastoral charges to the young Levite. Among them are those for the "men-stealers," and that northern comity would apply to us; but among them are those also for "liars," and that looks unerringly to some of our good brethren of the North; but in the whole compages of those instructions and charges, I find not a single one against slavery. On the contrary, for fear it would seem that the epistle which he had addressed directly to his flock at Ephesus should have failed to enlighten their minds and pacify their consciences on the question of slavery, the very first words of the last chapter of the former epistle show who are the "men-stealers" and who the "liars;" whether they who hold their slaves under the very tenure of God's will, or they who would lie away the law and the Gospel, which bear witness to that will.

Listen, sir, to the doctrine which the Apostle delivers to Timothy, to teach and proclaim: "Let as many servants (δοῦλοι, slaves) as are under the yoke count their own masters worthy of all honor, that the name of God and his doctrines be not blasphemed."—(1 Timothy, chap. vi., verse 1.) I do not profess to be much versed in the knowledge of exegesis, but if it could ever easily be applied to the meaning of words, it must surely be in this instance of a text which can leave no loop-hole for either quibble or doubt. The very form of the mandate of the Apostle is one of great peculiarity. He not merely tells the slave, in another place, that the master has a right to his obedience, but he also charges Timothy, his vicar at Ephesus, to teach and proclaim that the master is entitled to honor at the hands of the slave. The very words (ἰδίους δεσπότης, their own masters) seem to convey a peculiar import. The slave, as such, is bound to obey him under whose authority he accidentally may be placed. But to his own master, his master whose "perpetual inheritance" he is, he owes the tribute of honor as well as duty and obedience; and this for the reason assigned by the Apostle, that the master is to be counted worthy of such tribute. Now, sir, I ask, unless words so plainly put together can by any possibility lead the mind astray, whether any man can for a moment reasonably admit that that is abominable, that it is sinful, which the Apostle, speaking under the influence of the Holy Spirit, charges his disciple to teach and proclaim as worthy of honor in the master's person? But why should I gloss a text, the words of which speak most eloquently for themselves?

Read the text over, and see whether it be possible for any one to mistake its import and force. The slave, under the yoke of bondage, is bound—not through compulsion, but "in singleness of heart"—to obey his master in the flesh. He is bound not only to obey, but also to honor his master, who is accounted worthy of the honor! And why, sir? Lest a contrary conduct, on the part of the slave, shall do violence to the teachings of the Savior, and blaspheme the name of God! Now, who are the perpetrators of sin, and the workers of iniquity? We, who look to the name of God and to His law, for our rights, and abide by the teachings which the Master taught? Or they, who, by insolent repudiations, blaspheme His name, and by false assumption, pervert His doctrines? Let the text answer for the South. To those very conscientious deniers of the olden law, who strive to quibble out of its precepts and abjure its institution of slavery, on the plea that it is effete, I would commend the Epistle of Paul to the Galatians, in which it is written:

"Cursed is every one that continueth not in all things which are written in the book of the law to do them."—Chapter iii, verse 10.

To others, our excellent amenders of the new dispensation, who would foist the sin of slavery in the Gospel-law, I would equally submit the gentle warnings given to their predecessors, the "foolish Galatians:"

"If any man preach any other Gospel unto you than that ye have received, let him be accursed!"

Indeed, sir, I wish our kind friends joy of the pleasant position in which their regard for the welfare, the morality, and the godliness of the South, has placed them before the world. I see them, in the self-seeking of their pride and the perversity of their heart, contrive false and anti-Christian doctrines to delude ignorance and propagate mischief. In their crusade against the slavery institution of the South, I see them, like their compere, the Galatians, compelled to face the twofold horns of the scriptural dilemma. They would discard, in their call for an "anti-slavery Bible," the dispensation of the old law, which, in the word of God, establishes and sanctions the tenure of slaves as a "perpetual inheritance;" and the tenth verse of the epistle peals into their ears:

"Cursed is every one that continueth not in all things which are written in the book of the law to do them."

They would supply the silence of the Savior, or interpolate His Gospel, when they clamor that it condemns slavery; and the ninth verse of the first chapter of the same epistle again meets them with the threat of God's wrath:

"If any man preach any other Gospel unto you than that ye have received, let him be accursed!"

And here, Mr. Chairman, I protest against any misapplication of my remarks, so as to involve in them the whole body of the clergy of the free States. I am free to acknowledge, sir, that they number among their ranks men of whom, either as scholars or divines, any country might justly be proud; men to whose sterling piety and faithful pastorates not even the duty which I owe to a slandered and long-enduring people could induce me to do injustice or to deny the praise. I trust, therefore, that these remarks shall not be understood, as they are not intended for any but those notorious disparagers of sacred functions who draggle the robes of the priesthood in the sloughs of fanatical politics, and pervert the ministrations of their pulpits to dishonor their Master, traduce our people, and convulse our society. To those, sir, I mean my remarks to apply, who are truly the representatives of that dissatisfied, incorrigible race of meddlers which the Religio Laici so aptly illustrates:

"It is but dubbing themselves the saints of God, which it is the interest of their teachers to tell them and their own interest to believe; and after that, they cannot dip into the Bible but one text or another will turn up for their purpose."

Ay, sir, this willful perversion, or convenient manipulation, of texts to their purposes, is a not inapposite illustration of the poetical dictum,

"Caelum non animum mutant qui trans mare currunt."

—a change of climate, but no change of spirit, from good Old England to good New England. With us it seems to have put on all the appearances of a disease of chronic character. The most repulsive of its indications I find in the distortion of the text of St. Paul, in his Epistle to the Galatians, the only one which they could succeed, by such distortions, in tinkering into a condemnation of slavery, against the clear precepts of the Mosaic law, and the no less lucid injunctions of the Apostle's charge. This condemnation of slavery, sir, I find our good friends invariably attempting to contrive, by a perversion of the text of the epistle, in the face of the mandate of the law, and of the teachings of the Savior, through the lips of His Apostle. He, sir, was besieged by questions from those "foolish Galatians" of the East, whom I think I have not wronged by a comparison with our "Galatians" of the North. And, sir, with the tartness—nay, with the fierceness—which we know would sometimes stir the great Apostle, he asks them what spirit of evil has drawn them within its influence? and exclaims:

"There is neither Jew nor Greek; there is neither bond nor free; there is neither male nor female: for ye are all one in Christ Jesus."—Galatians, chap. iv., 28.

Well, sir, what does this mean? And, with its meaning, what does it prove against the direct precepts of the old covenant and the repeated injunction of the new dispensation, both of which recognize the rule of bondage, and settle the relations between the master and the slave? St. Paul, in the act of explaining away the doubts and scruples of his converts, in the sense of the words which he addresses to them, evidently realizes the words of his Divine Master, to show them how noble, liberal, and civilizing, are those spiritual doctrines which overstepped the antagonism of races, disregarded the distinctions of political society, and even overlooked the natural differences of sex, to gather every human infirmity to their solace, and call every human condition to their hopes; to raise up every grade of lowliness to the supernal glories of heaven, and to abate into humility every excess of inordinate pride, even to the very abjections of earth. They were doctrines, sir, which tended to dispel every vestige of what had, up to the time when they were proclaimed, been witnessed in the pagan world—a society of incongruent contrasts! A society of Jews, exclusively claiming for themselves the heavenly promises of God! A society of Greeks, who, though monarchs of the intellect, were shut out from the veriest glimpses of true spiritual life! A society with slaves, who, though reduced to their condition of bondage by the imperscrutable decrees of the Almighty mind, who, though in bonds of the body, under the law of man and of God, had a soul for the promises and the inheritances of the Word! A society of masters, who, themselves initiated into the revelations and the hopes of that Word, refused the communion of its blessings to the slave! A society of males, who, by virtue of the first disobedience and of the primal fall, wielded over woman the unchecked and irresponsible authority of the household! A society of females, who, secluded from all the concerns of life in atonement for the original agency in that fall, and condemned to social inferiority, groaned in solitude, and obeyed the authority.

If the reading of the declaration of the Apostle be not thus—and it is proved to be so by the whole context of the chapter, which looks to the "substance of things hoped for" through the workings of the spirit of faith; proved to be so by a chapter in which opposition is set up between the works of the flesh and the influences of the spirit of faith—then would the exegesis of our religious ideologists, and especially of our Yankee theologians, write St. Paul, the eminently practical man and pointedly keen logician, guilty of the veriest of absurd propositions and untenable doctrines. Jew and Greek, bond and free, male and female, he knew to be living and substantial entities, which no work of his could speak or explain away. He could not mean that the species Jew, or the species Greek, of the human family, could be fused into something that was neither Greek nor Jew. He knew that the inexorable law of races, if not the living entail of blood, protested against the idea of such a thing. He could not mean that the bond and the free could so cohere as to form a neutral third. He knew that the laws of the code, the protection of which he himself had once invoked, and the obligations of which he fully understood, repelled the obliteration of the distinction. He did not mean that man and woman could lay down their peculiar characteristics, and realize the impossible androgynous of Plato, for he was no mean adept in the philosophies of the Grecian school; and both the law of creation, and the intentions of God forbade the dream. Something firmer and truer, therefore, than any Grecian tenet or Platonic dream, he knew to be in the declaration of the Book, "male and female made he them;" and he equally knew that he had received no authority and no power to undo the work of the Almighty hand. What he meant, and what is evident from the words of his lips, is, that fusion and absorption in Christ, which belongs to a "kingdom not of this earth;" but no change, even the slightest, in the various relations of life, which were sanctioned by the spiritual teachings of his Master, and controlled by the temporal laws under which he lived and taught.

Have I, Mr. Chairman, committed the same wrong with which I charge these traducers of the South? Have I suppressed anything? have I distorted anything? have I misapplied anything, which the law of man, or, higher still, the law of God, has written down in relation to this misunderstood or perverted question of slavery? Have I not, sir, shown that they of the North, who have causelessly taken up this question of slavery—what have they to do, sir, with a sin which does not attach to their skirts?—have I not shown, sir, that they cannot make slavery the subject of their denunciations and falsehoods without desecration of the law of God and falsification of the precepts of His Gospel? Under what conditions stand we now under which the same New England has not stood? As ourselves now, New England, the whole of New England, once bought, sold, and held slaves. Having, within the last seventy-five years, had slaves as general adjuncts of their communities, the possession of slaves must have then been deemed no violation of the law of God, which they now charitably impute to the South.

But, sir, from the moment that their slaves were emancipated, or from the moment when, from what cause soever, they ceased to have any upon whom to exercise the scruples of their conscience or force the blessings of their religion, they dipped into that repository of texts to which Dryden adverts, and they discovered that slavery is a godless abomination and a heinous crime. Having no slaves of their own, they immediately, under the auspices of Old England hypocrites, who boast of no mean representatives in New England, turned to the South to apply their late discovered Gospel doctrine of the abomination and sinfulness of slavery. Sir, sir, will these people compel us to believe that they are fools as well as hypocrites? What! they who were the special saints and agents of God in the motherland; they who, driven away from Old England through the marshes of Holland, to the eternal Plymouth Rock, to become the saints and agents of God in New England, upon this continent, where, unless I mistake, God had made a lodgment some century and a half before their fathers' ears had been cropped and their fathers' tongues had been slit, at the tithings and market-places of the land over the waters, for their headstrong, pragmatic, and meddlesome intrusions, which we of the South are not spared at the hands of their descendants! What! they who claimed to be the depositaries and the custodians of both new and old covenant snatched away from the "scarlet woman and the man of sin;" they who claimed to be the saints by excellence, and the expounders, ex professo, of the true doctrines of the Gospel of Christ; they, with the pretended condemnations of that Gospel pressing upon their consciences and their souls, remained with slavery in their midst as a constant general fact and right recognized by Church and State, without their consciousness of its violation of the Gospel law with which we of the South are charged at the eleventh hour of these godly workers in the vineyard of the Lord! Why, sir, not satisfied with holding and maintaining slavery in their midst, not satisfied with owning slaves themselves—though, with us, they are pleased to call it violation of the law of God—they must even look for accomplices in the violation of that law; and, sending their ships over the oceans, go in quest of slaves, to import them, and to sell them where they were wanted, or where they had not yet been introduced. Would they, Mr. Chairman, have us understand that their fathers, not we, are the "men-stealers" and dealers in human flesh? Or else, would they have us, in order to save the memory of those impeccable "Puritan fathers" from the deep damnation of being the original patentees of anti-Christian slavery, believe that those worthies, with all their claims to sanctimonious purity and evangelical grace, were but dolts, who had not yet groped their way over the threshold of the New Jerusalem which their descendants have since reared? That their fathers were as guiltless of knowledge of the Scriptures, especially in regard of slavery, as they themselves are of the precepts of God and the sanctities of truth? Would they have us believe, in one word, that to them, and to their brighter lights, kindled at the shrines of Exeter Hall, was reserved, once for all, the signal privilege of correcting all the unseemly errors of the inconvenient law of God?

Is the South, sir, to be damned into a change of its institutions by virtue of pseudo-Scriptures, edited with notes, and exegeses tacked to them by Yankee exponents of bogus Gospel law? Sir, there is a promise of the Master, "My word shall not pass away," which sustains our hopes through all these assaults of prejudice wedded to malevolence. Indeed, Mr. Chairman, I am even now afraid that this malevolence of our slanderers may have compelled me to be, in some measure, unjust to them in the bearing of my remarks. I am afraid, at least, sir, that the persistent calumnies, studiously contrived, and as zealously disseminated against us by our northern friends, may have led me to disparage some of their merits, or to withhold much of the acknowledgment of their deserts. I find, sir, one thing which I had overlooked. Like us, sir, I find that, in one respect at least, they are conscientious observers of the law of God in this question of slavery. That law, Mr. Chairman, if I have read it aright, established two species of servitude—the servitude of the children of Israel, and that of the bondmen purchased from the heathens around them. Instead of violating the law, Mr. Chairman, we have adhered to its enactment. We have gone—or rather our more thrifty Yankee brethren have gone for us—to the dark places of this earth—gone to the heathen and inferior races of Africa for our slaves; whilst those who have consented to be "men-stealers" for our uses and our dollars, have also followed, and in their way, the mandate of that law. Some of their menial labor, sir, unless I mistake, is drawn from Israel itself. Their free paupers and vagabonds are, like Joseph, not unfrequently cast "into the pit;" whilst the Simeons, the Zabulons, and the Ashers of godly New England—or American Israel—show themselves nothing loath to chaffer away their white brethren on time to the "Midianite merchantmen."

I claim, Mr. Chairman, that both South and North are obedient to the law of God. We of the South, sir, derive our slaves from the very regions which the Lord has designed. They of the North have no particular aversion, now and then, to manufacture a few out of their own kindred and blood. But here much of the similitude must cease. You, and I, Mr. Chairman, know of more than one instance in which, when freedom was extended to the slave as a reward for faithful services, the gift was declined; the beneficiary has preferred to remain in bondage under the roof where he had grown, perchance, with the master and the children around him. Yet I think that you and I, sir, have yet to learn that any of the sold white slaves of the North has ever shown himself so much in love with the "peculiar institution" of that North, as to refuse the boon of freedom when his period of involuntary servitude had expired, much less to offer remaining under the salutary blessings of this Yankee pattern of white, Christian slavery!

Thus sir, have I traced, and, I think, not unfairly, the law as delivered by our Savior, and as applied by His Apostles. In either form, Mr. Chairman, it is plain and unmistakable. Into the supposed tendencies of its doctrines it is not my business to inquire, nor yet to look into what channels of action they may have been forced by the errors of human judgment or the warpings of fanatical passions. I am satisfied to take that law as it reads, and to stand by what it allows or forbids in its relation to slavery. The Constitution of the United States, sir, by the essence of creation, by its reservation of the rights of the States, recognizes the sovereignty of those States, whilst it discards the idea of a supreme authority. This, sir, is an essence of our organic law. Yet, sir, is there a soundly-thinking statesman but will admit that, by the contrivance of tendencies, by the process of construction, and by the fatality of precedents, it is not rapidly putting on, if it have not already put on, all the substantial forms of a consolidated government? Even so, sir, with the institutes of Christianity. The theory of tendencies has been developed so far beyond the intents of the law-giver that the result of man's speculations have been grafted upon his statute as parts of the law itself. It is under this mania of tendencies, not the spirit of truth, that the modern improvers of a Divine code have, from the height of their perverted pulpits, and from the bosom of their unholy conventicles, been shrieking their denunciations of slavery as a sin and a curse, laid at the door of the South. The law, sir, as given out by its founder, will hold in the hollow of the hand. Its precepts are written with the perspicuity of the light which blazes on the frontlet of the stars. I read the law, I ponder its precepts, and I find nothing in it against slavery, but what the hands of man would wickedly interpolate under the convenient guise of tendency. The law of God, Mr. Chairman, is an equation, full and complete, made up of the modern dispensation and the old covenant. They are both results of Divine counsels and exponents of Divine truth. You cannot touch any of its elements, you cannot add to or subtract from either of the terms without vitiating the result. The curse is upon those who would do so. Did I require any proof of the subsistence of that law and of the verity of the Book in which it is written, I would find it in the character of the awfully terrible language in which the penalties of infraction are written out in every variety of form and for every vicissitude of time. It is not the growth of human thought, nor yet the expression of human speech. It has the unmistakable stamp of Divine conception and Divine utterance.

Save where it has pleased the Maker to modify it, it stands as the expression of His unchanged will. It rings, as it has rung through the lapse of ages. It speaks, as it has spoken across the chasms of revolutions, above the tramp of generations steadily treading on their pilgrimage to the grave; it speaks, even now, with the most appalling denunciations which it may be given to the mind of man to conceive. It is useless for our politico-religious theologians to shriek out, "old dispensation and old law; it had its time, and it has passed away for a better and a higher law." What, sir, higher and better law coming from God? This is impious, sir, beyond utterance. This is lending to unerring wisdom the failings and imperfections of the human mind. Man may grope away at higher and better laws; but God intuitively and ever wills the highest and the best.

I admit, sir, the fulfilling law; but I deny, from pole to pole, that that which was fulfilled has passed away! It is still living, and in our midst, touching us at every point of our existence, absorbed through every fiber of our legislations and codes. Some of the minor regulations of the civil and religious law may have been dropped—some ritual ceremonies and external forms, adapted to other purposes, may have lapsed with the changes of circumstances and of time; but the law which, deny it as they may, contains the recognition of slavery, and; therefore, the rights of the South, is a living, binding law. It is the handbook of our duties and the sum of our hopes; it is the moral law, which the Savior has perfected; and that cannot pass away, because the moral law, like God himself, is an eternal essence!

ADMISSION OF KANSAS.

SPEECH OF HON. C. J. GILMAN,

OF MAINE,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

May 24, 1858.

The House being in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. GILMAN said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: The President of the United States sent a message to Congress, on the 2d day of February last, with this statement: that Kansas was as much a slave State as Georgia or South Carolina. It was then taken for granted, as a proposition self-evident, that there would be no violent opposition, on the part of northern Democrats, to the admission of Kansas as a State into the Union under the Lecompton constitution. It was anticipated that there would be an apparent reluctance at once and with facility to take the Lecompton dose. Shrewd politicians in the House, in the Senate, and in the Cabinet, know how to touch the weak points of northern Democrats. They know how to remove scruples and doubts from the minds of their northern associates. They have been successful in this kind of diplomacy heretofore. Some of them have grown gray in the service. They well knew, during the past half century, how often northern men had yielded to southern solicitation, southern arts, and southern manipulation. They know full well that heretofore, measures, sectional, obnoxious, involving in danger and doubt the peace and welfare of the country, had been sanctioned by northern votes secured by southern agency. The President, therefore, with a confidence of success, presented the Lecompton fraud; and early in the session it became evident that members from New England and the middle States were ready and willing to vote for a measure most offensive in its nature to the feelings and sentiments of their constituents.

But it was early discovered that more northern votes were wanted. Week after week elapsed; month after month. Who will write the history of these weeks and months? The record of Congress, the public proceedings, can be read by all. The secret plotting, the silent and insidious proceedings of these memorable weeks and months, may not be portrayed to the public eye. Finally it became evident that the Administration, with all its power and with all its patronage, could not induce a few northern Democrats to succumb. These few Democrats had manfully resisted the persuasion of the pro-slavery leaders. There had been too many test votes. To have abandoned their position after making such a record would have indicated a glaring want of principle and consistency. The intelligent mind of the country seemed to be convinced that the Administration would be overwhelmed with defeat. So much firmness on the part of northern Democrats called forth expressions of approbation and admiration throughout the country. The Crittenden-Montgomery bill passed the House, approved by Republicans, Americans, and Democrats; a measure approved by northern and southern members; a measure fraught with peace and good will to Kansas; and its passage in the House was hailed with pleasure and delight by the people of the United States. The Senate refused to sanction the bill. The House voted to adhere. At last it became evident to the House, and to those who have the confidence of the Administration, that the Lecompton swindle could not be supported by a majority of the members of the House of Representatives. Some other scheme must be devised—something that will save the honor and pride of the South and will satisfy enough of the northern Democrats to insure success.

It had been said by southern gentlemen that if Kansas were not admitted under the Lecompton constitution, the South would resort to extreme measures. The dissolution of the Union was threatened. Sentiments were uttered well calculated to excite terror and alarm in minds unaccustomed to vehemence of manner and high-sounding declamation—sentiments that might disturb the equanimity of those who do not know and do not believe that the Union of the States is the security and protection of slavery. The dark, dismal, and murky cloud of disunion rose before us. Not one of the ninety-two Republicans lost the possession of his faculties; the South Americans were composed; the Douglas Democrats were calm and tranquil; the Lecompton monster was slain; southern members did not abandon their seats. In no southern State was the flag of disunion raised. But, sir, if something had not been done to relieve the pro-slavery leaders from a most disagreeable dilemma, and the Administration from disgrace, how could the southern members go back to their constituents with any hope of their approbation and support? James Buchanan, President of the United States, presented a constitution to the House of Representatives, which he knew to be a fraud. He had brought down disgrace upon himself, upon his Administration, upon the Republic, by this base attempt to impose upon the people of Kansas a constitution which they spurned and hated—a constitution presented at Lecompton by men who had no higher sense of duty and justice than to uphold and sustain murderers of innocent citizens and destroyers of property, without cause or provocation. The President of the United States must be preserved from a lower depth of disgrace. His deep-laid plots, his ingenious plans, the skill, the dexterity of his officials in Kansas, availed nothing. The crimes, the outrages, committed under the sanction of law, availed nothing. The Lecompton monster was slain. A majority of the House of Representatives, through weeks and months, withstood the pressure and policy of the Administration, and resolutely and repeatedly refused to insult and degrade the people of a Territory, whose only crime had been that they preferred a constitution for freedom rather than for slavery. Resolutely and nobly did the majority refuse to present to the intelligent but abused people of Kansas the terrible issue of lasting disgrace or revolutionary resistance. The Lecompton monster was slain. The desire and purpose of the President to create civil discord, to impose slavery upon an unwilling and reluctant people, was not satisfied. Executive power, so potent, so liable to be exerted beyond constitutional limits, could not compel the House to sanction a crime and call it a constitution. Members from slave States, with all the risks and hazards to which they were exposed, gave their votes and their influence to uphold the honor of the Republic, to save the Territory of Kansas from the horrors of civil war, and the Union from calamities which threatened to befall it. No man can attribute unworthy or unpatriotic motives to such men. With a full sense of responsibility both to their constituents and the country, they gave their votes and voice to vindicate the rights of American freemen. This rebuke from slave States was more keenly felt by the President than any and all opposition from the North. Estimating other men by his own standard, he had conceived that any measure, how base soever it might be, would readily be accepted by the southern mind; that his devotion to the South, illustrated by a capricious political career, would not be questioned; that his willingness to use and abuse his power and position to uphold a sectional policy, would naturally induce a unanimous southern support.

The President did not imagine that any southern member, unaffected by geographical position, could take a clear and comprehensive view of the relations of the whole country; could so demean himself on this floor that his own constituents would sustain him, and honorable men everywhere applaud and admire his independence and manliness. This blow from the South fell with great force upon the Administration; it annihilated the Lecompton monster. Grave Senators from the South and Senators from the North, southern Representatives and northern Representatives, whose highest aspiration seems to be to render themselves more obnoxious to their constituents, to impose upon an unoffending people a measure fraught with danger to the peace and welfare of the country—a measure sustained by traitors to their country and the enemies of free institutions; traitors who have been upheld by the Army of the United States; by the patronage of the past and present Administration; Grave Senators, I say, distinguished members of this House, assembled to devise a new scheme that would save the Hunker or Buchanan party from disintegration or dissolution. It would be impossible and even improper to portray too vividly the different scenes and the appearance of the different actors.

To a favored few is known all that transpired beneath the roof of the White House. It is not difficult to imagine what transpired there. The satchels of the party, with elongated visages, and the President, whose countenance, as Byron hath it, "was a tablet of unutterable thoughts," were without doubt assembled. And had the President expressed himself in a truthful manner, he could with propriety have said: "I, James Buchanan, have done all that I could do to cheat the people of Kansas out of their rights and privileges? I have sent to the House of Representatives the Lecompton swindle, a gigantic fraud, gentlemen, which, had it been approved by the House, would have done more than anything that I can conceive or suggest to degrade American labor, to tarnish the honor of the Republic, and to involve the Government in disgrace before the civilized world; but the House, a most obstinate, inflexible, and incorrigible body, will not take this Lecompton dose. Now, ye gentlemen who love slavery more than you love liberty, ye men whose conception of the growth and grandeur of the Republic is derived from the servility and degradation of the African, come forward and give us a plan. Give us the scheme to preserve the unity and indivisibility of the pro-slavery party. This party, which we all love so tenderly, so deeply, and which we all worship with a more than oriental devotion, must be preserved. By this Democratic organization we have done much to cripple the industry of the free States. Much have we done to enable British capital and British power to control American markets, and to enervate the arm of American labor. By this Democratic organization we have given direction to the disposition and sale of the public lands, and through the land offices of the western country have enabled prominent men of our party to accumulate immense fortunes. By controlling the Government we have been able to maintain a sectional policy; to array the North against the South; and by the timely aid of the Supreme Court have established the doctrine that the rights and privileges of a human being are to be acknowledged and determined, not according to the self-evident truths of the human mind, not according to those qualities and faculties which distinguish man from the brute, but according to color. If a man is very black he is not a citizen, and has no rights. If a man is very white he can enjoy all that is comprehended in American citizenship. Look ye out, gentlemen, upon the vast southern domain, and behold what has been done for the South by the accretion of new territory! Behold a vast area consecrated to African slavery! Consider, too, what political advantages you have derived from territorial aggrandizement. The creation of slave States has given to you the sway in the Senate. The Senate can appropriate money without limit. The Senate controls the Treasury. The Senate can add millions to appropriation bills. The House can add nothing to an appropriation bill not provided by law. The Senate is under your control, and it generally has been; and if you would realize your schemes of southern expansion, absorption, and accretion, your dreams of a southern confederacy, then you must retain a pro-slavery sway in the Senate. If you would have a balance of power, you must have that sway. The sentiment of the civilized world is against you. All those great agencies which have done so much to supplant physical energies or muscular power, give to freedom an advantage over slavery, enable free men to move with great rapidity and great facility; and, unless you are on the alert, will enable free men to occupy the Territories of the Republic, and adorn them with all the arts of civilized and enlightened communities. Let us, then, have the scheme that will save the Democratic party from dissolution, and enable the southern States to control the Treasury of the Republic." The conference bill is produced; and the satchels of the party, after a severe debate and a thorough examination, determine to take the dose and also to commend it to the lips of such Douglas Democrats as would abandon the bold and manly position which they had pledged themselves to maintain.

I will now present, for the consideration of the House, my views in relation to this wonderful creation of artful politicians—the conference bill. I will not call it the English bill, because it smacks more of Virginia and Georgia than of Indiana. The people of Kansas, on the 4th day of January, 1858, rejected the Lecompton swindle by an overwhelming majority; yet, by the conference bill, you propose to the people of Kansas to accept the swindle or not to enjoy the advantages of a State government until there is a population in the Territory of ninety-three or a hundred and twenty thousand. By what article, or section, or clause, of the Constitution of the United States, can Congress present such an issue as this to the people of Kansas? Where do you find a precedent for such a mode of procedure? Turn to your congressional proceedings; turn to the records of the past; examine the annals of your country. You will search in vain. If the people of Kansas will do that which is repugnant to them; if they will do that which they believe to be dishonorable and unjust; if they will do that which would expose them to the contempt and ridicule of enlightened men; if they will yield up their sense of self-respect and humiliate themselves before the civilized world, and will lick the dirt at the feet of three hundred and fifty-seven thousand slaveholders, then they need not wait until there are ninety-three or one hundred and twenty thousand population, but can at once have a State and live under a constitution which is not of their own creation—a constitution, in all human probability, concocted here, in the city of Washington, and sent out to Kansas to be approved by a convention upheld and supported by United States bayonets.

There is another consideration. It was asserted, in the other wing of the Capitol, by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. GREEN,] by the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. HUNTER,] and in this House by the member from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS,] that the people can have no vote upon the Lecompton swindle. It will be remembered by all present, that the question was submitted to the gentleman from Georgia, and his reply was prompt, and directly to the point. It will be noticed that the bill is very carefully and adroitly and cunningly drawn. It is, in all its features, a foxy production; and, amid all the verbiage and all the periods contained in the five sections, there is but one allusion to the swindle perpetrated at Lecompton. It can be seen in the first section, and here is the language, or extract:

"But, should a majority of the votes cast be for 'proposition rejected, it shall be deemed and held that the people of Kansas do not desire admission into the Union with said constitution under the conditions set forth in said proposition; and in that event the people," &c.

The purpose and the design are evidently to leave the impression on the mind that there is only a submission of a land ordinance. The words "said constitution," however, are entitled to a slight consideration. They have a significance. Let not the people of Kansas be deceived; let them look to the relation of "said constitution" to the language of the preamble. Here is a part of the preamble:

"Whereas, the people of the Territory of Kansas did, by a convention of delegates assembled at Lecompton, on the 7th day of November, 1857, for that purpose, form for themselves a constitution and State government, which constitution is republican," &c.

The mind that conceived the conference bill knew well that the three words "said Lecompton constitution" might awaken disagreeable associations. But "said constitution" are words that might not arrest the attention. But let us be charitable. Certainly it was very kind and considerate to avoid the use of language offensive to an honorable people. The skillful magician was undoubtedly actuated by the most honorable motives. Like a skillful and humane physician, he would prepare a nauseating dose so that it could be administered without disagreeable sensations. Besides, there is a serpent in the grass; it would not be wise for the serpent to hiss to warn the victim, before the venom of his fangs permeates the system. "Whereas the people of the Territory of Kansas did, by a convention of delegates assembled at Lecompton, on the 7th day of November, 1857, for that purpose, form for themselves a constitution and State government," &c., is the language of the preamble.

The people having formed it, there can be no doubt as to its validity, no doubt as to its vitality. There is no other constitution. As the people formed it, there can be no other. It is the only embodiment of the will of the people. The delegates have indicated the will of the people. Kansas is therefore a State, because it has a State government. It will therefore be useless to submit more than a "land ordinance;" and in order to render the ordinance as intelligible as possible, and to give to it form and comeliness, and in order to illustrate the subtlety and legerdemain of its authors, the two words "said constitution" have been placed in the first section. That is indeed a profound statesmanship, and worthy of all admiration, which has induced the authors of the conference bill to inform the ignorant and deluded people of Kansas, that on the 7th day of November, 1857, they did form for themselves a State government; and, in order more deeply to impress them with the fact, to offer four million acres of land.

But there is a consideration which will be urged by those who take another view of the bill, that the people of Kansas must take a pro-slavery constitution with the land bribe, or remain out of the Union. What an insult to an intelligent people! An American Congress has no higher standard of honor or propriety than to offer four million acres of land for a pro-slavery constitution. Grave Senators and enlightened Representatives deem it to be the part of wisdom to bestow four million acres upon forty thousand American freemen, the peers of us all, if they will only become the tools of Executive power and Executive tyranny. Four million acres of land are offered for the degradation and humiliation of a brave and enterprising people. I will, in this connection, make a quotation from the Kansas-Nebraska act, passed in the year 1854:

"It being the true intent and meaning of this act, not to legislate slavery into any Territory or State, nor to exclude it therefrom, but to leave the people thereof perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way," &c.

In 1858, the Congress of the United States declares to the people of Kansas: accept a land ordinance with "said constitution," accept the Lecompton swindle with African slavery, and the President will immediately proclaim that you are a State. This appeal to the cupidity and to the avarice of men, rather than to their judgment and common sense, is, I presume, leaving the people perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way!

In 1856, the delegates of the party termed Democratic, assembled at Cincinnati to form a national platform. Here is a resolution adopted by the convention:

"Resolved, That we recognize the right of the people of all the Territories, including Kansas and Nebraska, acting through the legally and fairly expressed will of a majority of actual residents, and whenever the number of their inhabitants justifies it, to form a constitution, with or without domestic slavery, and be admitted into the Union upon terms of perfect equality with the other States."

Has it not been urged on this floor, with great pertinacity and emphasis, that a body of men, assembled at Lecompton on the 7th of November, 1857, embodied the "legally and fairly expressed will of a majority of actual residents." The Administration is compelled, by this submission of a land ordinance with "said constitution," to acknowledge before the world that the convention of the 7th of November, 1857, was a convention that did not indicate the "will of the actual residents." The Cincinnati resolution will not cover the case; it is not equal to the emergency. The Administration, with all its power and patronage, has endeavored to convince the House that the "Lecompton convention" indicated the "will of a majority, legally and fairly expressed." If it indicates and embodies such a "will," why consent to a submission of a land ordinance with "said constitution?" The Cincinnati platform is repudiated; "the will of the people, legally and fairly expressed," is treated with contempt. And, by its own acknowledgment, the Administration is held responsible for all the frauds and all the villainy perpetrated by the pro-slavery party in Kansas. The Lecompton swindle, undoubtedly concocted in this city, the creature of fraud, of violence, and of Executive authority, "the legally expressed will of a majority," is associated with a land ordinance! What a juxtaposition of ideas; what a heterogeneous combination; what a harmonious relation is presented in the conference bills! What an admirable contrivance to shiver and shatter the Democratic party! What a scheme to expose the Administration to the ridicule and sarcasm of intelligent minds! What an illustration of the degeneracy of the times! What a departure from the policy of the founders of the Government! What a mournful evidence of the decadence of American statesmanship! What an example for the youth of the Republic—that trick and legerdemain are more essential in the administration of public affairs than the exercise of the higher and nobler qualities and faculties of the mind and heart.

But, sir, the Cincinnati convention, by the resolution to which I have referred, acknowledges the right of the people of Kansas "to form a constitution with or without domestic slavery, and be admitted into the Union upon terms of perfect equality with the other States." Now, if the ordinance with "said constitution;" if the bribe and the swindle are accepted; Kansas, by proclamation of the President, becomes a State of the Union, although the population of the Territory does not exceed thirty or forty thousand. If, according to the language of the conference bill, the proposition, or the bribe, is rejected, then—

"The people of said Territory are hereby authorized and empowered to form for themselves a constitution and State government, by the name of the State of Kansas, according to the Federal Constitution. I may elect delegates for that purpose whenever, and not before, it is ascertained, by a census duly and legally taken, that the population of said Territory equals or exceeds the ratio of representation required for a member of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States."

What would be a census "duly and legally taken?" A census taken by an act of the Territorial Legislature at any time; or a census taken by act of Congress at some future period? are questions naturally suggested. But the consideration to which I desire to call the attention of the House is that part of the Cincinnati resolution relating to Kansas, "and be admitted into the Union upon terms of perfect equality with other States." That is, a slave State can be "admitted into the Union upon terms of perfect equality with other States," while a free State can only be admitted "upon terms of perfect" inequality. The people of Kansas can have a State government in 1858, if they will sanction a fraud; if they will not sanction a fraud, they can have no State government in 1858; and here we behold the "plighted faith" of the Cincinnati platform; here we behold the doctrine of "perfect equality" applied, illustrated, and demonstrated in the admission of States. Here we behold the Punic faith of modern Democracy! How long will the American people tolerate the supremacy of a class of men so faithless to their pledges, so capricious in their policy?

There is another feature in the conference bill, the significance of which cannot be overlooked; and that is, the constitution of the board of commissioners:

"Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That, for the purpose of insuring, as far as possible, that the elections authorized by this act may be fair and free, the Governor, United States district attorney, and Secretary of the Territory of Kansas, and the presiding officers of the two branches of the Legislature, namely, the President of the Council, and Speaker of the House of Representatives, are hereby constituted a board of commissioners to carry into effect the provisions of this act, and to use all the means necessary and proper to that end."

Now, it is well known to the House that the Governor, United States attorney, and the Secretary of the Territory, indicate and reflect the will and purpose of the Administration. The President of the Council and the Speaker of the Territorial Assembly represent the sentiment of the people. Here, then, is a majority favorable to the Administration. Compare this second section of the conference bill with the following third section of the Crittenden and Montgomery bill:

"Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That, for the purpose of insuring, as far as possible, that the elections authorized by this act may be fair and free, the Governor and Secretary of the Territory of Kansas, and the presiding officers of the two branches of its Legislature, namely, the President of the Council and Speaker of the House of Representatives, are hereby constituted a board of commissioners to carry into effect the provisions of this act, and to use all the means necessary and proper to that end."

Had the Crittenden bill become a law, there would have been two members of the board representing the Administration, and two representing the people of Kansas. An arrangement so fair, so just, and, I may say, so generous to the Administration, has been rejected by Congress. That class of politicians who proclaimed at Cincinnati, and on the floor of the House of Representatives, the doctrine of "popular sovereignty," the doctrine of non-intervention, and who profess to cherish a policy that will "leave the people perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way," cannot permit the people of Kansas to have a majority of the board of commissioners. The President of the United States, Cabinet officers, shrewd and sagacious politicians, all in the enjoyment of power, and good round salaries, having no feelings in common with those men who endure all the trials and all the labor incident to the settlement of the western wilderness, must still continue to vex and harass that people, who have received nothing from the past and present Administrations but intervention, circumvention, insult, and injury. Another deep game is to be played in Kansas, and a majority of the board of commissioners is essential to "designate and establish such precincts for voting," "to cause polls to be opened at such places," and "to appoint, as judges of election," such men as will best conserve the purpose and design of the central power at Washington. What that purpose and design is, future events will unfold and indicate. The conduct of the Administration in relation to the affairs of Kansas; the consideration that the pro-slavery leaders have so much at stake, so much at hazard, in the decision of the question; so much have the leaders to gain if the majority accept the bribe, and so much to lose if the majority reject the bribe, that no one will be surprised if an apparent majority is found for the acceptance of the bribe.

The history of Kansas presents a dark and dismal picture; but there is no part of the picture more offensive or repulsive than the frauds perpetrated at the ballot-box. Have we not reason to fear, from the organization of the board of commissioners, and from the experience of the past, that if fraudulent returns are wanted, fraudulent returns will be fabricated? The Governor, as a member of the board, and in his official capacity, certifies and proclaims the returns; the President, by the conference bill, has only to proclaim Kansas a State of the Union, the Administration triumphant, the power of the South vindedicated, and innumerable trials inflicted upon that people, whose only crime is that they abhor slavery, and desire to adorn their Territory with the arts of civilization, and the creations of free labor.

If Kansas is made a State by proclamation of the President, what mode or manner will the people adopt to relieve themselves of the incubus of a Lecompton constitution? Suppose the people of that Territory should appeal to an American Senate: what relief could they find there? What response has the Senate already made to their appeals? The Senate has been, and will be, deaf to their entreaties and indifferent to their wrongs. The Supreme Court would not give to them an impartial hearing, but would delight in the imposition of new burdens. Even in this Assembly, which ought to be the guardian of national honor and individual rights, the people of Kansas would meet with a cool reception and tardy justice.

There is another feature of the conference bill which should not be overlooked:

"SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That, in the election hereby authorized, all white male inhabitants of said Territory, over the age of twenty-one years, who possess the qualifications which were required by the laws of said Territory for a legal voter at the last general election for the members of the Territorial Legislature, and none others, shall be allowed to vote."

Now, what was one of the qualifications which "all of the white male inhabitants" possessed who voted for members of the Territorial Legislature in October, 1857? A residence of six months in the Territory prior to the day of election. This qualification, or act establishing such qualification, was repealed by the Legislature elected in October, 1857; and an act in its stead passed the Legislature, and was approved by the Governor, which only requires "three months" residence prior to the day of election. A majority of the members of the board, by the conference bill, determine the day on which the ordinance with "said constitution" is to be submitted to the people. If a majority fix upon a day in July or August next, the entire spring emigration will be disqualified; there will not be a lapse of time sufficient to enable the new Republican recruits to vote. Even if a day in September should be preferred by a majority of the board, but few of "the white male inhabitants" who entered the Territory since the 1st of March could vote. But it was desirable to render the conference bill as palatable as possible, to keep from the eye as many obnoxious features as possible; and the bitter pill had to be sugared over, that it might be swallowed without reluctance, and with manifestations of delight. That great relief was derived from the medicine, there can be no doubt, from the buoyant condition of the patients on that eventful morning when the experience of the distinguished converts was related to the House. But it was exceedingly adroit to cover the qualification of time and residence under the following verbiage:

"Who possess the qualifications which were required by the laws of said Territory for a legal voter at the last general election," &c.

This third section clearly indicates that the Administration desire the number of voters to be as small as possible; the more formidable the numbers the greater the opposition, and the more numerous the difficulties and obstacles that would be encountered. Besides, it is important to have the real vote of the Territory as small as possible, if fraudulent votes are to be used. A small vote contrasted with a large population, considering the nature of the issue, fully illustrates the pure and high-minded motives of that class of men who cherish a devotion so ardent for "popular sovereignty," who entertain a regard so profound for the popular will, that they could only permit those to vote who "possess the qualifications which were required by the laws of the Territory for a legal voter at the last general election for members of the Territorial Legislature." I will call the attention of my Democratic friends to the first resolution of the Cincinnati convention:

"Resolved, That the American Democracy place their trust in the intelligence, the patriotism, and the discriminating justice of the American people."

I will simply suggest that neither the "intelligent" nor "patriotic" people of this country, nor those who "discriminate justly," can comprehend why a residence of six months is essential in order to vote for or against the land ordinance with "said constitution," while the law of the Territory only requires a residence of three months, unless the object to be attained is to deprive the "white male inhabitants" who entered the Territory this spring of the right to vote. The emigrants that entered the Territory this spring with the purpose to settle in the Territory, and who shall have resided three successive months prior to the day of election, would certainly be ardent and desirous and competent to indicate their opinion at the ballot-box upon questions of vital importance; and, among other questions, "whether or not they will disgrace themselves and their country and the cause of freedom by giving their sanction to a land bribe, and an infamous swindle." It has been said in a certain quarter, "if the Lecompton constitution is accepted by the people of Kansas, that out of regard to the people of a sovereign State, the sale of public lands might be postponed." There are various rumors as to the postponement of the sale. How the public domain is to be made subservient to realize the plan of the pro-slavery leaders, time only can determine.

It is well known that many of the settlers on the public lands are at present unable to pay for their sections. It is for the President, and those who are possessed of authority, to say when the lands shall be sold. If the Executive should resort to desperate measures, or present alluring propositions, then let us cherish the hope and confidence that the settlers, the squatters, the "popular sovereigns," will have the moral courage and the power of endurance to meet the emergency in a mode and manner becoming American freemen who know their rights and how to maintain them. They have suffered much; they have endured much; and "there is a point beyond which patience ceases to be a virtue." Whatever may be the decision of the people of Kansas, whether the land bribe is accepted by fair means or by foul means, whether it is reluctantly received or scornfully repelled, the conference bill never will be, and never can be, approved by the American people. It is an insult to the free States; it is a disgrace to the slave States; it is neither a measure of compromise nor of conciliation; it establishes no principle which can command the confidence and regard of the intelligent mind of the Republic. You cannot call it a compromise, because it is a trick; you cannot call it a safe precedent for the future, for the day is not remote when it may be more popular to discriminate in favor of freedom rather than in favor of slavery. It is a fit illustration and exponent of that power which controls the different departments of the Government; it is the creation of minds alike indifferent to the lessons of history and the admonitions of experience; it is the production of men who deem it a matter of small concern to trifle with the feelings, to arouse the indignation of millions of freemen. A boldness and audacity has been manifested by those who introduced and secured the passage of the conference bill, which might well excite our admiration if the bill itself were only commensurate with the magnitude of the question which it is proposed to settle.

If leading men in the Republican party would present the same bold and fearless front in the support of a good cause; the same determined and persistent will in the support of self-evident truths upon which the Government is founded, the day would not be remote when the patronage and power of the Government would pass into other hands, and upon others the administration of public affairs devolve. The consideration, however, which most deeply affects all men who wish well for their country; all men who would preserve the Union of the States; who cherish the hope that the Government may yet be administered in the spirit and sentiment of its founders, is this: that distinguished men, whose genius and power might be so potent to promote the prosperity of the country, and the harmony of the States, seem to take a pleasure and satisfaction in the suggestion and adoption of those measures which tend the most to awaken discordant and belligerent feelings, and to excite sectional animosities; and the more artful and cunning the device the more acceptable it becomes as a measure of public policy. It used to be thought that in the disposition of grave questions of national importance the highest and noblest faculties of the human mind only could be brought into play. It has been lately discovered that statesmanship does not consist in the application of those virtues and those qualities which indicate the higher nature of man.

The cause which has induced this decadence in the character of public men, has given a cast and direction to the policy of the Government during the past half century. Every department of the Government is and has been under its control. Territorial expansion has given to it consideration and power. African slavery is a condition of society in fifteen States, affecting the social and political relations of the States. It is a condition of society which has passed from generation to generation. It is the labor of the South; it is the wealth of the South. It has established a southern character; it was formerly considered by the founders of the Government as a condition of necessity, as an evil that had befallen the South. It is now vindicated and defended as a right founded on principles of justice, sanctioned by Holy Writ, and essential to the welfare and prosperity of the South. The severity with which the peculiar institution has been attacked, has called forth a corresponding emphasis in its defense. Southern men, conscious that they must encounter the opposition of the free States, and, in truth, the opposition of enlightened men throughout the civilized world, have endeavored to render themselves respected by the power that they can exert. A common sense of what they deem a common danger has impelled them to concentrate their efforts to preserve a supremacy in the administration of public affairs.

Freedom can thrive and flourish and advance without the aid of Government. Science, art, and religion, nourish and support it. It is the natural condition of man. As you increase the mastery of mind over matter; as you tame and subdue the great forces of nature and render them subservient to the human will; as you give greater expansion to the realm of thought, so you are giving to the cause of freedom increasing momentum. Freedom wants no compromises and no conferences. It is slavery—that state of society which involves the degradation of one class and the superiority of another class—that invokes the countenance and support of the Government. And the advocates and defenders of the peculiar institution will ever be ready to urge upon the floor of the House and upon the public mind, measures essential to shield and protect it. They will, in time to come, give a tone and direction to the proceedings of Democratic conventions. The pro-slavery leaders will not hesitate to violate the Constitution of the Republic; nor will they be governed by any precedents of the past. Between the slave States and the free States there is a struggle for power; and the pro-slavery party will become more and more desperate as the confidence in their strength diminishes. Doctrines will be advanced on this floor in time to come, as they have been in time past, that partake of the spirit and sentiment of the dark and medieval ages. There will be in time to come, as there has been in time past, the conflict of mind with mind; the antagonism of opinions and principles. Still there is a future for the cause of freedom. African slavery may yet be circumscribed by free institutions. The Republican party in 1860 will be triumphant; the policy of the Republican administration should be to encourage the settlement of the western territory. Let us have, as soon as we can have, a preponderance of representation in the Senate and the House, from free States.

It has been the fortune of the pro-slavery or Democratic leaders to render the Territories and new States subservient to their purposes. Let us cherish the hope that the next Republican Administration will not only maintain a liberal territorial policy, but will also encourage and facilitate the creation of new States. When southern men and northern doughfaces become satisfied that slavery cannot be extended on this continent, then, and not until then, can the development of the material resources of the country receive that consideration to which they are entitled. The attention of the American people cannot be diverted from the issue presented by the pro-slavery party; and not until that party is overwhelmed with defeat will it avail anything to commend to an Soldiers of 1812—Mr. Maynard.

HO. OF REPS.

American Congress a broad and comprehensive policy worthy of a great Republic, and of an enlightened age. A great battle is to be fought, and a great victory to be won. There will be no rush of adverse battalions, nor the booming of artillery; nor will there be seen the "pomp and circumstance" of war. The victory will be noiseless and sublime. The rapid increase of population, the superior mobility of the free race, the emigration of the Old World, and the emigration of the New World, the steam-engine, and that power which flashes thought from mind to mind, are considerations that the slave power must encounter on this continent. Who will cherish a doubt as to the result? What reflecting mind cannot discern in the future a complete vindication of those great principles which impelled the heroes of the Revolution, and the founders of the Government? The intelligence of the age is on the side of freedom; and so is the moral power of the age.

SOLDIERS OF 1812.

SPEECH OF HON. H. MAYNARD, OF TENNESSEE,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
May 24, 1858.

The House being in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. MAYNARD said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: There is a bill before the committee in which those whom I have the honor to represent on this floor feel a much deeper interest than they do either in the Kansas or Minnesota bill; and to that bill I propose to address myself for a short time. I refer to the bill providing pensions to the soldiers of the war of 1812. As the position of that bill is such in the committee that it may be difficult for me to obtain the floor when the bill shall again be considered, to present to the committee the views I entertain upon the subject, I have sought this occasion, and adopted this mode, to bring to the notice of the committee an amendment to the bill which is there pending, of which amendment I gave notice on a former day. That amendment, which is in the nature of a substitute, is as follows:

*Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That each of the surviving officers, non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates, who may have been in the military service of the United States, either in the regular Army, State troops, volunteers, or militia, in the conduct and prosecution of any war in which the Government of the United States may have been engaged prior to the 1st day of July, in the year 1818, for a period of six months, or longer, or who may have been engaged in active battle with an enemy in behalf of the United States prior to that date, or who may have been wounded while in the actual service of the United States prior to that date, though not in battle; and each of the officers, non-commissioned officers, and marines, who may have been in the naval service of the United States in the conduct and prosecution of any war in which the Government of the United States may have been engaged for a like period, or who may have been engaged in active battle with an enemy in behalf of the United States; or who may have been wounded while in the actual service of the United States (though not in battle) prior to the same date, shall be authorized to receive, payable semi-annually, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, an amount equal to his full pay in said service according to his rank, but not to exceed in any case the pay of a captain of infantry; such pay to commence from and after the 1st day of July, 1858, and to continue during his natural life; and each of the said officers, non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates, in the military service, and each of the said officers, non-commissioned officers, and marines, in the naval service, who may have served as aforesaid, prior to the date aforesaid, for any period less than six months, shall be authorized to receive in like manner an amount equal to half pay, according to his rank in said service, to commence from and after the 1st day of July, 1858, and to continue during his natural life: Provided, That the benefits of this act shall in nowise extend to any one still in the military or naval service and pay of the United States: And provided, That the benefits of this act shall not extend to any one receiving a pension from the United States by virtue of any law now in force, unless such person shall relinquish all claim to any other pension except such as is granted by this act.*

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That if any such officer, non-commissioned officer, or private, or musician, in the military service of the United States, as aforesaid, or any officer, non-commissioned officer, or marine, in the naval service of the United States, as aforesaid, may have died, or shall hereafter die, leaving a widow surviving him, such widow shall be authorized to receive from the Treasury, in like manner, the same amount of money that her husband, if living, would have been authorized to receive under the provisions of this act, from and after the 1st day of July, 1858, or from and after the decease of her husband, (in case he shall have died after the 1st day of July, 1858,) for and during her natural life.

*Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the moneys granted by this act shall be paid to the several beneficiaries thereof, or to his, her, or their legal attorney, duly authorized agent or attorney, agents or attorneys, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, at such times and places as he may direct; and that the said moneys herein granted shall not be in any way transferable, or liable to attachment, levy, or seizure, by any legal process whatever; nor shall the same be paid to any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, who may have any interest or claim in or to the said or any part thereof, but the same shall go undiminished to the possession of him, her, or them, who, by the provisions of this act, are entitled thereto: Provided, That no one shall receive the benefits of this act until he shall produce satisfactory evidence to the Secretary of the Interior that he or she is entitled to the same according to the provisions of this act, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may see proper, from time to time, to prescribe for the production of testimony.*

Mr. Chairman, this amendment contains the substance of a bill introduced by me at an early period of the session, in the House, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, who have thought proper to report the bill now before this committee; and it embodies my own views of the policy we ought to adopt towards the men who have served the country in her wars, and towards the widows of those of them who have died. It seeks to introduce no new system, but merely to extend the present system—fast becoming obsolete by the death of all of those for whose benefit it was adopted—so as to embrace within its beneficial operation, not only those who fought in the second—and may it prove the last—encounter with Great Britain, but also the soldiers of Wayne, "old mad Anthony," the men who fought with Eaton and Stephen Decatur in the wars with the Barbary Powers, and those who served with Jackson in his celebrated Florida campaign; thus coming down to a period within just forty years from the present time.

No system of governmental policy is better established with the people. It appeals to their sympathies as being generous; it commends itself to their patriotism as being just; it commands their solemn, deliberate judgment, as politic and wise. It is too late in the day to reason about it, as about a new and untried measure, whose operation and effect rest merely on conjecture; it is too late in the day for statesmen to repeat objections made forty years ago by Nathaniel Macon, who, during his public life, if I am not mistaken in his record, rarely voted a dollar to pay, and of course not to pension, the soldier; it is too late in the day to deal in arguments based upon English regal pensions, and Roman popular largesses. These arguments and objections have already been made, and repeated again and again, and have as often been met and refuted. The question is now no longer an open one. Time, the great progenitrix of truth, has settled it, and settled it forever. The pension system is established as a part of our military policy, and must be accepted as such. Indeed, during all the present discussion, I have not heard it seriously assailed. Even the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. CURRY,] whose ungenerous logic carried him quite as far as he who has gone furthest against this measure, did not, I believe, venture to suggest that a single name now on the pension roll should be stricken from it.

The only question for us to consider, is whether we will, by formal legislation, uphold the system, and extend it so as to include within its operation a class of soldiers every way as meritorious as those who now partake of its benefits. The time has now come, when, according to the incorruptible Macon, "as much may be said in favor of the army engaged in the second war of independence," as forty years ago was said about the first. Though he then stood opposed to the adoption of the pension system, I have no doubt, were he now alive to speak, he would say, "since you have established the system, and since I see, contrary to my expectations, that in its operation it is most excellent and benign, not only in cheering and sustaining the veteran soldier now in the twilight of his day, and her, the noble spirit, who fought the battle of life by his side, but also in inspiring with patriotic confidence the youthful soldier, not dragged into the ranks by a press-gang, not the victim of an unrelenting conscription, but leaving field and fireside, and the loved ones there, with even chance that he shall see them no more, and rallying in cheerful obedience to the call of his country; since such are its happy effects, extend its beneficent provisions; remember my gallant compatriots and cotemporaries, the men who served their country with Lawrence, with Perry, with Harrison, and with Jackson." Such, I am sure, would be his language, could he now speak to us. Such is a fair deduction from the words he has left on record, interpreted by the glossary of subsequent events.

One of the very few instructions (if, indeed, it be not the only one,) with which my constituents have thought proper to "trammel the conscience" of their Representative, relates to this subject of pensions. After my election I can say safely that hundreds came to me, and addressing me very often in kind familiarity by my Christian name, said: "Whatever else you do, try and do something for the old soldier." They are a numerous and highly deserving, though, I am sorry to say, in general, a needy class of my constituents. The men who volunteer to do battle for their country are not apt to be of the thrifty, penny-wise class. The rollicking, free-and-easy habits of camp and forest life are not the habits by which estates are accumulated. Hence, where you find an old soldier or an old sailor, you almost always find a poor man. But poverty is not their only nor their greatest misfortune. Disease, broken constitutions, premature decay, mutilated and dismembered bodies, are a portion of their ordinary lot. I am reminded, however, that the law already provides for the invalid soldier. I know the letter of the law does; its practical administration, I am sorry to say, does not. All of us who have had business with the Pension Office—and most of us have, at some time or other—know very well that its affairs have been conducted upon the principle of granting nothing that could be avoided. Whenever a doubt as to a matter of fact was left by the proof, the practice is to give the Government the benefit of the doubt, and refuse, or, in the more delicate phraseology of the office, "suspend" the application; and in matters of legal construction, to adopt that which bears hardest upon the pensioner. The principle which obtains in other cases, in determining other issues between the Government and the citizen, in this is reversed. This course may be necessary for the prevention of frauds, the reason generally assigned for it, though I do not believe it. Fraudulent claimants will prepare their cases in view of departmental rules, so as exactly to "fill the bill." Honest claimants will present such proofs, and only such, as they are able fairly to make, oftentimes not coming up to the requirements of official regulations. The former is allowed; the latter "suspended." It is due to the present officials to add that these remarks are not made with a special reference to them, but rather to the general official usage long since established.

Were it at all important to illustrate the inadequacy of the present invalid pension laws to accomplish the purpose of their enactment, I could easily do so by the citation of many cases, within my personal knowledge, of men who were crippled, or otherwise disabled in the service, as I have good reason to believe; yet all those who once had a personal knowledge of the fact are either dead, or in their dotage, or have removed so far away that it is practically impossible to procure their testimony. Hence they have never thought it worth while to apply for a pension; or if they did, their applications remain "suspended" in the office. A general pension law is the only measure of relief for this class of persons. Moreover, there are many disabled old soldiers, whose disability is the result, not of wounds, nor of any specific instance of suffering; but of exposure, hardship, and privation; withstood, indeed, for many years, by the vigor of an originally good constitution, and until the infirmity of age disclosed the lurking mischief. Of course these men could derive no benefit from the invalid pension laws; nor from any other except a general pension law, making their title to a pension depend upon the fact of their service. This class of old soldiers will be found to be very numerous. War, at best, is, I take it, a very hard business. It makes sad havoc with the soldiers. The gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. CURRY,] in his remarks the other day, left us to infer that the soldiers of the war of 1812 had a rather comfortable time of it than otherwise. He says:

The Triumphs of the Administration—Mr. Purviance.

HO. OF REPS.

"It was a regular war between two independent nations, conducted, for the most part, according to the recognized rules of modern warfare. The soldier, when discharged from service, or before, received his pay in good money, and one hundred and sixty acres of land besides."

My friend certainly takes a very easy view of the subject, though I am afraid it will not be universally considered a very just one. To talk of eight dollars a month as "pay," in the sense of adequate compensation—"a fair day's wages for a fair day's work"—to the man who labors in "the trade of war," as a simple business transaction, is, I suspect, a waste of words. And as to the lands, located at that early day in Illinois and Arkansas, it is a matter of history that in numberless cases they did not yield the soldier as much as Esau got for his birthright. But, sir, I have never looked upon the condition of the soldiers of 1812 as quite as enviable as it appears to the eye of the gentleman from Alabama. I have, unfortunately, perhaps, seen too much of those old men to indulge in such views of their military life. Like the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. CAMPBELL,] I was "in arms" in that war, and from my youth up I have seen a good deal of the soldiers who were engaged in it. My father was one of them. Even now, as in my earlier years, I delight to meet, as I often do, with one of those aged men, and listen to his "oft-told tale," and see him "Weep o'er his wounds, or, tales of sorrows done, Shoulder his crutch and show how fields were won;" sighing, as he concludes, "but things were not then like they are now."

Time would fail me to recount the tenth of the personal narratives that come thronging upon my memory in this connection, each, in itself, a little history, homely in its details, but refuting the idea of much comfort, least of all luxury. Two or three instances I will refer to, even at the risk of being tedious, and violating the proprieties of the place and the time. Said one, "after we had marched through the Indian country for four days without food, and were almost famished, one of our detachment killed a rattlesnake. We stewed it up in a camp-kettle, and then divided out the meat and the broth." Another said that, on a march, they found a cow lying sick, or, in local phrase, "on the lift." They killed her, and appeased their hunger upon the diseased carcase. Another said that he and his companions killed and subsisted as they best could upon crows and other unclean birds. And another, that, one day, one of his company shot an Indian brave, and they prepared his body for food. One mouthful sufficed him; for, hungry as he was, he sickened at the thought of feeding on human flesh. Eight dollars a month even in "good money," and one hundred and sixty acres of Illinois or Arkansas lands, was small compensation for privations like these. Yet these were of the men who fought at the Horseshoe, Emuckfau, and Talladega; who sustained these privations in the very region now represented with such signal ability by the gentleman from Alabama; the bones of whose companions in arms, perchance, may even now fertilize his own plantation. Would it be strange if they should complain that he has turned against them his high mental endowments?

From the many letters that, during this session, I have received in reference to this subject, I beg permission, in this connection, to read an extract from a single one, written by a constituent, a gentleman who was himself in the service, and upon whose statements we may place implicit reliance:

"I served some twenty months, or more, as an officer in the thirty-ninth regiment, commanded by Colonel John Williams. There were two detachments left Knoxville, in the fall of 1814, two companies of the thirty-ninth and three of the twenty-fourth regiment, under the command of Major Francis W. Armstrong. Of the officers belonging to the detachment, numbering about thirty, only three survive. Of those belonging to the two companies of the thirty-ninth, I am the only survivor. I do not think that more than one tenth survive of those who entered the service. I have been conversing with several who were in the service, and they are of the opinion that not more than about one tenth are alive. The privates being more exposed than the officers, fewer privates survive; and my opinion is, that it would be right to place them on the same footing with those who served in the revolutionary war. The war of 1812, with Great Britain, was called the second war of independence, and I know that great suffering was endured in the Creek nation, where I served; and many of the survivors, the largest portion, are very poor, and need this boon to render their declining years comfortable."

After all, the great argument urged against this bill is the money argument. This is not the first time in the history of this Government that this argument has been brought to bear upon the pensioner. During the Presidency of Mr. Van Buren, when his exhausted exchequer suggested the propriety of economy, it occurred to him, in connection with his celebrated appeal "to the sober second thought" of the people, to recommend a curtailment of the list of pensioners, and the extinguishment of a portion of the lights upon our coasts. How this recommendation was met is yet in the recollection of most of us, and might serve as a profitable lesson to those who, with an annual disbursement of $65,000,000, would commence the great work of "economy, retrenchment, and reform," at the expense of the old soldier, taking no heed lest the events of 1840 should repeat themselves in 1860. If the statement of my colleague [Mr. SAVAGE] be correct, as to the entire amount paid to the soldiers in the war of 1812, and also the statement of my correspondent, as to the proportion of those now surviving, then the figures given us by the gentleman from Alabama, must be entirely too large. But large as they are, the country can now better afford to meet them, than in 1818 it could raise the comparatively small sum then accorded to the soldiers of the Revolution.

I shall make no invidious allusions to other expenditures of the Government to show where the knife of retrenchment might be more properly applied. We have only to look around us to see reflected from every side the absurdity, not to say the rank injustice, of deferring the well-founded hopes of the old soldier, and thus making his aged heart sick because it will take a portion, and perhaps a large portion, of the moneys which have of late years been so lavishly expended, I will not undertake to inform the committee how. And I admonish gentlemen to pause before they go to the country, either individually or as exponents of the doctrines of their party, with any such excuse. Let the sum be what it may, we begin with the maximum. The number of recipients will every year be diminished. They are now old men; most of them have passed the limit of three-score years and ten. Their lamps are fast burning out. What we do, to be of any avail, we must do speedily.

I am in favor of amending the present bill, and respectfully submit my amendment to the consideration of the committee. Should they, however, not see proper to adopt it, I shall not make that a pretext to oppose the bill in its present shape. Such a course would be as unwise and as unstatesmanlike as to predicate objections against the whole system upon some trifling imperfections in the present bill. Not what I would, but what I can.

I have no wish, at this late period of the session, to protract debate, still less to introduce topics not strictly germane to the matter in hand. A single thought more, and I shall have done. It refers to the wisdom, the profound policy, of the pension system, in a civil no less than in a military point of view. Every pensioner, with his children and children's children, becomes, in the very nature of things, a steadfast friend of the Government. The justice and gratitude of their country, for honorable service in her cause, endear them to her in all time to come; and since each succeeding year adds so largely to our population, persons who have little knowledge, less sympathy, and no interest, regarding the early struggles and perils of our fathers, it is eminently unwise for the Government to neglect and turn coldly away from them whom the memory of the past, no less than the hopes for the future, would incline to its support; that, too, at a time when sectional strife and madness are so rampant, when the North has so many friends, when the South has so many friends, and the Union has so few.

APPENDIX.

The following table will show how the amounts paid for pensions at different periods compare with the general expenses of the Government. At no period since 1820 has so little been paid annually for pensions as now; while the general expenditures are nearly five times what they then were:

Expenditures of the Government during the years 1790, 1800, 1810, 1820, 1830, 1840, 1850, and 1857.

THE TRIUMPHS OF THE ADMINISTRATION.

SPEECH OF HON. S. A. PURVIANCE,

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

May 25, 1858.

The House being in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. PURVIANCE said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: In the discussion of the appropriation bill, my colleague from the Berks district [Mr. J. GLANCY JONES] made an allusion to the President's dinners, which was as unwarranted as it was ungentelemanly and indiscreet. If James Buchanan, either through parsimony or partisan feeling, chooses to depart from the established custom, and set at defiance the courtesies and amenities which have hitherto, from Washington down to Pierce, inclusive, been observed by the occupants of the White House, my colleague should be the last man to proclaim the President's shame. My colleague may feast and fatten at the President's crib until the cravings of a voracious appetite have been appeased and quieted, but he must not, when gorged with presidential viands, assail the motives of members acting under the obligations of an oath, merely because they may desire a reduction of the expenses of this Administration, now becoming so enormous as to beget a very general want of confidence in the administrative talents of those who have it under their control. But it is not my purpose to deal with presidential dinners, but to notice more in extenso a most unfortunate flourish made by my colleague in connection with the allusion to which I have referred.

He expressed the belief that we were chagrined at the triumphs of this Administration, and it is to this that I desire to turn the attention of the House and the country. The triumphs of this Administration! Was my colleague in earnest, or was he disposed to join in ridiculing the superlative folly and imbecility of his own and favorite Administration?

The first great triumph of Mr. Buchanan has been over a gold and silver currency, which he professed to favor, but which he has completely broken down, and inaugurated in its place a paper currency, in the shape of Treasury notes, to the amount of $20,000,000, now floating through the country, bought and sold as any other marketable commodity, and subject to fluctuation, and subject also to all the objections to which paper currency is generally liable. This, then, is the first great triumph of the Administration. Now for the second. With a Delegate sitting in the House from Utah, with whom we have not even heard that the President ever had a conference, a war is undertaken against the Mormons, at an expense of millions; contracts given out to political favorites, to buy up broken-down horses and mules; provisions at most exorbitant prices, out of which magnificent fortunes have been made in a few weeks; the Army increased, and a partisan President enabled thereby to distribute more effectually the spoils of office; and in the midst of all this, and before a blow had been struck, commissioners of peace are sent, who, if report be true, have settled this mighty affair without the interposition of an armed force. What a farce, to thus disgrace ourselves in the eyes of the civilized world, by exhibiting to public gaze the vibrations and vacillations of an Executive whose mind to-day is for war, to-morrow for peace, and the next day for both. Thus has ended this second triumph of the Administration, costing the people many millions of dollars, now conceded to have been uselessly thrown away.

The third great triumph of the Administration deserves more than a passing notice. The public is familiar with the fact that a constitution was framed at Leecompton in open defiance of the will of the people of Kansas. This constitution the President submitted to Congress, accompanied by a most extraordinary message, urging the admission by reasons and arguments unworthy the source from whence they came, and exhibiting a partisan character, which were subsequently attempted to be enforced by the use and abuse of the patronage intrusted to him as the executive officer of the Government, which deserved, as it has received, the execrations of honest men of all parties, resulting in a total disruption of the Democratic party, which must inevitably bring into the Thirty-Sixth Congress a majority opposed to the repetition of outrages which the worst of monarchs would scarcely dare to perpetrate with impunity. Upon Congress, and Congress alone, the power is conferred to admit new States. The President has no right to interfere; and sworn as he is to support the Constitution, which instrument gives to Congress alone the power of admission, the President violates his oath of office when he dares to invade our exclusive right in this particular. For such invasion, followed by the use and abuse of patronage, a President ought to be impeached; and nothing, in such a case, but the tyranny of party could save him.

A President of my own choice who would dare to press the admission of a State by the controlling power of his patronage, so far as I am concerned, should be treated in this way as readily as one of opposite political faith; and an experiment of the kind would be most likely to prevent a recurrence of the evil in the future.

Unjustifiable as it was for the President to interfere, aside from this, his reasons are as specious and futile as might have been expected from one who has attained no distinction since his elevation to the Presidency, than that of a violent partisan and bitter politician. One of his reasons was, that the people of Kansas had had a fair chance to vote upon their constitution, and that, therefore, they should not be permitted to vote again. Now, how was this? The vote was "For the constitution with slavery," "For the constitution without slavery." All who voted were compelled to vote for the constitution—were compelled to vote that John Calhoun should be the regent, and have a controlling power over the returns of elections, so as to declare who were and who were not elected to fill the offices; but, worse than all, those who voted were compelled to vote in favor of the continuance of slavery within the Territory till 1864, and for a schedule and saving clause which prevented any interference with slavery as it then existed. The unfairness of this mode of submission is the more apparent when you suppose a constitution filled with objectionable features, all of which the voter would be compelled to swallow if he voted at all. A constitution containing a clause declaring that the Legislature should never incorporate a bank, a manufacturing company, or create a system of common schools, or internal improvements; with a clause of submission, such as that of Leecompton, on slavery, would necessarily drive from the polls every voter who desired to consider these as favorite topics of legislation. If he voted for the constitution without slavery, he was, in order to be entitled to this privilege, compelled to vote against schools, banks, manufacturing companies, and internal improvements.

But I can suppose a case in which I can readily invoke the opposition of our bachelor President himself.

A constitution with a clause conferring upon the Legislature the power to tax the income of a bachelor, to the extent of one fifth, more or less, with a clause of submission like that of the Leecompton constitution, would greatly puzzle our President to appreciate its fairness. If he voted either for or against slavery, he would still be compelled to vote the power to tax unjustly his estate. Before he would submit to this, I will tell you what he would do. He would gather up his traps, and take them to some other locality where he would find greater equality in the principles of taxation. What is right for the President ought to be right for the people of Kansas, and yet the President was bent upon establishing a different rule for this unfortunate people from that which he would be willing to apply to himself.

Another illustration which shows the unfair character of the submission. Supposing the voters of Kansas to consist of fifteen thousand, one third of whom are in favor of the constitution, and two thirds against it. One third vote—two thousand six hundred—for the constitution with slavery, and two thousand four hundred for the constitution without slavery; what is the result? Slavery is fixed upon the people by two thousand six hundred votes, while there are twelve thousand four hundred against it; and yet this is the popular sovereignty which constitutes, in the opinion of my colleague, one of the triumphs of the Administration.

This infamous burlesque upon popular rights, sustained and urged by the President, was pressed for five long months upon Congress, and triumphed. How? In breaking it down, by a vote of one hundred and twenty against it, to one hundred and twelve for it.

The Administration then presented another and still greater monstrosity in what is known as the English dodge, intended for different interpretations—one for the North and the other for the South. In the North, it is intended to say that the constitution is submitted; whilst in the South, the reverse is to be the case.

What is this singular production, this political nondescript, about which even those who gave it paternity materially differ? It is a bribe and a threat to the people of Kansas—and is this: if you come in as a slave State now, you shall do so without objection to your population, and you shall have salt springs, lands for schools and internal improvement purposes; but, if you refuse to take slavery, you shall not be admitted as a free State until you have more than double your present population.

Thus, the Democratic party has inaugurated the new doctrine that the admission of a slave State is to receive double the favor that is to be extended to a free State. Heretofore, that party claimed that it was not sectional; but how does it now stand before the American people? It stands upon the record the avowed friend of slavery, having enacted a law which gives a premium to slavery and inflicts a punishment upon freedom. The passage of this most iniquitous law was heralded at this metropolis as a triumph! Cannons were fired, drums and fifes were called into requisition, the President serenaded and called out to respond to a rejoicing over the passage of a law which, like the assassin, took Kansas by the throat, demanding her consent, and threatening, if she refused, to punish her for her obstinacy, by keeping her out of the Union until she should have at least double her present population.

The Crittenden amendment gave the people of Kansas a right to vote for or against the Leecompton constitution; and in the event of voting it down, then to elect delegates to a convention to frame a constitution to be voted on by the people. This reasonable proposition was voted down by the Democratic party, the pledged friends of popular sovereignty, and voted for by those who are opposed to the Administration; and now my colleague adds this to the list of triumphs of the Administration.

Although our Treasury is bankrupt, and repeated efforts have been made to restore the tariff—one by myself, another by my colleague from the Westmoreland district, [Mr. COVODE], and another by my colleague from the Philadelphia district, [Mr. MORRIS]—all have been trampled upon by the Democratic party, the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means himself among the number, and the million or more of miners and laborers in Pennsylvania, dependent upon the reinstatement of the tariff, left in hopeless despair; and my colleague, after feasting at a presidential dinner, is found in his seat—not to inaugurate a tariff policy to relieve his poor dependent constituents, but to exult over the triumphs, as he calls them, of this heartless and reckless Administration.

PACIFIC RAILROAD.

SPEECH OF HON. M. A. OTERO, OF NEW MEXICO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

May 25, 1858.

The House being in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. OTERO said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I desire to call the attention of the committee, for a brief space of time, to some remarks which I propose to submit upon the subject of the Pacific railroad. In entering upon the discussion of this topic, important and comprehensive as it is, I need hardly say that I will endeavor to divest myself of any personal feeling, interest, or prejudice, such as I might be supposed naturally to have in the matter; for no other question involves, equally with this, the hopes and calculations and future welfare of the Territory I have the honor to represent.

I design, sir, to bring forward only those reasons in behalf of the great enterprise contemplated, and in support of the particular line of construction of an iron road to the Pacific coast, which, in my humble judgment, I think ought to control the action of Congress, and govern national opinions, in prosecuting so vast a work to final achievement.

I will say, sir, for I intend to speak frankly, that apart from a consideration of this subject in its bearings on the general prosperity of our common country, I am more especially interested in those immediate benefits and advantages that in the completion of this great proposed highway are to accrue to my own people and the Territory of New Mexico.

My constituents, sir, send me here to represent their direct interests; and these will ever be my first thought; their good my highest object. To raise the condition of New Mexico to that which you, representing old and prosperous communities, enjoy; to secure them commercial advantages and facilities for trade; and to place its inhabitants, in these respects, on an equal footing with those of any of the States and Territories of our broad Confederacy; is my most ambitious aim, as I hope always to prove it my constant care.

I felicitate myself, sir, that the discussion of this subject of a Pacific railroad gives me an opportunity to say something with regard to the resources of the Territory of New Mexico; and though in a measure a diversion from the main point in course of debate, I will respectfully ask the attention of the House to such facts as I propose to state. I desire, sir, briefly to consider in this connection the isolated condition and immense material wealth of New Mexico, at present comparatively abandoned and uncared for. Gentlemen may then know and properly appreciate the importance of constructing a national road through that Territory.

And now, sir, what of the resources of New Mexico? In the acquisition of that Territory was acquired an area of two hundred and fifty thousand square miles, a large amount of which is of the finest agricultural soil; large mineral districts have been already discovered and known to contain much of the precious metals; great deposits of iron, lead, and copper ore are found, and an incalculable abundance of coal; with a population of more than sixty thousand. Your scientific surveyors in that country, since its acquisition by this Government, as shown by their reports, estimate the amount of goods, wares, and merchandise, taken into that country from the States, at five or six million dollars, leaving in your Treasury at least one and a half million dollars of annual revenue. A million of stock sheep, producing, at a minimum calculation, three million pounds of wool, were herded and owned in the Territory when you first became its possessors; and they should have been, and with proper governmental protection would have been, rapidly increasing and swelling in numbers and value. And a due proportion of all other kinds of animal stock were raised in and distributed through the country.

In point of mineral wealth, New Mexico, in my opinion, is inferior to no State or Territory in the Union. The first conquerors and explorers of Mexico, the Spaniards, were early attracted to this region, not only because of its excellent climate, unequal for invariableness and salubrity, and its fertile soil, but mainly on account of its reputed and subsequently discovered mineral wealth. After their successful establishment in the country, New Mexico was among the first provinces subdued, and permanently settled by them; and on account of the resemblance it bore to Mexico proper, in the particular character of its native inhabitants, and more especially in its unmistakable indications of mineral wealth, it was called New Mexico.

Sir, I desire to speak, not only from my own personal knowledge of this Territory, but also to refer to such authoritative documents as I think you will willingly accept as evidence of the truth and correctness of what I affirm. Dr. A. Wislisenus, in an interesting memoir of a tour in northern Mexico, in 1846-7, which was published by the order of the Senate, speaking of the early history of New Mexico, says:

"The Spaniards, it seems, received the first information about it in 1581, from a party of adventurers under Captain Francisco de Leyra Bonillo, who, finding the aboriginal inhabitants, and the mineral wealth of the country, to be similar to those of Mexico, called it New Mexico."

From the great lack of true and proper information about New Mexico, the consequence of an indifference heretofore felt in relation to it, and with a motive to awaken a lively and popular interest in a region so attractive—and one which I believe to see speedily opened up to an enterprising and industrious immigration—I trust, sir, I may be pardoned in venturing to give a brief sketch of that Territory. It is now two hundred and seventy-seven years since the Spaniards first received any knowledge of the country; and two hundred and sixty-three since its first colonization under Don Juan de Oñate, who memorialized the Spanish Viceroy for the settlement of the country; and the identical memorial is now of record in the territorial archives at Santa Fé. Mr. Gregg, in his "Commerce of the Plains," thus refers to it:

"In every part of this singular document there may be (found) traced the singular evidences of that sordid lust for gold which so disgraced all the Spanish conquests in America," &c.

Showing clearly that they were fully satisfied of the fact of the existence there of that mineral wealth which was the captivating, if not the prime, object of Spanish exploration in the New World. The aborigines were coerced into the service of their conquerors to work the mines, of which there were many discovered and opened. The most important of them, which have been abandoned in consequence of the civil embroilments and Indian difficulties in the country, are the Gran Quivira, Abó, Embudo, Cerrillos, Abiquin, and many others which can be mentioned. Of the Gran Quivira, which lies about one hundred miles southward from Santa Fé, Mr. Gregg, who visited those ruins, speaks thus:

"This appears to have been a considerable city, larger and richer by far than the present capital of New Mexico ever has been."

Mines of gold, silver, copper, iron, lead, and coal, are found all over the country. In all the metallic mines, the ore is said to be very abundant and uncommonly pure. Since the reduction and occupancy of the country by the Spaniards, the mining business has been carried on to a greater or less extent. The isolated condition of the country has rendered it uninviting to immigration; and the miners there, satisfied with small returns from their labor, will account satisfactorily for so many of these mines lying idle. At present the most productive and valuable diggings and mines are the "Placer mines," composing the Rial de Dolores and Rial del Tuerto—or the old and new Placeres. These are gold diggings which have produced very large amounts of that precious metal in years past, considering the rude manner in which they were worked. Dr. Wislisenus says:

"The annual production of gold in the two Placeres seems to vary considerably. In some years it was estimated from thirty to forty thousand dollars, in others from sixty to eighty thousand dollars, and, in latter years, even as high as $350,000 per annum."

Not only do Mr. Gregg and Doctor Wislisenus speak highly of them, but also Lieutenant J.

J. Abert, United States topographical engineer, (vide Sen. Doc. first sess. on Thirtieth Congress, p. 36.) where he speaks of the New Placer, or Rial del Tuerto. He says;

"The value of these mines cannot very well be estimated now, as there have been many improvements in the methods of working gold, which, when adapted to these mines, may produce a great increase in the annual yield. Mr. Campbell tells me that he got from his wells one piece worth $700, and, at another time, a piece worth $900."

Dr. Wislisenus thus refers to the unfortunate neglect of this particular branch of industry at the present day in New Mexico. He says:

"A great many deserted mining places in New Mexico prove that mining was pursued with greater zeal in the old Spanish times than at present, which may be accounted for in various ways—as the present want of capital, want of knowledge in mining, but specially the unsettled state of the country, and the avarice of its arbitrary rulers, [its former rulers, of course.] The mountainous parts of New Mexico are very rich in gold, copper, iron, and silver. Gold seems to be found to a large extent in all the mountains near Santa Fé; also, south of it for a distance of about one hundred miles, as far as Gran Quivira; and north for about one hundred and twenty miles, up to the Sangre de Cristo. Throughout this whole region, gold dust has been abundantly found by the poorer classes of Mexicans, who occupy themselves with the washing of this metal out of the mountain streams."

The principal points at which copper is to be found in great abundance, are at Las Tijeras, Jemes, Abiquin, Guadalupe de Mora, and what are commonly called "the copper mines," known by the Mexicans as "Santa Rita," and others in the different parts of the country. Coal is found in large beds, principally in the mountains near Santa Fé, in the Raton mountains, and on the Rio Puerco of the West, near the thirty-fifth parallel of latitude, and is easily procurable.

I will not leave this branch of my subject without referring to a traditional and fabulous story with regard to the golden products of the rich mines of the wealthy and important Gran Quivira. In reference to this tradition, Dr. Wislisenus states that—

"At one time, when they [meaning the Spaniards] were making extraordinary preparations for transporting the precious metals, the Indians attacked them; whereupon the miners buried their treasures, worth fifty millions, and left the city together, but they were all killed except two, who went to Mexico, giving the particulars of the affair, and soliciting aid to return. But the distance being so great, and the Indians so numerous, nobody would advance, and the thing dropped. One of the two went to New Orleans, then under the dominion of Spain, raised five hundred men, and started by way of the Sabine, but was never heard of afterwards. Within the last few years several Americans and Frenchmen have visited the place; and although they have not found the treasure, they certify, at least, to the existence of an aqueduct, about ten miles in length, to the still standing walls of several churches, the sculpture of the Spanish coat of arms, and to many spacious pits, supposed to be silver mines. It was no doubt a Spanish mining town, and it is not unlikely that it was destroyed in 1680, in the general successful insurrection of the Indians in New Mexico against the Spaniards."

A word more as to the general productiveness of our mines, so as to show the amount that one hand can get, or make daily, under the then system of working the mines. The scientific gentlemen just quoted, speaking of a visit he made to the Placer mines, and particularly to a gold mine belonging to Mr. Tournier, a Frenchman residing there, says:

"Mr. Tournier (in the rude manner in which he worked his mine) told me that he worked every day about two cargas, (loads,) being seven hundred and fifty pounds of the ore; and that he draws, on an average, three quarters of an ounce (about twelve dollars' worth) of gold out of his shaft."

I could detain the House upon this particular branch of my remarks much longer, but I have other points upon which I wish to invite its attention, and will only ask whether there can be any one, with a knowledge of these facts concerning the mineral wealth of New Mexico, who will say that that Territory is inferior to any State or Territory under this Government? All that we ask is an outlet for an imposing display before the world, of the prodigal treasures that at this moment lie hidden in her bosom.

I shall next, sir, call your attention to the agricultural capacity of New Mexico. In regard to this particular branch of industry, there is indeed great misapprehension throughout the United States. I have not unfrequently, I am sorry to say, heard men venture the empty assertion that this really bounteous Territory is a desert waste, sterile and unproductive—a country which not even prowling wolves deign to inhabit. Such assertions, sir, so far as this topic is concerned, are to my mind but the utterance of uninformed intelligence, not to say of ignorance. No country, I undertake to say, has better and richer soil than New Mexico. We raise all the products—ay, every one of them, and these, too, in great abundance—that are produced in and common to the southern and middle States. Isolated as New Mexico is, and entirely self-dependent, she has always found in her own varied resources sufficient means for support. True it is that we irrigate, by artificial canals, (acequias), our soil, in order to raise our crops. This process has ever been resorted to by the Spaniards and Mexicans, and it is a time-honored custom, common among them. We do not place entire dependence in flying and uncertain clouds for the fertilization of our land. It is upon ever-running and copious streams, that spring clear and pure from the bosom of the eternal mountains, that we put our faith. With such eternal elements of dependence we can well insure our crops. But, sir, I emphatically contradict the assertion that we can produce nothing without irrigation. I affirm this to be but an ancient custom of the people—a habit common, not only in New Mexico, but peculiar to the entire Republic of which it was formerly a part. Irrigation was and is yet practiced in Texas and California. It is to a great extent abolished in those States; and many farmers in New Mexico do not now irrigate, and they produce from their lands equally as much as those who adhere to the old practice.

No country in North America can, in my opinion, produce better grapes than New Mexico; and I venture to predict that the fertile banks of the Rio Grande will one day rival those of the vine-clad Loire. In the abundance, variety, and quality of its grapes, and the perfection of its native wine, New Mexico will bear comparison even with any European State. There is, of course, as yet no very extensive manufacture of wine, that made being chiefly for home consumption. Lieutenant A. W. Whipple (Pacific Railroad Report, page 13) says:

"The valley of the Rio Grande del Norte is well known. The bottom land that can be irrigated is very extensive. The soil and climate seem particularly adapted to the culture of grapes, which grow luxuriantly and to perfection. The wine produced is very finely flavored, and, with an easy communication with a market, may become an article of commerce, and a source of wealth to New Mexico. But the resources of this Territory are not confined to the belt which may be flooded by the waters of the Del Norte. Numerous springs and streams checker this region with fertile spots among the mountains."

The same scientific gentleman, speaking of the character of the country and water of the Rio Pecos, on the thirty-fifth parallel route, in contrast with the kind of country and character of the water of the same stream about the thirty-second parallel route, (Pacific Railroad Report, volume 2, part four, page 4), says:

"The Pecos river here—i. e. on the thirty-fifth parallel route—is clear and rapid, and its waters pure and sweet, forming quite a contrast to those at the several crossings from San Antonio to El Paso, where they are always turbid, brackish, and disagreeable. Indeed, by some travelers on its borders, and on some maps, this river, from these circumstances, has acquired the name of Puerco, the Spanish appellation for muddy waters. There its valley, for hundreds of miles, is a blank and dreary waste, with scarcely a shrub to relieve the eye of the traveler; here its fertile banks are dotted with innumerable small plantations and towns, so characteristic of New Mexico."

In the northern part of the Territory wheat is raised in great abundance—the soil yielding on an average of forty bushels to the acre; while in the southern part, through the Rio Abajo, and down to the Messilla valley, corn is produced and raised in equal abundance. It is my opinion that in no State or Territory in the Union can be raised finer corn, and more to the acre, than in the Messilla valley—being a part of the same valley of the Rio Grande.

As a pastoral and grazing country, I believe New Mexico has already obtained considerable reputation abroad. I believe that in this respect her claims are generally conceded to be unsurpassed. The evidence of the justness and superiority of these claims is in the large amount of stock grazed in and spread over the whole country. Dr. Wislisenus, speaking of both Chihuahua and New Mexico, with regard to their merits as grazing countries, says:

"Both States are unsurpassed by any in the Union. Millions of stock can be raised every year on the prairies of the high table-lands, and in the mountains. Cattle, horses, mules, and sheep, increase very fast; and if more attention were paid to the improvement of the stock, the wool of the sheep alone could be made the exchange for the greater part of the present importation. But to accomplish this, (he adds,) the Indians, who, chiefly in the last ten years, have crippled all industry in stock-raising, will have first to be subdued."

I have thus, sir, I trust, so far at least as the object I have in view demands, and in a general way, satisfactorily demonstrated the great material resources of the Territory of New Mexico. Much more I could, and, indeed, would desire to say on this topic, but I hurry to the practical application of my remarks. I must add, however, that in stating the facts just given, my object has been to comply with numerous requests, made by written communications from all parts of the country, as the Delegate of New Mexico, asking me for information about that Territory. I do this now in a public way for the general benefit, so that the country at large may know the wealth and resources of the region I represent, and the claims, under such state of facts, that New Mexico has upon governmental consideration for its future welfare.

Such, sir, are the resources of the country through which the thirty-fifth parallel, or Albuquerque railroad route to the Pacific passes; and I ask, has not this Territory, with its abundant incitements to your interests, and its claims upon your care, been comparatively neglected and forsaken? Our advancement has been impeded, not only because of the want of necessary avenues for the development of the popular mind, but also on account of our want of outlets for an agricultural, mineral, and pastoral wealth, which, I am sincerely confident, no other State or Territory of the United States can boast to possess.

Ten years, sir, have gone by since New Mexico became part and parcel of this, the greatest Republic that the world has ever seen. Ten years have rolled by since Federal power assumed the duty and responsibility of the protection of that people. Have our demands of right been met, and your duty fulfilled? History will show hereafter how the Government has discharged its trust towards New Mexico, in contrast with dispensations showered upon our sister Territories. Sir, it is a painful thing for me to be here and witness the partiality which is manifested in favor of some of your northwestern Territories. I regret to say this, but the truth must be told. It must go to the country.

And now, sir, in regard to a Pacific railroad. I shall not attempt to enter into the discussion of the national importance of this iron way. It is conceded, I believe, by all, that is necessary, and ought to be constructed. There are various routes proposed and strongly advocated by their respective friends. It is my purpose, in the few remarks I have to submit in relation to this great enterprise, to advocate what is termed the thirty-fifth parallel, or Albuquerque route, and to give my reasons for doing so. While all other States and Territories of the Union have outlets for their wealth, natural and artificial, New Mexico is entirely isolated and cut off from proper commercial intercommunications. The Territory is surrounded on all sides by almost limitless regions, fertile, and, for the most part, cultural, yet uninhabited; and where the wandering and lawless Indian holds as of yore, in spite of your nominal subjection, imperial sway. We are from eight to nine hundred miles distant from any of your western States' frontiers. We are quite twelve hundred miles from your Pacific coast. The Rio Grande, the principal artery that traverses the Territory, is not navigable, and therefore affords us no avenue by which to reach the Gulf. We are, indeed, within a prairie-bound territorial isle; and we ask as right, fair, and just, the means for our outward development.

The Albuquerque route passes through the center of New Mexico, and it is the most central route of all proposed, and one that would benefit the greatest number of people. It seems to me that upon the first sight of a map any impartial and disinterested person would decide in favor of that route. The country through which it runs is rich in soil, copious in water, and abundant in wood, timber, and fuel. It is the best adapted for farming purposes; the climate is genial and salubrious; and the objection to the climate along the Albuquerque route, as being rigorous and inhospitable—rendering it impracticable, it is said, to carry even an overland mail by that line—is wholly without support or foundation. I am aware that the Postmaster General is of that erroneous opinion, and I am told that even the President has been induced to believe that Albuquerque comprises an ice-bound region. Now, sir, it was my fortune to be born within a few miles from Albuquerque, and I have resided there for a considerable period of my life. I never found it extremely cold there, or remember to have seen snow fall to a depth or frequency to impede the usual travel and trade of that place. We never enjoyed sleighing there—and I do not know but what gentlemen might, with equal propriety, assert, to a citizen of Nashville or Memphis, that a railroad could not be constructed through Tennessee, because of the rigor of the climate, as to say that New Mexico, or rather Albuquerque, is at a disadvantage in this respect; both ideas are simply ridiculous. And even though the climate of Albuquerque were middling cold, this could offer no objection, for, I believe, engineers prefer a mean temperature for the building of railroads, to all climatic extremes, whether hot or cold. But I speak of the climate of Albuquerque of my own personal knowledge, and this from a long residence there.

Lieutenant E. F. Beale, the superintendent of the wagon road from Fort Defiance, New Mexico, to the Colorado river, has returned, in the mid winter, along the thirty-fifth parallel route, and he tells us that he experienced no inconvenience whatever, on his exploration back from Los Angeles, California, to Albuquerque, from the rigor of winter. On the other hand on the the forty-second parallel route, through the South Pass, you have had your Utah army detained, amid the gorges of the Rocky Mountains, in consequence of the snows that impeded the travel through that region during the winter months of the year.

The snow that falls on the thirty-fifth parallel route can never be an obstruction in the way, so as to impede, even in the most severe winter, railroad travel. But let us examine what Secretary Davis, Lieutenant Whipple, Mr. Campbell, and others, have to say of this route with regard to its advantages over any other one surveyed.

Secretary Davis, speaking of this particular route, says, (see vol. 1, page 20:)

"The general features which have determined the position of this route, the exploration of which was conducted by Lieutenant A. W. Whipple, topographical engineers, are the extension, west and east, of the interlocking tributaries of the Mississippi, the Rio Grande, and the Colorado of the West. It would appear to possess, also, a greater yearly amount of rain than the regions immediately north and south of it; and, as a consequence, a better supply of fuel and timber."

He further says, on page 21:

"The principal characteristics of this route, in comparison with others, are, probably, its passing through or near more numerous cultivable areas, its more abundant natural supply of water as far west as the Colorado, and the greater frequency and extent of forest growth on the route between the Rio Grande and the Colorado."

Captain Whipple, the United States engineer, who surveyed the central or thirty-fifth parallel route, thus speaks of it, as he completed his labors as far as the Cajon, at which place his exploration seems to have ended:

"Our field labors may now be considered as completed. It remains to develop in detail the results that may be gathered from the material that has been collected. Until this be accomplished, no definite or satisfactory evidence can be given to others of the success that has attended our operations; but to ourselves there is no doubt remaining that for the construction of a railway the route we have passed over is not only practicable, but in many respects eminently advantageous. The first six hundred and fifty miles, from the eastern border of the Choctaw territory to the river Pecos, possesses in the valley of the Canadian a natural highway, that establishes beyond question the superior advantages of this belt of country over any other that can be selected between the same degrees of longitude within the limits of our territory. The Canadian seems formed by nature for the special object in view. Its general course for the distance alluded to is nearly east. Its mean inclination is but nine feet to the mile; thus enabling us almost imperceptibly to attain the summit of the lofty table lands of New Mexico. Expensive embankments are entirely avoided; and, notwithstanding the numerous affluents that fertilize and enrich the adjacent country, few bridges are required, as most of the water courses sink beneath the surface as they approach the great valley. Upon the eastern portion valuable coal mines exist, and vast forests of oak may furnish an unfailing supply of timber and fuel. The Cross Timbers extend to the meridian of 90° west from Greenwich, and the wooded branches of the False Washita at ford abundance of the same material, for fifty or sixty miles beyond. Sandstone, quick lime, and gypsum, are found throughout the whole distance. If the fertile valleys were thrown open to settlers, and an outlet secured for the products of the soil, this region would form the nucleus of new States, and the roving tribes of Indians that now occupy it would give place to a flourishing population. It is believed that in climate, as well as soil, this country far surpasses that of Kansas."

In the second part of the same volume, page 48, Captain Whipple says:

"One of the most important of the advantages claimed for this route is the pleasant and salubrious climate of the region through which it passes. There is no long series of parched plains, rendering the summer heat intolerable, nor do those dreaded winds termed 'northers' reach this latitude. The mountain ranges that are crossed are not blocked up in winter by ice and snow sufficient to interrupt travel. From July to January, and for the whole year, this line may be traversed in safety."

"The different portions of our survey were performed at such seasons as to enable us to make observations upon the most unfavorable characteristics of the climate. In August we were upon the comparatively low and arid plains upon the head waters of the Canadian, and near the Llano Estacado. During the winter months we passed over the elevated regions, and through the mountain passes between the Rio Grande and Rio Colorado."

"Upon the parallel of 35° snow cannot prove an obstruction to a railway."

I have not the time now, sir, to discuss the merits of the other proposed routes, and compare their disadvantages with this of Albuquerque. Mr. Campbell, who I believe has been upon the two surveys of the thirty-second and thirty-fifth parallel, says: (See Pacific Railroad Report, volume three, page 24:)

"The valley of the Canadian is the proper route, from its directness, gentle ascent, and ready supply of water. Its general course is nearly due west, to the mouth of Tecumcar creek, and the ascent of these (the one, I believe, the tributary of the other) is very gradual to the summit between them and the Pecos."

I cite this gentleman's opinion, because of the especial respect in which I know it will be held by some gentlemen upon this floor, having occupied the position under Lieutenant Whipple of a railroad engineer. No one, so far as I am credibly informed, denies the practicability of the construction of a Pacific railroad from St. Louis, Missouri, through Springfield, or Neosho, to the Canadian, and thence to Albuquerque. I take St. Louis as the starting point, because, in my opinion, it is the most important commercial city on the Mississippi, and the most central in its locality.

Dr. Kidwell, who was hostile to all routes, in his minority report from the committee on the Pacific railroad, made to Congress at its last session, speaks thus as to what he thinks is the best route to the Pacific, if any should be built:

"A right line drawn between New York and Albuquerque would pass through St. Louis. And yet Baltimore is nearer to St. Louis than is New York, and Charleston is nearer than Baltimore. So are Richmond, and Savannah, and Pensacola. St. Louis is, therefore, eligibly situated."

"A road from St. Louis, via Albuquerque, to San Francisco, would avoid, it was supposed, extreme heights, extreme heat, and the deep snows. A road from Albuquerque, via Fort Smith, to Memphis, and one from Albuquerque to St. Louis, would have a common stem a considerable distance; if one is built, both ought to be. The line of continental road most convenient to the fifteen southern States, taken as a unit, begins in Charleston, and runs to San Francisco through the towns of Memphis, Little Rock, Fort Smith, Anton Chico, and Albuquerque, and has a fork to St. Louis."

"The mass of the population, business, and wealth, and the greater part of the geographical area of the fifteen southern States, lie north of a line drawn fifty miles south of, and parallel with, the Charleston, Memphis, Fort Smith, and Albuquerque road; that line of road is very accessible to each of the southern States, at some point or other, before it reaches the east line of New Mexico."

"The extreme southern cities, even Galveston, can reach San Francisco as readily by the Albuquerque route as any other, or nearly so—in many cases more readily than by any other."

I am of opinion that only one road ought to be constructed, and that the one which runs upon the thirty-fifth parallel. I think the Government ought not to undertake, with its money and its public domain, to build any more than one road. That should be as near the geographical center of the whole country as the practicability of the route will allow. Let us divest ourselves, gentlemen, of that sectional prejudice, interest, and rivalry, which seem to control many members, so far as the starting eastern point is concerned, but which, when we are considering a work that is to do credit to our common national pride, ought never to be entertained by national legislators. Let us look at the honor which our country is to derive abroad among the other nations of the world, by the construction of this gigantic highway. Show to the world your physical power and your purpose; and do not allow, in the construction of the great highway, either personal interests or political and sectional prejudices to control your action. The enterprise rises above such mean and lesser things. The integrity of the Union and your national honor are at stake. Construct this road, and the world will honor and respect you now, while posterity will praise and revere you.

Mr. Chairman, I have thus, very imperfectly, I grant, fulfilled my task. It has been my earnest endeavor, as stated in the outset, to exhibit, though in a sketch-like way, the vast material resources of New Mexico, as embraced in her agricultural, mineral, and pastoral wealth; to set forth a true view of her isolated territorial condition; to proclaim her demands upon your protection and fostering care; to inform the public mind of the nature of the country as respects its inducements to immigration; and, so far as it rests in my humble power, to show that your great national highway should pass through New Mexican territory.

My object is to open up this almost terra incognita to settlement from the various flourishing States, North, South, East, and West, of the Confederacy; to give an impetus to and increase their population; to sow the quickening germs of future progress; and, in the proper development of the resources of a section of this land, by nature so supremely blessed, while directly adding to the welfare of my own people, to benefit at large the great Union of which we are now a federative part.

It must be borne in mind, sir, that we are not a population new, unstable, and heterogeneous in its element, such as has poured into Nebraska and other infant Territories of the Union; and which afterwards, in a relentless conflict and eternal clashing of dissimilar interests, has given to "bleeding Kansas" voice for her echoing and agonizing "shrieks." But we are a nation in ourselves, with our peculiar characteristics, customs, and prejudices, coming into this Republic, not as a conquered people, but rather by honorable treaty; and now seeking therein just recognition of our incorporate part though an intelligent appreciation of the principles of this Government, and because of a desire, long ago entertained, to be the subjects of its protecting arm.

We know, in truth, in New Mexico, no North, no South, no East, no West. Sectional feuds and civil embroilments elsewhere, wild and threatening in their stormy outbreaks, reach us only by report; and fanaticism and ultraism, the common birth of the same dark school of treason and sedition, are utter and uninvited strangers to our peaceful borders.

We want, sir, a healthy, harmonious, active, and energetic population among us. Not individuals with black carpet sacks in their hands, containing all their worldly goods; or others, who, as in a special instance charged lately, may cross an interested border for the purpose of a vote; but people who, guided by the counselings of the better instincts of human nature, are prompted to settle in the Territory to improve their own condition, and that, likewise, of their offspring. We ask fitting outlets for our expanding trade; we aspire to build ourselves into a thriving and permanent prosperity; we assume to take the place and position to which we are entitled in this great Commonwealth. And, sir, I express the sentiment, that I see a bow of promise smiling on the future of New Mexico, under whose brilliancy she will ultimately realize her brightest hope, and obtain, at no distant day, a high and elevated place in the galaxy of States.

ARREST OF WILLIAM WALKER.

SPEECH OF HON MILES TAYLOR

OF LOUISIANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

May 25, 1858.

The House being in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. TAYLOR said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I desire to engage the attention of the committee for a short time in relation to a subject connected with one which occupied their attention and the attention of the House at an early part of the session. It is one which grows out of the capture of General William Walker in Nicaragua, and the bringing back of that person and his followers to the territories of the United States. It is not my purpose to enter into the subject of the character of the expedition of Walker. It is not my purpose to engage in any examination of his previous history. I shall assume, with a view to the discussion of points to which I wish to direct inquiry, that General Walker and his followers, whilst they were within the limits of the United States were guilty of a violation of the laws of the United States in setting on foot an expedition against Nicaragua. It is known to us all that there are laws in existence which prohibit persons within the limits of the United States from attempting to form a military organization, or attempting to set on foot a military expedition which is destined to act against or within the limits of another country which is at peace with the United States.

I assume, then, that General Walker did set on foot within the United States a military expedition to be carried on against the State of Nicaragua; and that, in engaging in that enterprise, General Walker and his followers did violate the laws of the United States. I assume further, that it was within the power, that it was the right, and that it was the duty of the President of the United States, to exercise all the executive power of the nation for the purpose of arresting the persons engaged in that enterprise, whilst they were within the limits of the United States; and that it was competent and proper for him to have exercised that power for the purpose of breaking up that expedition at any period after its departure from the shores of the United States, and while it was upon the high seas.

But before engaging in the course of remark which I propose to pursue, I wish to state that it is not my intention to make any reflection of any kind, or to express any opinion, as it regards the character or the merits of the conduct of General Walker in setting on foot that expedition; that it is not my purpose to express any opinion with respect to his character as a military leader, or his character as a public man, whilst he was charged with the control of the affairs of Nicaragua. Whatever might have been, whatever might be now, my opinion; however much I might be disposed to condemn anything in his conduct; however much I might be disposed to censure any of his military actions; however I might be disposed to depreciate his civil merits as the executive chief of that country; I, for one, certainly shall not now carp at his conduct, throw censure upon his actions, or depreciate his capacity, after having been silent during that period when he acted a part, which was supposed to be a great one, in the affairs of a neighboring State. I repeat it, sir, no matter how objectionable I might think the conduct of Walker, whilst he was the military and political chief of Nicaragua, this certainly is not the time I should choose to parade it before the world. I would not willingly add a straw to the burdens borne by the unfortunate; and certainly I could not find it in my heart, whatever others may, to criticize and carp at the past career of a brave man, when overwhelmed with misfortune. After having been silent in the palmy days of his power, I will not, I cannot, throw upon him censure, or attempt to condemn his acts, when he is suffering from the stings of an adverse fortune.

I am one of those who remember that the judgment which is pronounced by the world upon public men is determined not by the intrinsic merits of their actions, but by the fortune which attends them. I remember well that in a multitude of instances in the history of the world, when men have been engaged in those enterprises which were legitimate in the eye of reason, and which, in the opinion of all right-thinking men, were in themselves right, they have been rewarded with popular applause when they achieved success, and visited with popular reprobation when they encountered failure. I remember well that when one departs from the ordinary course of human action for the purpose of establishing a new Government, or of overturning an old one, if he succeeds he is a patriot and a hero; but I remember, too, if he fails, that in the public estimation he is guilty of a crime, and is called a rebel. Yes, sir, an unsuccessful attempt to rid a people of tyranny and oppression is, in the eyes of the world, rebellion!

"Rebellion! foul, dishonoring word,
Whose wrongful blight so oft has stained
The holiest cause that tongue or sword
Of mortal ever lost or gained.
How many a spirit born to bless,
Hath sunk beneath thy withering name,
Whom but a day's—an hour's success,
Had waited to eternal fame."

I remember well these words, uttered in bitterness of heart by one of the great poets, who has, but a short time since, passed from the scenes of mortal action; for I felt that they were wrung from him by the memories which clung to him through life of those who, in his native land, had attempted to bring about its political regeneration and had failed, and who, for their attempts, had fallen under the ax of the public executioner. No, sir; after having looked on and seen William Walker engage in that enterprise which terminated in his becoming the chief of the Republic of Nicaragua; after having looked on and been a witness, as it were, of the contest which raged in that country for a considerable length of time, and at last terminated in his overthrow; and, preserving silence then, I am not the man to attempt to cast censure or even to venture upon public criticism of his acts or his policy, in these Halls, when he has met with defeat; defeat, too, brought about, it is more than probable, by the improper and unwarranted interference of another Power, who violated the law of nations and her obligations to another State, by intermeddling with the internal affairs of a separate and an independent people.

I will now proceed, Mr. Chairman, to touch upon the subject that I desire to bring especially to the notice of the committee. It is known to all that the executive power of the United States was exerted for the purpose of arresting that enterprise after its leader had departed from the United States, and that the vessels of war employed upon that service were not enabled to intercept the expedition upon the high seas. It is further known that that expedition reached the shores of Nicaragua, and that Walker and his followers landed upon its soil; that afterwards the officers of the United States landed upon the soil of Nicaragua, and by force took them into their possession, and by force brought them from the soil of Nicaragua and into the territorial limits of the United States; that since their arrival within the territorial limits of the United States, indictments have been found against those persons for a violation of the laws of the United States, and that they are soon to be put upon their trial.

Now, sir, to my mind, if they are tried, the Government of the United States will take a step that is wrong in itself, and that may, in the end, lead to great embarrassment in the future. With a view to call public attention to what I conceived might be the impropriety of permitting such a trial, and what might be the embarrassments which would follow upon such action on the part of the United States, I had the honor, not long since, to offer to the House a resolution, which was in the following words:

"Resolved, That the President be requested to consider whether William Walker and his followers, recently seized by the naval forces of the United States, within the territorial limits of the Republic of Nicaragua, and brought back to the United States, can be tried under indictments found against them in the courts of the United States for offenses alleged to have been committed by them, in the United States, prior to the said seizure as aforesaid, without a violation of the principles heretofore recognized and acted on by the Government of the United States in its public policy; and that he be also requested to consider whether such trial of the said William Walker and his followers, with the permission and by the authority of the Executive, will not be likely to give rise to embarrassments and difficulties in the future management of various questions necessarily connected with our relations with other countries."

An objection was made to that resolution, and it was not received by the House. I desired, however, that it should appear in the Globe, in order that it might be before the public, as I designed then to take advantage of an opportunity, such as this, for the purpose of presenting my views to the House upon the points raised by the resolution.

Mr. Chairman, this resolution presents for consideration two questions: First, whether there is

35TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Arrest of William Walker—Mr. Taylor.

Ho. of REPS.

any right on the part of the Government of the United States to try these men? And in the next place, if the power of the Government of the United States is exercised so that they are subjected to a trial—whether that fact will not, in the end, produce embarrassment in the future with respect to our relations with foreign countries?

Now, as to the first question whether there is a right to try these persons? If they had remained within the limits of the United States it does not of course admit of doubt that it would have been proper to have proceeded against them, and to have subjected them to trial in the manner provided for by law. But it must be remembered that they left the United States, and that they are not now voluntarily within its limits; that they have been brought by force, and by force employed by the United States itself, back, within the territorial jurisdiction of the United States.

Now, sir, by the law of nations, the soil of Nicaragua, as well as that of every other independent State, is sacred. Under that law, in every age, it has been held and recognized as a principle established by the universal judgment of mankind, that any intrusion into the territory of one people by the authority of another, no matter for what purpose, was a violation of right. There can be no rightful exercise of power on the part of the United States, or any other Government, within its limits, unless when engaged in actual war with that country. After a declaration of war, it would be perfectly competent for the military force of the United States to enter into that territory, to make captures, to bring away from her soil the individuals captured, and subject them to whatever consequences might follow the acts which they had previously committed. But in a state of peace, any such seizure made upon that soil is illegal, and any such capture followed up by those captured being brought back to the territorial jurisdiction of the United States, would no more authorize the Government of the United States to permit them to be tried, than if they had never left the soil of Nicaragua.

Sir, the principle of the law of nations, that the soil of a country is inviolate, that no other country has a right to enter into its territorial limits, that any entrance into its territory, when in a state of peace, is unlawful, and can produce no legal result, extends so far that even when two belligerents are engaged in conflict, when a state of war exists between them, so that the citizens of the two countries, whenever they meet, may engage in battle, and those having a superiority of forces may rightfully capture and make their own the property of the others—it is a settled principle of international law that if the property of one of the belligerents on the high seas, when exposed to be captured by the enemy, succeeds in getting into neutral waters, it is not subject to capture. It, however, often happens that belligerents make captures in violation of this principle. When that is the case—though the general rule is, that the courts of the belligerent making captures have exclusive jurisdiction in cases of capture made by its citizens—it is still admitted everywhere, when a capture is made by a belligerent in the waters of a neutral State, that the capture is null and void, and that the courts of the neutral State have jurisdiction in all such cases, with full authority to adjudicate them, and restore the property captured to the rightful owners. Under that principle captured property has again and again been restored; under that principle the courts of the United States, or the Government of the United States, have again and again restored property captured in the waters of the United States, or by persons who were within the jurisdiction of the United States. But that principle can, from its very nature, only be enforced by the action of the neutral Power. Though it is right, though such capture within neutral limits would of itself be a nullity in the eye of reason, and in the eye of justice, it is never so regarded unless the property falls under the jurisdiction of a neutral Power, because the courts of a belligerent Power never act in opposition to the political power of the Government; and they never hesitate to condemn captured property subjected to their jurisdiction, without regard to the place where the captures were made. And it is this circumstance, and this alone, which has led to the practice among all civilized nations on the part of the Governments whose citizens have been wronged by captures made within the limits of a neutral territory, to enforce the claims of its citizens to reparation for the wrong against the neutral Power whose duty it was to protect her territory, and all those within its limits, from hostile aggression, because that Power was in a position to assert a legal right against the offending nation, and by its failure to do so, necessarily became responsible to those who had suffered wrong within their jurisdiction, for the value of the property of which they had been illegally deprived.

But, Mr. Chairman, though it is, in point of fact, true that the courts of belligerent Powers condemn the property captured by their arms in neutral waters, it does not follow that such condemnation is rightful, unless it be upon the principle that might makes right. Upon no other principle can the practice be maintained. The great end of war is mischief; and the controlling principle with belligerents is to do all the injury possible to each other. When the state of war exists the belligerents never listen to the voice of justice, because, "amid the clang of arms the laws are silent." But, in a state of peace, there can be no justification, no excuse, on the part of any country, for disregarding the plain, palpable principle of international law. In my opinion, it will be wrong for the Government of the United States to attempt to enforce its laws with respect to these individuals, when they have been brought within the jurisdiction of the United States by compulsion. And now, sir, I will take the liberty of referring to some instances in our national history, for the purpose of showing that the principle upon which I base this conclusion has been constantly recognized by the Government of the United States in all its actions with respect to foreign Powers.

In the early history of our Government, when its executive functions were discharged by the greatest, the wisest, and the best man the world has ever seen—by him who, in language that is embalmed in the hearts of all true Americans, was "first in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen"—I say, when the administration of the executive functions of the Government of the United States were discharged by that man, the principle I now invoke was recognized and acted on, not only with respect to property, but with respect to the rights of persons. Who is there who has American blood in his veins who is not familiar with the history of Lafayette? Who is there that does not know that when he escaped from France, during the troubles of her Revolution, that he was seized by one of the European despots and put in prison, because of his connection with the revolutionary change which had taken place in France; because of his conduct on French soil, as a citizen, in those great events which led to the overthrow of the French monarchy—which led to the dethronement and execution of Louis XIV. and Marie Antoinette, a daughter of the Austrian Emperor. He was imprisoned for years in the castle of Olmutz, under the authority of Austria. Washington remonstrated with the Government of Austria. He called upon her to release this man, who was then incarcerated in one of her prisons; and it was on the principle that he was imprisoned for acts done upon the soil of France, and beyond the jurisdiction of the Austrian courts and the Austrian Emperor, and that Austria had, under the law of nations, no rightful jurisdiction over him.

And again, sir, it is but a short time since this Government was engaged in a correspondence with that same Power with respect to the arrest of Martin Koszta, formerly a Hungarian citizen. If Koszta had gone voluntarily within the limits of the Austrian empire, he would have been legitimately subjected to her authority. It is known to us all that he had violated the laws of the Austrian empire, that he had committed a political offense against her authority, and that if he had been found within the limits of that empire he would have been subject to its jurisdiction, and doubtless would have been rightfully punishable with death. But he had escaped from her territories, and was, at the time he was arrested, upon Turkish soil. The Austrian officials assumed the right to seize him within the jurisdiction of the Ottoman empire, and to employ force for the purpose of carrying him back to the jurisdiction from which he had escaped, for the purpose of subjecting him to punishment. We all remember, for I believe that there is not an American citizen whose bosom has not swelled with pride at the recollection of the fact that one of our own citizens, a commander of one of our own national vessels, who was then in the port where the wrongful seizure was made, did not hesitate to make use of force for the purpose of rescuing that man from the grasp of Austria. He took him and brought him to the United States. An official correspondence was the result between the Austrian Government and the Government of the United States; and the Government of the United States justified the act of its officer; and, in my judgment, properly justified it, because the act of the Austrian official in assuming to arrest under Austrian laws a criminal in a foreign jurisdiction, for the purpose of carrying him back by compulsion, and subjecting him to punishment, was in violation of the principles of international law, and a violation of the first principles of common justice.

But, sir, these are not the only instances. There has been still another instance, identical in character with the one which I am now commenting on. It is one not generally known, because the facts connected with it were not of a character to excite great public attention, but which I happen to be familiar with, because the seizure was made within the limits of a city in which I was then a resident. It is but some eight years ago since a subject of the Queen of Spain, engaged in some enterprise within the Island of Cuba by which he violated the laws of that island and subjected himself to punishment—I believe to the punishment of death—and escaped from that island and took refuge in the United States. He was found in the city of New Orleans, and the Captain-General of the Island of Cuba, acting through the consul of Spain at the port of New Orleans, employed men who, by force, captured this man, placed him on board of a vessel, and carried him to Cuba with the design of subjecting him to the penalty which he had incurred by his violation of the laws of the island: and what was the result? Did our Government assume that he could be rightfully tried, stranger though he was? No, sir. Armed ships of the United States were dispatched to Cuba, and this man, thus unjustifiably, wrongfully seized upon our own soil, and carried by compulsion into the jurisdiction within whose limits he had violated the law, was required to be delivered up. And he was delivered up.

Now, sir, shall we permit, shall we insist on the trial of these men, and subject them to the penalty imposed by our laws for offenses which they have committed against them, when they, too, have been wrongfully seized upon a foreign soil, and brought by compulsion within our jurisdiction?

Mr. LEITER. Who has the right to complain but the party aggrieved? In the case of Ray, we were the party aggrieved. Why? Because he was seized upon American soil. Should not complain in this case, then, be made by Nicaragua? and have we had any complaint from that Government?

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana. That would be perfectly true so far as it relates to the matter of power; but in answer to the observation of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LEITER,] I would say that if Koszta had not made a declaration of his intention to become an American citizen, we would have had no authority to interfere. We could not have rescued him from the gripe of the Austrian officials. But while that was true, and while he would have been subject to capture and to punishment, still his capture would not have been less unlawful, nor would the punishment inflicted on him have been any the less in violation of the principles of international law, or the public faith, or of private right.

It is true there is a distinction between power and right. The seizure of Koszta on Turkish soil was wrongful. If he had never formed any relations with another Government there would have been none to have vindicated his right; but would not the right have existed just as well under the laws of nature and the laws of nations, though there had been none to vindicate it? According to my notions, it would. I do not pretend to say that we have not the power to punish; I do not mean to say that this would be a legal defense in a court of justice; but I do say that it is a reason which should operate on the political department of the Government, and prevent any enforcement of the law under such circumstances.

35TH CONG....1ST SESS.

HO. OF REPS.

Mr. LEITER. Then I understand the gentleman to put himself on the great moral right, and not on legal right.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana. Of course; upon a right which addresses itself to the political department of the Government, and not to its courts. I do not mean to say that that would constitute a sufficient defense in a court of justice. I will express no opinion on that point. But this I will say, it is a matter of such a character that it appeals to the political power, and that the political power should be put in action by that consideration, and arrest the trial.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I will proceed to present what I consider will be likely to be the consequences of an opposite course, of permitting this trial to go on. If we exercise the power we possess, and subject these men to trial, and, if found guilty, to punishment; we place ourselves in a position which will lead to grave embarrassments in the future. It is only necessary for one to look abroad, and see the present position of the world, to understand the importance, at this time, of preserving inviolate the great principle that, under the law of nations, the soil of every country is to be considered sacred. A person guilty of any offense, whether against the moral or political laws of a country, if he escapes to another country, has always been considered as having found an asylum; and there never has been, nor is there now, any right acknowledged on the part of any country, from whose jurisdiction the fugitive has escaped, to reclaim him from the Power within whose limits he has taken refuge, unless that right was conceded by a special compact—unless given by a treaty for the extradition of criminals, which was in force at the time of the commission of the offense.

We stand, with respect to the other nations of the earth, in a peculiar position. This is a great Republic. A large proportion of those Powers with which we have relations have systems of Government based on principles different from those on which ours is based. We have refused to make extradition treaties with other countries, except with regard to particular classes of offenses. We have never entered into general treaties of that character. It has been our aim to make our country an asylum for the oppressed of other nations; and it is our wish, as it is our duty, to preserve American soil sacred from the intrusion of foreign Powers in pursuit of political offenders.

Now, sir, what is the spectacle presented at this day? We see the greatest military Power of the earth asserting rights unknown to the law of nations; claiming to influence the action of neighboring States, so that they shall violate the great principles of national law, and refuse the right of asylum to those who flee from her jurisdiction to escape the pressure of tyranny. Do we not know that France has exerted her power over the Swiss Cantons? Do we not know that she has exerted her power over the Kingdom of Sardinia? Do we not know that she has exerted her power, and with success, over that country, kindred to ours, which has hitherto been the secure asylum of the oppressed who fled from other States? Why, sir, looking back upon the history of the past, is it not known to all that the right of asylum was never questioned among civilized States? Do we not know that when military expeditions were headed by persons who had taken refuge in France, for the purpose of overthrowing the English Government, expelling the then reigning monarch, and placing in his stead one who had become a refugee, no such right was ever claimed or asserted by England? When those who invaded England, for the purpose of reestablishing the family of the Stuarts, escaped into France, they were safe; they found a secure asylum. And has not England also been, at all times, a secure asylum for those fleeing from France? Yes, sir; but how long will she continue to be so? Would she have been so to-day but for the resolution and firmness of the English people? Do we not know that now, within the last few months, the English Government had descended from its former high position on that question, and taken a different attitude? It is known to all that England—that mighty Power upon whose possessions “the sun never sets,” “the tap of whose morning drum, keeping company with the hours, circles the globe,” England, who has made it her boast that she was mistress of the seas; England, the jailor of the first Napoleon—that she, even she, has yielded to the pressure of that Power, and consented, through her rulers, to become the police officer, the bailiff of the third Napoleon.

Now, sir, to my mind, if we pursue the course that has been begun; if we subject these men to the jurisdiction of our courts, and attempt to visit them with punishment, under the circumstances that have transpired, when the fact is known that they were seized on a foreign soil, and brought by compulsion within our limits, I say we break down the principle which has been heretofore considered as sacred. We establish a precedent which will be imitated by every European despot, and we may expect to have incursions of that character made into our own country, and seizures of that kind made upon our own soil of political refugees; and if such circumstances should occur, such seizures should be made, with what face could we take the attitude which we took when the right of asylum was violated in the person of Ray? Would not our mouths be stopped with the declaration: “But you cannot complain; you have set the example?”

Mr. Chairman, I can see in the future unnumbered evils growing out of persistence in this course; and, for one, I shall myself protest, as I now do protest, against such a trial as without any shadow of right, and as wrong in morals, wrong in law, and dangerous in policy.

I shall, therefore, at the earliest opportunity, when it is in order to move to suspend the rules, again seek the opportunity of presenting the same resolution.

BOUNTY LAND TO PRIVATEERSMEN.

REMARKS OF HON. T. DAVIS,

OF MASSACHUSETTS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

May 25, 1858.

The House being in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. DAVIS said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: It was my privilege to introduce in the last Congress a bill which proposed to amend the bounty land act, so as to include in its provisions men engaged on board private armed vessels regularly commissioned by the United States. It will be remembered that the bill passed the House by a decided vote. I regret to say that upon its reaching the Senate it was allowed to die with the mass of unfinished business without a word being uttered in its favor. I know that this result was not consequent upon a feeling of hostility to the objects of the bill; nor do I regard it as indicative of indifference to the principles involved in its passage. I have again introduced the bill for the benefit of privateersmen, and I intend to follow it, actuated by no other motive than that which begins and ends in a sense of duty to a patriotic and praiseworthy class of citizens. As I have no arguments against the bill to combat, I shall have no occasion to speak at length upon the question now.

I endeavored, in a very plain manner, to present my views in reference to the subject in the last Congress. I attempted to show that the United States Government had encouraged privateering, and in all respects directed its affairs; that the Government was a participant in the profits of the business, and largely indebted to the system for the success which attended and resulted from the late war with England. I thought then, as I think now, that we have no reliable mode of assault and defense that is commensurate with the extent and importance of our maritime interests. I recognize no system of warfare that is so consistent with our ideas of popular government as that which grows out of the private-armed service; and my experience here has convinced me that we shall never be able to subordinate that system to any extensive organization of the national marine force.

Even in time of profound peace we are unable or unwilling to support a Navy sufficiently powerful to secure respect, in some instances, for the flag; and I despair of seeing the regular Navy assume the importance which the commerce of the country and the rights of American citizens abroad would seem at all times to demand. In the China seas, and at this moment, in the Gulf of Mexico, there is need of naval force. It seems to me, sir, that it would be extremely disastrous for us to occupy ground of hostility to the private-armed service. We have, I believe, between seventy and eighty ships of all classes, not more than fifty of which are seaworthy.

Here is a tabular statement of the comparative strength of the navies of the United States and Great Britain:

United States Navy.	Number of vessels.	Number of guns.
Sailing vessels.....	46	1,925
Steamers.....	19	302
Steam tenders.....	3	-
Storeships.....	5	16
Total.....	73	2,243
<hr/>
British Navy.	Number of vessels.	Number of guns.
Sailing vessels.....	233	9,004
Screw steamers.....	293	7,009
Steam gun-boats.....	161	161
Vessels for port service.....	110	110
Total.....	849	18,284

How utterly insignificant is our force, when placed beside a fleet of more than eight hundred national ships in the service of Great Britain, including her fleet of war steamers. Our immense commercial marine would suffer in a war with any important maritime power, and without privateers we should be driven from the face of the ocean. I have, sir, great faith in the privateersmen, and hold that to signify that we will encourage and support them in all legal adventure in time of war, is to take a step towards the continuance of peace. These men performed deeds of valor in the late war with Great Britain, that we are all proud of. For this service they have received nothing from the Government, while the seamen in the regular naval service have received, not only prize-money equal to the privateersmen, perhaps, but monthly wages and pensions, and, lastly, bounty land.

The fact should be borne in mind that during the whole time of the last war with England, the United States Government received double duties on prize goods brought in by the privateersmen, which aided the Treasury materially, to say nothing about the heavy receipts in the shape of charges. There are but few privateersmen of that war left to enjoy our bounty, or the honor that it may be within our power to bestow, if Congress should please to confer one or both of them; and up to this day it is certain that the few are living without the honorable recognition of the Government which profited so largely by their gallantry. It is easy to call them freebooters, but it is unjust as well. It is easy to say that they grew rich out of their plunder, but impossible to prove it by facts and figures. A few owners may have been successful, but the seamen had no opportunity to get rich in the private-armed service, and the fact should be understood. After allowing double duties, United States marshals' fees, agents' charges, and others, then the owners claimed one half of what remained, then the captain had ten shares, and the subordinate officers a few shares less, and the seamen one share of one half of what the Government left for the division. This, in almost all cases, was a miserable pittance, indeed; and if the Government had placed more national ships in commission, possibly the privateersmen would have preferred the service to the private-armed service. It is convenient to save the public land, some of us believe; but it is far from being economical to do so at the cost of ignoring the services of men who have periled everything to obtain and hold it.

In the report which accompanied the bill for the relief of privateersmen, some general facts are set forth to which I would invite the attention of the members of this House. I shall call the attention of gentlemen to the subject at an early day by asking the House to pass the bill under the operation of the previous question. This being done will prove no hardship to anybody. The matter is easily understood, and the session is so rapidly drawing to a close that I shall trust to the chance of getting a majority of votes for a measure that I feel certain would improve upon discussion.

My impression is that there can be not more than one thousand persons who can claim land under this bill. Originally there were about fifteen thousand privateersmen; many have died, many have received land for services rendered on board Government ships at some time during the war, and hence are not entitled under the pending bill. Those who would be entitled under the provisions of this bill are scattered broadcast over the country.

PACIFIC RAILROAD.

SPEECH OF HON. F. P. BLAIR, JR., OF MISSOURI,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
May 25, 1858.

The House being in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. BLAIR said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I have risen to offer my views on what I conceive to be a subject of transcendent interest to the whole country, and especially to my own constituents. I allude to the question of a great continental railroad, from the Mississippi valley to the Pacific ocean. And in the outset, I desire to meet an objection which is much insisted on by those even who hold themselves out as the friends of this great work; but which, if admitted, is fatal to any work which will fulfill the conditions of a continental railroad, in its broad and national sense, and compel us to content ourselves with a road sectional, and not national in its location, and which, whilst it will subserve the interests of that section of the country in which it is located, but little, if any, better than the transit routes across the Central American isthmus; it will be useless to the country at large, and therefore cannot in any sense be considered a national enterprise worthy of being undertaken by the Federal Government.

The objection to which I refer, and which has been insisted upon so much by those who hold themselves forth as the friends of a continental road, is, that it is impracticable to construct a railroad north of the thirty-fifth parallel of latitude, between the Mississippi river and the Pacific ocean; and there are those who go so far as to assert the impracticability of any route north of the thirty-second parallel.

The alleged impracticability of any route north of the lines I have named, is based upon the difficulties said to exist in the face of the country to be traversed, and the obstacles interposed by the climate. I hope to be able to dispose of both of these objections in a way that will be entirely satisfactory to the country, and to show that there is no natural obstacle, which may not be easily overcome, to the construction of a road which will traverse the center of the continent, upon a line susceptible of settlement and cultivation throughout its whole extent, and which will equally accommodate the people of all sections of the Union, and thus fulfill every condition required to make it a great continental highway, which can justly claim the power of the nation for its construction.

I contend that there is no greater fallacy than the assertion that the line known as the central route is impracticable for a railroad, or, indeed, that any of the routes which have been spoken of in the last few years are impracticable. The assertion originated doubtless in the rivalry between the various routes proposed, and has been propagated, as I shall show, unfairly by those whose duty it was to examine and report truthfully in regard to all. So far from its being true that there is any natural obstacle which renders the central route impracticable, it is perfectly notorious from the time that a route to the Pacific became a necessity it has been the only route which has been used. It was the route by which the emigrants to Oregon reached that Territory; and by it the golden State of California was peopled with such unexampled rapidity that it has been regarded as a marvel of progress. Never, in the history of mankind, has such an empire arisen from the wilderness as has grown up in the last decade upon the shores of the Pacific; and the living stream of population which has made this empire has poured across the continent upon that belt of territory known as the "central route," without aid or protection from the General Government, and indeed without a road except that which was made by nature. More recently our armies have marched across, and found no obstacle; even the army of Colonel Johnston might have proceeded to its destination but for the destruction of the grass by the Mormons, and the artificial barricades with which they have defended the passes of the mountains. Where were the obstacles so much spoken of when these thousands of unprotected emigrants, without other food for their horses and cattle than the natural forage of the country, its grasses, crossed these plains and the passes which pierce its chains of mountains? and why did they roll across the central route, in preference to the much vaunted routes on the thirty-fifth and thirty-second parallels? Because they only wished to accomplish their journey, and had no political objects to accomplish.

But it may be, and indeed has been, answered that those emigrants crossed the central route in the summer season; and that few have undertaken it in winter, when, as it is alleged, it is utterly impassable on account of snow. In comparing this route with those of the thirty-fifth and thirty-second parallels, it might be sufficient to reply that no emigrant has passed over either of these routes either in winter or summer; and the condemnation would thus apply to all alike. But a better reply is, that the summer season is the best for the overland journey; and for that reason the emigration selects that season, and the central as the best route. The objection to this route on the ground that it is obstructed by snows has, however, been so industriously and persistently urged as to require some attention. I call the attention of the House to the fact that the climate of the western part of this continent, like the western parts of the continent of Europe, is much milder than that of the eastern part. Italy, which is semi-tropical in its climate, is in the same latitude as New England; and the winter climate of Oregon, on the Pacific, which is in the latitude of Maine, is as mild as the winter climate of the Carolinas on the Atlantic. In forming a judgment, therefore, of the climate of the mountain regions on the western part of this continent, there are many circumstances to be considered, and which must enter into our calculations, without which, our conclusions will necessarily be erroneous.

At this point I shall call the attention of the House to a map of the "isothermal lines in North America," as determined by the Smithsonian Institution," and published in the agricultural report of the Patent Office for 1856. Upon this map are marked, by lines stretching across the continent from the Atlantic to the Pacific, the summer and winter climate and the climate of the whole year. And it will be seen that the winter climate of the thirty-third parallel of latitude on the Atlantic corresponds with the winter climate of the thirty-sixth and thirty-seventh parallels of latitude of the great mountain region of the western part of the continent. The climate for the year of the thirty-seventh parallel at the mouth of the Chesapeake bay corresponds with the climate for the year of the forty-eighth parallel in the great mountain region of the West; and the line which marks the winter climate of the thirty-seventh parallel on the Atlantic strikes the Pacific at the forty-ninth parallel and runs through the mountain region of the West from the forty-first to the forty-ninth parallel. The summer climate of Charleston corresponds with the summer climate of the western mountains in the forty-fourth parallel of latitude. These lines, however, do not show the actual climate of the mountains, for that is modified by the elevation of the mountains themselves. Professor Henry, in the memoir on meteorology explanatory of this map, contained in the same work and on page 483, speaking of these lines, says:

"They do not, however, in all cases, exhibit the actual temperature of the surface, for in order to show their relations, and render them comparable with each other and with similar lines in other parts of the world, it is necessary that the observed temperature in elevated positions, should be reduced to the level of the sea; and in the construction of this map allowance has consequently been made for decreasing temperature of one degree for every three hundred and thirty-three feet of altitude. The map, therefore, will present to the eye the lines along which the temperature of the air would be equal for the periods mentioned, were we to suppose the mountain ranges entirely removed and the air brought down to the level of the sea."

* * * * *

"These lines, at a glance, exhibit remarkable curvatures, particularly in the western portion of the United States, indicating a great increase of temperature in this region beyond that of the eastern and middle portion."

It may be fairly estimated, from this data, and from experience of travelers, that the highest elevations in the great mountain region on the line of the central route, do not give a greater degree of cold in winter than is experienced in the New England States. Shall it be said that any difficulties, by reason of cold or snow, can be found in any part of New England to the construction or operation of railroads? There are probably more railroads in successful operation in New England than in any other part of the United States of similar extent. It is singular, but not less true, that the further north you go in the United States, and the more snow you encounter, the more railroads you find. This may be accounted for on different grounds, not necessary to mention here; but it is, nevertheless, a complete answer to all the noise and nonsense we have heard about the impossibility of building and operating a railroad upon the central route on account of snow and cold. Away with this pretext! The snows of Russia, which overwhelmed Napoleon's victorious army of five hundred thousand men, and annihilated his power in the hour of triumph, does not impede the railroad between Moscow and St. Petersburg; and, sir, it is idle and foolish to say that we shall not be able to find men both willing and capable of constructing and operating a railroad on the great lines of commerce through our continent. I repeat once more, that there is no physical obstruction, and none occasioned by the character of the climate, which makes the central route impracticable. But it is not to be denied that there is a great and formidable obstruction, and one which, for the present, I fear, is insurmountable. This formidable and only difficulty is the so-called Democratic organization, or its representative, the present so-called Democratic Administration. So long as this organization is represented by an Administration—that is, so long as the so-called Democratic party is in power—this nation will have no continental railroad. We might as well make up our minds to this; and if we want such a road, we must first put our hands to the work of breaking down this organization, driving it from power, and thus remove the only obstruction which prevents the accomplishment of the greatest enterprise in the world; which will enrich the nation beyond the power of computation; which is to add to its strength, and bind us to our sister States of the Pacific with "hooks of steel."

I have said that the so-called Democratic party, or Administration, was the obstruction, and the only one, to building a central and therefore a national highway to the Pacific ocean. I will make good my words by proofs. It is well known that a majority of the members of that party are hostile on principle to the Pacific railroad, and their feeling upon this subject may be gathered from Senator Mason, of Virginia, who said, the other day, in answer to a question of Mr. Gwin, that he would rather lose California and our Pacific possessions than sacrifice the principle upon which he opposed the construction of the Pacific railroad. Mr. Mason is one of the representative men of the southern party which dominates the Democratic organization and gives it law. These men will vote for no railroad to the Pacific which is not, in fact, a southern road; and some of them, I believe, will not even vote for a southern road, unless it shall be built south of our territories, and in some foreign country. Nor will they allow the party with which they act to place itself in a position to support any national road.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. To what party does the gentleman from Missouri refer, when he says that there is a party organized in this country to build a railroad through the southern section of the country, and only through the southern section of the country?

Mr. BLAIR. The gentleman did not understand me. I said that the party to which the gentleman belongs is opposed, upon principle, to the construction of any railroad, unless it should pass through the southern part of the continent, and very far south at that.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. I understand that the President of the United States put his recommendation of that route upon the ground that it was the best and the shortest route, and not because it was a southern route.

Mr. BLAIR. It is easy to find plausible grounds for any recommendation.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. Does the gentleman deny that it is the nearest and the best?

Mr. BLAIR. I deny that there is any route there at all which can be operated.

The southern faction having the power of numbers in the organization, force the candidates of their party to succumb to their views, and dictate absolutely its policy. In proof of this, we see that whilst Mr. Buchanan was allowed to say he favored a Pacific railroad before the election, he comes out in his message in favor of the thirty-second parallel, which is about equivalent to the route by the isthmus; and, if rumor can be relied upon, he has made known in advance, to two Senators who went to see him in regard to the bill reported in the Senate, and which located the line along the central route, his intention to veto the bill, and his hostility to any except the route along the Mexican frontiers. Mr. Buchanan, like Mr. Pierce, and like any other national Democrat who may be President, is the creature of the majority of that organization which supports him in these Halls, and will do their bidding at any cost.

When the surveys for a route for a Pacific railroad were ordered by Congress, it was understood, and indeed no such order would have been made by Congress upon any other understanding, that the central route was to be surveyed by Colonel Frémont, who, having passed over all the different routes, had given his opinion in favor of the central. But the Secretary of War declined to give that employment to Colonel Frémont, on the ground, as I have understood, that he was not then an officer of the United States Army. He, however, placed Mr. Stevens in charge of the survey of the northern route, although he was not then, I believe, an officer of the Army. Captain Gunnison was placed in charge of the survey of the central route, but his instructions expressly limited him to a survey of a part of the route only; and this officer, without a previous knowledge of the country, or experience in railroad engineering, made the most egregious blunders in the survey of that part of the survey intrusted to him, as I shall presently show, and reported it impracticable. It is natural to suppose that renewed efforts would have been made to find a practicable route on this line, which was the only one which accommodated the entire people of the country. Nothing of the sort, however, was attempted; it was condemned by the Government, and its condemnation heralded as a triumph.

But on the extreme southern routes a different conduct was observed. When it was discovered that there did not exist a practicable route on the thirty-second parallel, within our territory, an ambassador was sent immediately to Mexico to negotiate and purchase a strip of territory from that Republic, where it was supposed that a road could be made, and Arizona was purchased for $10,000,000. Finding that water was not to be had to quench the thirst even of the Government parties sent there to explore, a military command and a topographical officer have been detained there ever since, to bore artesian wells in order to overcome this difficulty, and ships have been sent to Asia and Africa to buy camels and import them for the purpose of traversing the sandy deserts in these southern parallels, thirty-two and thirty-five. It is said that water has been discovered by means of the wells, and that the camels have been successful in traveling ten days without water. The fact that the camels can endure ten days thirst will hardly invite to the country in which such endurance was imposed upon them, the people necessary to build and maintain a railroad, nor will the circumstance that artesian wells are being bored for a supply of water, recommend the route where those wells are necessary, over the central route in which there has been found an ample supply for thirty thousand emigrants in one year, and the armies which have been recently sent out to Utah.

Why was it that an appropriation of $10,000,000 to purchase Arizona, appropriations to import camels, to bore artesian wells, and to print an endless series of the most costly books—books which will cost, I understand, a million and a half or two million dollars—could be made during the dominancy of the so-called Democracy, and no effort whatever made to find a line for the central route after the report of Gunnison was received? The reason is transparent. It was not the object of the Government to find a central route; their effort was, and has been, and will continue to be, so long as the southern interest dominates the Government, to condemn that route, and carry the railroad, if made at all, to the extreme southern verge of our territories. In further confirmation of this view, I instance the action of the present Government upon the overland mail route. This mail was authorized by Congress upon the express understanding that the contractors should select the route upon which to carry the mail. The Postmaster General, with the sanction of the Cabinet and President, in violation of the express terms of the law, refused to give the contract to any one unless the contractor would agree to carry it on the route along the Mexican frontier on the thirty-second parallel.

I assert again, in view of these facts, that it is the Democratic organization, and its instruments in the Government, which constitute the only obstruction to a central Pacific railroad; and those who desire to see this glorious work achieved must first displace this obstruction. I shall, therefore, propose that Congress should take from the hands of the Executive, which has shown itself unworthy of confidence in this matter, all power over the subject, and pass an act to build the Pacific railroad between some central point in the Mississippi valley and San Francisco, and name, in the body of the act, commissioners who have the confidence of the nation, men having a competent and practical knowledge of railroad engineering, to locate the road on the best and most practicable ground between the points named. The present Administration, and, indeed, any Administration dominated by the same influence, cannot be trusted to the execution of this great work, and therefore Congress should take the matter in hand, and confide its execution to friendly and faithful hands.

While, however, the pseudo Democracy, through its chiefs, under a malign influence, have betrayed the great interests of the nation, and striven to convert this great national work into a sectional affair, happily for the nation there have been those who were prompted by the lofty motives of patriotism, and the love of an honorable renown to give themselves to the task of achieving this great enterprise of a continental highway. Among these, the youthful and intrepid Frémont, who, having led the way by an examination of the whole region lying between the Mississippi river and the Pacific, and opened up that vast country to the astonished vision of the civilized world, and who, having added California to our empire, determined, although no longer in the service of his country, to open the road to the empire won by his own valor. It was in the depth of winter, and at his own expense, that he determined to attempt this new labor, and encounter the perils and difficulties which attended the attempt to pass through hostile tribes of Indians with an insufficient escort and scanty provisions for subsistence. But the attempt was made, and with success. The result was then given to the world. He had neither the time nor the means of working out the observations then made so laboriously and painfully, but has since completed his calculations, for the purpose of publication—not, however, at the expense of the Government. The intrinsic value of the work renders it unnecessary to resort to such a plan, and enables him to find a publisher. From this work, now almost ready for the press, Colonel Frémont has allowed me to use a chapter, in which he sums up the results of his labors on that portion of the line which extends from Kansas City, on the frontiers of Missouri, through the Cochetope pass. I give the chapter and shall let it speak for itself. It is illustrated by the map which I hold in my hand, and which has been constructed with the greatest care and accuracy by Colonel Frémont himself.

The chapter is written in journal form, the date the 14th of December, 1854, when he had passed the great dividing line of the continent and surmounted the greatest difficulty to be encountered upon the whole route, and his review of the line from the Missouri border to the crest of the continent upon which he then stood, will strike every one with its candor, power, and beauty. He says:

"We had now crossed the main dividing ridge, and, with the first fall of snow, pitched our camp upon the Pacific waters. We had left a comparatively open country for one thoroughly mountainous, to which the accident of dark and stormy weather lent a peculiarly rugged aspect. To our eyes, as well as to our minds, the change was abrupt and impressive. Our animals were poor, and our provisions nearly gone, and, in face of the rugged country and rugged season, our condition was by no means encouraging. Behind us the country had been cheerful with sunshine, the rare falling weather had been only autumn rains, and the country—grass-covered and entirely free from snow—had made traveling pleasant, and had given our animals the best chances for food which a hostile season could afford. Abundance of game had kept the party in good health and good spirits. The face of the country had been remarkably easy of travel, constituting, in its general character, an open plain, broken up to the crest which we had just crossed only by a single mountain range of singularly easy passage, and our road, of nearly a thousand miles, had been generally along the level lands of streams. Probably another thousand remained to be struggled over before we could reach the western settlements, and winter had suddenly come down upon the country, driven off the game, and shut us in with a narrow circle of falling snow. This afternoon a meager hour of faint sunshine lit up the snowy crests of the mountains, and showed the multitudinous ridges, which now stretch almost uninterruptedly westward to the waves of the Pacific ocean.

"The party had now crossed the summit-level of the continent, the highest point and most difficult which lie in way of the railroad line to the Pacific, and this is, therefore, the fittest place in the journal for such brief summary of the facts which had been collected, so far as they go to vindicate the character of the country for railroad constructions, and its capacity to support population.

"But, in this description of the country, and the obstacles on the line over which the party traveled, it is not by any means proposed to put it forward as the fit line for a railway. It was simply an exploring line—if, under the circumstances of adverse season and restricted means, it can properly be called so—which, in its general direction to the mountain passes, was governed in choice of route by the protection that wooded streams afford in the occurrence of the sudden snow storms, which are dangerous on the open plains.

"The region traversed under these circumstances lies mainly between the thirty-eighth and thirty-ninth parallels of latitude, and extends from the mouth of the Kansas to the Cochetope pass, twelve degrees in longitude. By the traveled line, the whole distance to this point is eight hundred and fifty-three miles, of which, eight hundred was in the valley of the Kansas, Arkansas, and Del Norte. But three obstructions are encountered along the entire line; the prairie highlands between the Kansas and Arkansas rivers, the Wet Mountains range at the head of the Arkansas, and the Rocky Mountain range at the heads of the Del Norte and Colorado. The distance traveled in the Kansas valley was about two hundred and fifty miles, along which the average ascent is less than three feet (two and three quarters) to the mile, and the country, for about two hundred miles, well wooded and beautifully fertile. At an elevation of one thousand three hundred and fifty feet above the sea, the route left the Kansas to cross the prairie—uplands lying between it and the Arkansas, and which constitute the first obstructions. It reached the Arkansas at an elevation of two thousand six hundred and seventy feet, the intervening distance being about one hundred and fifty miles. The general rise of the country westward, between these two points, is about nine feet to the mile. In its course over these plains, the route, for about eighty miles in a westerly direction, was upon streams tributary to the Arkansas. In crossing the uplands between these, the inclinations were from twenty to forty feet in the mile—generally about one in two hundred—the summit land being generally from one to two hundred feet above the streams. These are continuously wooded along their banks, and the soil good, and their valleys well adapted to settlement. The high plains entirely bare of timber, are covered with good grasses, and were occupied, in November, by multitudes of buffalo, which find there abundant pasturage. The buffalo sometimes winter on these plains.

"Up the Arkansas to the mouth of the Huerfano, the distance traveled was two hundred and thirty miles, the average fall of river for one hundred and forty of that distance being less than seven feet; and thence to the mouth of the Huerfano, less than ten feet to the mile. For about eighty miles of the lower part of the route, the river was nearly destitute of timber; the remaining one hundred and fifty miles it was abundantly wooded for settlements, soil good, and grasses for pasturage abundant. The Huerfano at its mouth is four thousand three hundred and seventy-five feet above the sea, and at its head—waters in the Wet Mountains about nine thousand. The course is in a broad, open-lying, well-wooded, and grass-covered valley, which makes an admirably unobstructed approach directly into the mountain passes. On either side it is separated from similar streams by the highlands, in which the mountain spurs terminate. From the mouth of the river to the Utah Pass at one of its head springs, and at the immediate foot of the pass, the route traced was one hundred and twenty-four miles, and the average grade thirty-six feet to the mile. From the mouth of the river, the point of the White Oak Mountains, the distance along the river valley is seventy-eight miles, and the average fall of the river twenty-two feet to the mile. Above this point the river lies in an amphitheater of mountains, but still preserves its broad bottoms and open valleys, the face of the country well grassed, with open smooth ridges and flats among wooded summits and wooded ravines. This character of country continued near to the very summits of the mountains, the grassy slopes reaching directly up to the rock which makes the immediate crest of the range. Here the river receives many small tributaries, and there are many sheltered nooks and coves of the mountains beautifully adapted for settlements; the soil fertile with sunny exposures, sheltered by the mountains from the prevailing winds. Timber, in quality and size suitable for railroad constructions and farming purposes, is abundant, many of the trees squaring fully a foot; and coal is found in the neighboring mountains. This character of country extends to over eight thousand feet in altitude; above it, nearly to ten thousand feet, grasses are abundant and nutritious. The nutritious grasses and good and abundant waters and mild climate would make that region peculiarly adapted for dairy farms.

"The mountain climate is altogether more agreeable and milder than in the open plains two hundred miles to the eastward. The mountain ranges protect the country lying along their base. On the open plains the snow falls deeper and lies longer and the winter climate is usually much more severe. On the 10th of December and near the mountain summits, the weather was mild and pleasant, and, except in the deep mountain ravines, the country was entirely free from snow.

"On both sides of the valley, bordering ridges afford every facility for easy development into the pass, which, at its summit on the narrow backbone of the ridge, is nine thousand four hundred feet above the sea. On the western side the descent is very abrupt to the Del Norte waters, at an elevation of eight hundred feet. At this place and about this elevation, a tunnel through the ridge would be about a thousand yards in length. The development of the line would probably increase the distance from the Arkansas perhaps ten miles, and the resulting railway distance from the mouth of the Huerfano to this point would be about one hundred and thirty-five miles, upon an average grade of thirty-four feet to the mile.

"From the Utah Pass to that of the Cochetope, the distance is a little over one hundred miles. Following the mountain foot around to the head of the San Luis valley, the line entered, at an elevation of seven thousand six hundred feet, the valley of the Sahwach river, which makes the approach to the Cochetope Pass in the main Rocky Mountain range.

"From the San Luis valley to the immediate foot of the pass, at an elevation of nine thousand eight hundred and twenty feet, the distance is about forty miles, and the average grade fifty-five feet to the mile. From this point, a tunnel of two thousand yards would carry the line to a conterminous elevation on the western side of the mountain, three hundred and fifty feet below the summit, and near to which our camp was pitched on the 14th December. Upon this day the snow in the pass, newly fallen, was four inches deep, and winter began regularly in the mountain region. A few days since, there was nothing to remind the traveler that he was approaching the summit line of a great mountain chain which divides the waters of a continent. The grassy and wooded slopes and rounded summits, the mild and open weather, the uncovered grasses, green in the prolonged sunshine of the Indian summer, were all unexpected in the heart of a mountain region.

"From knowledge obtained upon the spot and from report, there are doubtless other passes better adapted to railway purposes; but our condition did not permit us to make any examination outside the line of travel.

"Briefly, the results worked out in the journey to this place, supported by a previous journey at the same season of the year, go to show that the mountain regions exhibit no extraordinary rigor of climate. The autumns are prolonged and open. Up to the middle of December, there had been no snow either to impede travel, or to drive cattle from their open range, or to render shelter for them necessary.

"With the exception of about one hundred and fifty miles upon the high plains, or the Arkansas river, the route is continuously wooded; but along the whole distance, pasturage is excellent and abundant.

"In capacity to support population, in salubrity of climate and fertility of soil, the Rocky Mountain ranges which the line passed, are singular and exceptional. Singular in the great number of open, fertile valleys, and perhaps exceptional in the general availability and open character of the country, and in the remarkably small proportion of rugged and impracticable ground, when compared with European and especially Asiatic mountains.

"The line is direct, and the inclinations easy; the heavier grades together and continuous, and none heavy enough to make snow an impediment upon the rails. Upon the whole line, there are but two great obstructions, easily overcome by moderate tunneling and lesser grades than are now in use upon railways in England over which is passing incessantly the largest traffic of the world."

The most implicit reliance is due to the statements which Colonel Frémont has here given to the public, and on which he has here staked his character. In all the surveys with which he has covered the western half of our continent, and which have given him a renown throughout the civilized world, and which have been scrutinized by many men entirely competent to detect and expose an error, none have yet been able to detect a flaw. He has since been indorsed by half the nation, and it is not to be supposed that he would put forth a statement of which he did not feel perfectly secure, and hazard that high reputation which he has so gloriously won and worn with a modesty so admirable.

I desire now to contrast his work with that of Captain Gunnison, who reported this line as impracticable, and it must be evident that the latter has committed an error, unpardonable, under the circumstances, unless it can be accounted for upon the supposition of his inexperience in railroad engineering. It is clear to me that his error has arisen from this fact, and that in running his line up the Huerfano, he has followed the water level from the mouth of that river, (and the other streams which he followed,) until he came up to the mountains themselves and found the grades too precipitous to be practicable for a railroad, instead of developing a route by working up gradually on the high lands at the mouth of the river, and thus averaging his grades through the whole distance, from the mouth of the river to the highest crest of the pass by which the mountain range was to be crossed. A man might as well attempt to follow the water line of Niagara river, from Lewistown to the great falls, with a railroad, and mount the falls perpendicularly, instead of beginning to develop the route by a gradual and easy ascent from Lewistown, by which means a railroad has been actually constructed between the points named, upon grades which were perfectly practicable.

Captain Gunnison has either fallen into this error, or he has failed to find the pass in the mountains which Frémont traversed, and therefore this negative testimony of an officer, without experience in railroad engineering, of his inability to find a pass, biased, too, as we may well conceive him to have been, by the wishes of those who sent him, should not be allowed to weigh against the direct and affirmative testimony of a man of experience as a railroad engineer, whose reputation stands as high as that of any man upon this continent. I assume, therefore, that the results which I have read to the House, and which show that the great dividing line of the continent can be passed by a railroad upon a grade of fifty-five feet to the mile, and which is less by about one half than the grade to be overcome upon any other route, is established by the most incontestable proof. Beyond the Cochetope Pass, the country is difficult, but entirely practicable, as is shown by the report of Colonel Frémont, published upon his return from his last expedition. From this report I make the following extract:

"Our progress in this mountainous region was necessarily slow; and during ten days which it occupied us to pass through about one hundred miles of the mountainous country bordering the eastern side of the Upper Colorado valley, the greatest depth of the snow was among the pines and aspens on the ridges, about two and a half feet, and in the valleys about six inches. The atmosphere is too cold and dry for much snow, and the valleys, protected by the mountains, are comparatively free from it, and warm. We here found villages of Utah Indians in their wintering ground, in little valleys along the foot of the higher mountains, and bordering the more open country of the Colorado valley. Snow was here (December 25) only a few inches deep—the grass generally appearing above it, and there being none under trees and on southern hill sides.

"The horses of the Utahs were living on the range, and, notwithstanding that they were used in hunting, were in excellent condition. One which we had occasion to kill for food had on it about two inches of fat, being in as good order as any buffalo we had killed in November on the eastern plains. Over this valley country—about one hundred and fifty miles across—the Indians informed us that snow falls only a few inches in depth; such as we saw it at the time.

"The immediate valley of the Upper Colorado for about one hundred miles in breadth, and from the 7th to the 22d January, was entirely bare of snow, and the weather resembled that of autumn in this country. The line here entered the body of mountains known as the Wah-satch and An-ter-ria ranges, which are practicable at several places in this part of their course; but the falling snow and desolate condition of many a pass again interfered to impede examinations. They lie between the Colorado valley and the Great Basin, and at their western base are established the Mormon settlements of Parowan and Cedar City. They are what are called fertile mountains, abundant in water, wood, and grass, and fertile valleys, offering inducements to settlement and facilities for making a road. These mountains are a great storehouse of materials in the construction and maintenance of the road, and are solid foundations to build up the future prosperity of the rapidly-increasing Utah State.

"Salt is abundant on the eastern border, mountains—as the Sierra de Sal—being named from it. In the ranges lying behind the Mormon settlements, among the mountains through which the line passes, are accumulated a great wealth of iron and coal, and extensive forests of heavy timber. These forests are the largest I am acquainted with in the Rocky Mountains, being in some places twenty miles in depth, of continuous forest; the general growth lofty and large, frequently over three feet in diameter, and sometimes reaching five feet—the red spruce and yellow pine predominating. At the actual southern extremity of the Mormon settlements, consisting of the two inclosed towns of Parowan and Cedar City, near to which our line passed, a coal mine has been opened for about eighty yards, and iron works already established. Iron here occurs in extraordinary masses, in some parts accumulated into mountains, which comb out, in crests of solid iron, thirty feet thick and a hundred yards long.

"In passing through this bed of mountains, about fourteen days had been occupied, from January 24 to February 7, the deepest snow we here encountered being about up to the saddle skirts, or four feet; this occurring only in occasional drifts in the passes on northern exposures, and in the small mountain flats hemmed in by woods and hills. In the valley it was sometimes a few inches deep, and as often none at all. On our arrival at the Mormon settlements, February 8th, we found it a few inches deep, and were there informed that the winter had been unusually long-continued and severe, the thermometer having been as low as 17° below zero, and more snow having fallen than in all the previous winters together, since the establishment of this colony.

"At this season their farmers had usually been occupied with their plows, preparing the land for grain."

In a letter recently received from Colonel Frémont, he expresses the belief that there are passes through the main dividing ridge still better than the Cochetope, and especially in reference to the country beyond. He says:

"In this view a better line can be found, and quite as direct, around the head of the San Luis valley, passing directly from the Arkansas waters to those of Grand river, or from the San Luis valley more in the neighborhood of the Cochetope, north or south of it."

And he inclined, in his own mind, to a line southward, around the waters of the Eagle Tail, a stream laid down in his map of 1848 as Eagle river: this river being a large stream, and cutting down into cañons, while the higher country is fertile, wooded, and grassy, with small streams, unobstructed, and running through open ground. Among other reasons inclining him to this course, he says:

"I had heard from Mr. Walker, and other mountain men, who had been with trapping parties in the region of the Lower Colorado, that the river was navigable for a very considerable distance up from the mouth of the Gila. Walker said that he knew it to be navigable for at least one hundred and fifty miles above the mouth of the Gila. As the two main forks drain a mountain region of great extent, and carry down a large volume of water, I have thought it probable that the main river is navigable to our present means of navigation, from their junction, which is a little north of the thirty-eighth parallel."

He remarks further, that—

"In crossing the country, the central route passes, in the San Luis valley, a point which would become a center of population, from which a railroad could be thrown down through New Mexico, and where an interior city would grow up. In passing the southern Mormon settlements—another station for way travel—there would be another such point. If, now, the Colorado be navigable at the junction, you see at once what a reason and support it would give to the central line. It would be like Pittsburgh at the junction of the Monongahela and Allegheny—the Pittsburgh of the Pacific. The head of navigation to a region of such great extent, crossed by a railroad uniting the two oceans, would certainly become a grand commercial point. If you will go to the trouble to look at the map to which I have referred you, and bear in mind that the true junction is above the thirty-eighth parallel, you will see that the idea has force. Beyond the Colorado, I judged from my examination that there is no serious impediment to carrying a railway line into the basin. As to where the line should cross the basin, whether by the Humboldt river, or by the line of the Rio Virgin, or by an intervening line, must of course depend upon the point at which it shall be decided to cross the Sierra Nevada."

For that division of the route which lies between San Francisco, crossing the Sierra Nevada, and connecting with the line of Colonel Frémont, in the Great Basin, I submit the following letter from William J. Lewis, a railroad engineer of great eminence, who was recently the chief engineer of the proposed railroad from San Francisco to San José; in 1837, he was one of the first officers in the survey of the proposed railroad from Charleston to Cincinnati, under General McNeill and Captain W. G. Williams. He had charge of one of the mountain divisions, and Frémont was in one of the divisions near him, making his first experience in engineering; it was here that Frémont made Lewis's acquaintance, in whose ability and experience he has the greatest confidence.

SAN FRANCISCO, September 29, 1857.

DEAR SIR: You may recollect that in conversation with you on the steamer John L. Stebbins I expressed an opinion that a practicable route could be obtained for the Pacific railroad crossing the Sierra Nevada at Johnson's Pass, near the head of the south fork of the American river. In 1855, Mr. Sherman Day made the location of a wagon road from the vicinity of Placerville to Carey's mill, in Carson, valley crossing the Sierra at Johnson's Pass. No part of his road had an ascent over five degrees, and the estimated cost of construction was only about one hundred thousand dollars. I send you a copy of the map made by him of the country in the vicinity of the road, and a profile of his located line. Assuming Sacramento as a point of beginning for the proposed railroad, the road would strike the western base of the foot hills of the Sierra Nevada, south of the junction of Weber creek with the south fork of the American river, and follow it to Slippery Ford. The distance from Slippery Ford to Lake Valley does not exceed four miles, and a tunnel at this point is the only serious difficulty in the construction of the road. The outlet of Lake Bigler is at the northern end, and its waters flow to the desert west of the Sierra through Truckee river. Whether the railroad should follow the shores of the lake and the valley of the Truckee river until it reaches the general level of the Great Basin, or should cross the ridge between the lake and Mormon station at some low point, and pursue a more direct route towards Salt Lake City, can only be determined by future surveys. The descent from the lake to the western plains is so entirely within the limits of railroad gradients, that I entertain no doubt that a practicable route can be found on one of the two lines indicated.

Let us now see what will be the grades on the proposed line. Beginning at the Sacramento, (sixty feet above tide,) and allowing the road to rise in the first twenty miles at fifteen feet to the mile, we arrive at the western base of the foot hills, at an elevation of three hundred and sixty feet. The distance of this point from Slippery Ford by the present road is seventy miles; but by the winding line of a railroad will be at least ninety miles.

On a grade of sixty feet to the mile, the road would rise in these ninety miles five thousand four hundred feet, and attain an altitude of five thousand seven hundred and sixty feet or four hundred and two feet above the wagon road at Slippery Ford. The height of the wagon road (which is fifty feet above the river) at Lake Valley is five thousand nine hundred and sixty-one, so that to bring us to the same level, there would be a rise of two hundred feet in the length of the tunnel—say four miles. Having now traced the route from the Sacramento to the western slope of the Sierra Nevada, and the waters flowing into the Great Basin, let us make an estimate of the extreme cost from Sacramento to this point:

From Sacramento to western foot of Fool Hills, twenty miles, at $30,000 a mile.....	$600,000
From western base of Fool Hills to Slippery Ford, ninety miles, at $100,000 a mile.....	9,000,000
From Slippery Ford to Lake Valley tunnel, four miles, or twenty-one thousand one hundred and twenty feet, at $201 a foot.....	4,321,000
Total from Sacramento.....	$13,821,000
And from Sacramento to Benicia.....	3,000,000
Total cost from Benicia.....	$16,821,000

Let us compare this with the cost of the road on the Noble's Pass route, west of the Sierra, as estimated by Captain Humphreys and Lieutenant Warren in their report on the explorations for railroad routes, page 66:

Portions of the pass of the western ridge of the Sierra Nevada, 17 miles, at $100,000 per mile.....	$1,700,000
From the head of the first cañon on Sacramento river to the termination of the mountain passage of the river, seventeen miles above Fort Reading, 135.5 miles, at $150,000 per mile.....	20,325,000
Thence to Fort Reading, on the Sacramento river, 17 miles, and thence to Benicia, 180 miles, being about 200 miles, at $50,000 per mile.....	10,000,000

Cost on Noble's Pass route, west of the summit, $32,025,000
Cost on South Fork route, west of Bigler lake.....	16,821,000

Difference..... $15,201,000

From Benicia to Noble's Pass.....	352 miles.
From Benicia to Bigler lake valley.....	184 "

Saving in distance..... 168 miles.

I have now given you my speculations on this matter; but I would much prefer that you should have an interview with Mr. Day and Mr. Goddard, both of whom are familiar with the topography of the country in the vicinity of the proposed line, and would be glad to aid you in your inquiries.

Yours, very respectfully, WM. J. LEWIS.
Colonel JOHN C. FREMONT.

Upon this letter of Lewis and the map of Sherman Day which accompanies it, and which I hold in my hand, Colonel Fremont, in a letter dated New York, February 28, 1858, says it shows—

"That at the first place in the Sierra Nevada where the necessities of the settlement require communications, a good wagon road was easily found, and that this wagon road survey shows also that a railroad is entirely practicable in the same place; that this is in the line of the proposed central road, between the thirty-eighth and thirty-ninth parallels, that any line coming across the Great Basin would reach San Francisco bay by a very considerable saving in distance and expense, compared with any other and less direct line running more to the northward. For instance, the surveyed line with which Lewis institutes his comparison, and which line in coming from the eastward very nearly joins Lewis's, (both I believe being then upon the Salmon Trout or Truckee river as it is generally called.) Take notice that the Rocky Mountains and the Sierra Nevada are great mountain chains, and that there are two passes through them, (Sherman Day's road pass and the Cochetope) and almost exactly in the same latitude, both being between the thirty-eighth and thirty-ninth parallels. Remember, too, in regard to this line of Sherman Day's, that the information which it gives us is the accidental result of the first survey which the necessities of population required to be made. Can we not with certainty expect much better, when the Sierra Nevada comes to be surveyed with the direct purpose of building a railroad across it?"

Again, speaking of the two passes in the two great chains and the country between, he says:

"My judgment is unhesitatingly, that the country between these points is entirely practicable for a railroad. And does it not appear upon its face absurd to say, when the two great chains of the continent are practicable, the intervening country is not so? When droves of cattle of all kinds by thousands, wagons and caravans are passing constantly over it in its natural state, that the railroad science of this day cannot get across? A man's ignorance must be audacious when he can undertake to publish it in maintaining such an assertion."

It will thus be seen that the central route, running for its whole length between the thirty-eighth and thirty-ninth parallels of latitude, is firmly and conclusively established. Upon this line stands the capital of the nation, on the Atlantic slope of our continent; fixed here because it was central to the North and South. It is the line of the Ohio river in almost its whole length; the line upon which stands St. Louis, the great central city of the Mississippi valley; the line of the Missouri river for three hundred miles beyond, to where it defects abruptly to the north; the line of the Kansas river, which is navigable for near one hundred miles due west, thence stretching up the Arkansas river, and the Huernano, and crossing the mountains, and striking the Colorado river upon the same parallel, at its true junction with Grand river, and to which it was supposed by Colonel Fremont to be navigable from the sea. The supposition has since proven to be true, by the survey of Lieutenant Ives; and thence through the Great Basin by Parowan and Cedar City, and the great iron mountains, to Carson's valley; and thence in the same parallel, by the route indicated by Mr. Lewis, to San Francisco on the thirty-eighth parallel. A route cultivable and inhabitable throughout its whole extent, with water, grass, wood, coal, and iron, and capable of supporting a population for the construction and maintenance of the road, when built. This route follows the lines of commerce, the center of population, and of our territories upon both oceans. In all these respects it fulfills the conditions of a national work and should be constructed by the nation.

I have spoken of the persistent efforts of the pseudo Democracy to undervalue the central route, and force the construction of a railroad upon a remote southern route; but there are also efforts from other quarters equally hostile, and somewhat more insidious. I shall, I hope, be pardoned for a brief notice of one of these, since those who have made themselves prominent in the affair have sought to cover themselves by taking the name of the central route for a southern one.

One of my colleagues [Mr. PHELPS] has favored me with a pamphlet copy of a letter which bears his name, and is addressed to certain citizens of the State of Arkansas. Upon reading the letter, I have been struck with the propriety which dictated its address to the citizens of that State, and I am constrained to say that it would have been in all respects appropriate if it had emanated from an Arkansas member. I will read some of the passages which seem to me the most striking. He is arguing that the route is best, even for the few lowland Gulf countries of Georgia, Alabama, and Mississippi, and says:

"My answer is, that the road from Vicksburg should go directly to Shreveport, and to Preston on the Red river, and thence northwest up the False Washita river, and intersect the Charleston, Memphis, and Albuquerque road in the beautiful valley of the Canadian river, at or near the one hundredth degree of longitude, some five hundred and fifty miles from Vicksburg. That, in my humble opinion, is the true Vicksburg route, and for two reasons: it is the best and shortest route, and it would develop a fertile and unsettled country of vast importance to the trade and strength of the South."

It is "the trade and strength of the South" to which this road is of such vast importance. He goes on in the same strain:

"The route from Vicksburg up the Red and False Washita rivers is, therefore, (as is easily observable from a map,) the shortest and the best. Not only so, but second, this right-hand route along the Red and False Washita rivers would develop a fertile and unsettled country of vast importance to the trade and strength of the South. It is a country filled with rivers and streams—the Arkansas, the Red, the False Washita, the Verdigris, the Canadian, the Red Fork, the Salt Fork, the Neosho, and many others of great value. It is admirably suited for the cultivation of cotton, and the higher portions of it for hemp, tobacco, and grains. Settled and cultivated, it would enrich the South and strengthen it. Texas is developed and is secure. This country should be. Delay will not prevent its settlement, nor benefit the South."

"Delay will not prevent its settlement, nor benefit the South." There is something peculiar and significant in this iteration of the same idea. He adds:

"It is deeply to the interest, therefore, of South Carolina, Georgia, Tennessee and Arkansas, if they would protect and increase the trade of the principal commercial cities, that the Charleston and Memphis railroad shall be extended directly west to Albuquerque, and then to San Francisco."

It is to "protect and increase the trade of the principal commercial cities" of the South that this central route is advocated. And again he asserts:

"But Virginia cannot reasonably be asked to go four hundred miles too far South, when a good pass and a better route can be had, three degrees of latitude to the north of it, and also when the more convenient and shorter route will open up to settlement a country of an importance to the South which it is quite impossible to overestimate—a country large enough to make two States, each larger than Ohio, and of a climate and soil like that of northern Louisiana and Arkansas."

Why may we not reasonably ask it of Virginia, if he can ask it of his native State, Connecticut, and his adopted State, Missouri? I can readily understand the importance to the South of making two slave States larger than Ohio. But is the whole nation to be asked to make this road for this purpose? But he says:

"More than TWENTY MILLIONS of PEOPLE live on and north of the thirty-fifth parallel route, and they cannot—and ought not, to be asked to go across that line, when everybody knows that the line is almost two hundred miles further south than they ought to be asked to come."

"Everybody knows that the line (of the thirty-fifth parallel) is almost two hundred miles further south than the twenty million of people who live north of it ought to be asked to come." And it is called the central route!! Finally, the people of Arkansas are informed:

"But the thirty-fifth parallel route through Albuquerque is three and a half degrees south of St. Louis. The southern portion of the slaveholding States have, if the Albuquerque route is adopted, by reason of their geographical position, a decided advantage in the matter of distance over the northern part of the slaveholding, and over all of the non-slaveholding States, whose railroads center at St. Louis."

"By using the Vicksburg branch, up the Red and False Washita rivers to Albuquerque; the Memphis branch to Albuquerque, and the St. Louis branch to Albuquerque, the slaveholding States can far more easily reach San Francisco than can any one of all the large Atlantic cities of the Atlantic non-slaveholding States."

There is much more to the same purpose, but this is sufficient to show what sort of a central route this is that my colleague advocates. It should be called the "False Washita route," which, I presume, derived its name from the fact that somebody mistook it for the "true Washita," as my colleague has mistaken this line, which is "two hundred miles farther south than the people of this country ought to be asked to come," for a central route. Although my colleague has given his name to bolster this route, it is but fair to him and others to say that its paternity belongs to a gentleman who formerly lived in St. Louis, and who still claims to live there, although he has lived here for many years, with the design, I presume, of having some pretext to speak for Missouri. The gentleman I refer to is Mr. Corbin, a man of talent, of energy, and industry, who has been a successful operator, and has made himself extremely useful to members of Congress. He originated the "false Washita" route, and the arguments used by my colleague remind me of him and of an incident in his history which occurred when he lived in St. Louis.

There was a vacancy from the county of St. Louis, in the Missouri Legislature. Mr. Corbin and another gentleman were candidates before the Democratic convention, and both pledged themselves to abide the decision of the convention and not to run against its nominee. The other gentleman was nominated, and to the astonishment of all, and greatly to the chagrin of the Democratic party, Mr. Corbin still persisted in being a candidate. Being reminded of his pledge not to run against the nominee of the convention, he replied that it was true he had given the pledge and intended to redeem it to the letter, but he did not consider that his pledge prevented him from running, it only bound him not to run against the nominee of the convention; he should therefore run, but not as against the nominee. And so it may be said of this "false Washita" route. It may be called a central route, but no one who reads the arguments upon which it rests, can fail to perceive that even if it is a central route, it is not a central route "as against the South." It runs "two hundred miles further south than the twenty million living north of it ought to be asked to go," and then when it reaches the Pacific side has to run two hundred miles back again to the north to reach San Francisco. It requires the railroad to commence on the Mississippi river, and thus loses four hundred miles of water navigation, furnished by the Missouri and Kansas rivers, in their course due west, and may thus be said to throw away seven or eight hundred miles.

On the true central route, availing ourselves of the navigation of the Missouri river and striking the great Colorado of the West at its junction with Grand river, where Fremont supposed it to be navigable—and which supposition has since been confirmed—we should only have a thousand miles of railroad travel between the navigable waters of the two oceans. This is the great feature of the central route; and, taken in connection with the superiority of its soil and supply of wood and water, has heretofore given it the preference with the emigration to the Pacific, and dotted the line with settlements, whilst the other routes have never been used by the emigrants in their exodus to the Pacific, and remain uninhabited.

EXPOSITION OF THE KANSAS CONFERENCE ACT.

SPEECH OF HON. H. BENNETT,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

May 25, 1858.

The House being in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. BENNETT said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: An act has been passed by this Congress, relative to the admission of Kansas, sending back to the people of that Territory the Lecompton constitution, which they had rejected, offering them large inducements to accept it, and enacting severe penalties if they refuse—an act intended to force upon them a constitution which it is known they have disapproved and condemned—a most improper and unprecedented intervention by Congress with, and an attempt at coercion over, the people of Kansas. And this act has been so artfully devised as to receive different interpretations. Its meaning is a subject of dispute. It is a curiosity in more than one respect. A correct exposition of this extraordinary act, passed under the operation of the previous question, is a matter of great public interest; and I now avail myself of the first opportunity to examine "the Kansas conference act," intending only to give an outline of this leading measure of the Administration—to point out its false pretenses and false statements; to expose the frauds concealed and the purposes designed; to predict beforehand the course of proceeding that will be adopted under it; to hold it up in its true character to the scorn and condemnation of all honest men. Here, and now, I desire to place upon record my exposition of that act and my predictions of its consequences. Time will verify their truth and justice.

All that is important in the pretended facts set forth in the preamble are notoriously false! and every material provision of the act covers a fraud!

I. The preamble states in substance that the people of Kansas did, by a convention, "form for themselves" the Lecompton constitution! The people of Kansas never made or adopted that instrument. It was the work of a faction, accomplished by fraud. The convention that made it was illegally called by an unauthorized Legislature, was illegally chosen and constituted; and did not, in any sense, represent the people of Kansas. I prove this:

1. By the Delegate representing the people of Kansas in Congress, who denies its authenticity and brands it as a fraud.

2. By the Legislature of Kansas, who deny its validity, and unanimously condemn it as false and fraudulent.

3. By the People of Kansas themselves, who compelled its submission, and then spit upon it and spurned it! A few stragglers—128—voted for it. But the people denied that it was their act or deed, by a vote of 10,226! Could there be any stronger condemnation, or any higher proof that this thing was not made by the people?

4. By this very Congress that has passed the act. This House, by a majority of eight, rejected the Lecompton constitution and adopted the Crittenden amendment, sending the whole matter back to the people, because they had been allowed no voice in making or ratifying that constitution! In spite of party drill and discipline, and in defiance of sectional prejudices, a majority of this House determined that the people of Kansas should not be forced into the Union under this constitution, got up fraudulently by a minority, to establish slavery, but should be allowed to make a constitution for themselves!

Amongst those so voting, and, as they declared, for that especial reason, were the two members from Indiana, [Mr. ENGLISH and Mr. FOLEY;] the six members from Ohio, [Mr. COX, Mr. COCKERILL, Mr. GROESBECK, Mr. HALL, Mr. LAWRENCE, and Mr. PENDLETON;] and the member from Pennsylvania, [Mr. OWEN JONES;] they first voted for the Crittenden amendment! and afterwards voted for this act! and without their votes it could not have passed! How could these men sanction this falsehood against all their previous declarations, letters, and speeches, and against their recorded votes?

II. It states (as a distinct and separate matter) that an ordinance was also adopted. Calhoun certifies that the ordinance was "submitted as a part of the constitution by the convention." The ordinance is here represented as a separate instrument; because it is intended to submit the ordinance to a vote; but not to submit the constitution, and the fact is misstated accordingly.

III. It is also stated that the constitution and the ordinance were presented to Congress, and that the ordinance was not acceptable to Congress. In legal effect, that is the same as saying the constitution was acceptable, and the ordinance objected to. "Expressio unius, exclusio alterius." That is falsehood number three. It was the constitution that was not acceptable to Congress, because it never had been sanctioned by the people, but had been rejected by them. No attention was paid to the ordinance. It fell, of course, with the constitution of which it formed a part. As a separate matter it was not objected to, or even considered or voted upon by Congress. The members I have referred to opposed this constitution, and voted to substitute the Crittenden amendment; yet now they vote to declare that this constitution was acceptable to Congress!

After these false statements, it declares the object of the act; that it is to ascertain whether the people concur in the changes in the ordinance, (not in the constitution,) and desire admission upon the terms proposed.

The act proposes the terms; all of which are upon the express condition that Kansas shall be doomed to slavery forever, under this rejected Lecompton constitution, which establishes slavery, and provides that it shall never be abolished! The terms are not offered to the people of Kansas, upon their admission as a State, but only in case of their admission under, and submission to, this rejected pro-slavery minority constitution. They are to be allowed no choice as to what constitution they shall adopt. They must accept the one to which they are opposed, but which is demanded by this Administration and the slave Democracy, or all the offers made by this act are withdrawn. Unless they will make Kansas a slave State, they can have no terms; and it is only with slavery that they can be admitted as a State under this act!

IV. The first section of this act offers the people of Kansas two sections of the public lands in each township for schools, (equal to one eighteenth part of all the public lands;) seventy-two sections for a State university; ten sections for public buildings; twelve salt springs with six sections of land adjoining to each, and five per cent. of the proceeds of the sales of all the public lands in the Territory. I have procured from the Land Office a statement of the amount:

Area of Kansas.....	126,283 sq. miles.
Equal to.....	80,821,121 acres.
School grant.....	4,490,062 acres.
154 selected sections.....	98,560 acres.

Grant in lands..... 4,588,622 acres.

Worth at least (say).....$20,000,000

The five per cent. (say)..... 4,500,000

Value of proposed terms.....$24,500,000!

Estimating the population of Kansas at forty thousand, (a fair estimate,) here is a bribe offered out of the public property of more than six hundred dollars each, to every man, woman, and child, in the Territory, to induce the people to change their votes, and make Kansas a slave State! A bribe in case the people surrender their right of adopting such a constitution as they approve, and accept the one dictated to them by the slave power, which they have once rejected, by a vote almost unanimous! To be paid, if they accept the price and change their votes, otherwise to be withheld! If an individual had offered a voter five dollars to change his vote on the same subject, he would justly be subjected to criminal and infamous punishment! Yet this act proposes a wholesale system of bribery, for the purchase and sale of a majority of all the voters in the Territory! And that, too, without any regard to the ordinary rules of economy.

When the managers on the part of the House and Senate met to devise this scheme, a few votes were wanted in Congress, and a great many in Kansas, before the Lecompton constitution, by any artifice, could be adopted and put into operation. Had this act made a "proposition," without any cover or indirection, to give every man in Congress, or in Kansas, who was opposed to the Lecompton constitution, and who would change his vote and support it, 2,000 acres of public lands, and a preference over all others in its selection and location, it would have been less objectionable than in its present form. It would not have included those who were already in its favor, and who therefore needed no bribe; it would not have included and insulted honest men, who would not take a bribe; it would have been a corrupt and immoral "proposition," but made only to the venal and corrupt; I have no doubt it would have saved three fourths of the amount that this act offers to give; and it would have said what it meant, plainly and directly.

But the infamy of this act is not yet fully disclosed. Not only does it offer a reward, if slavery is accepted, but it provides a penalty in case it is refused. It provides that Kansas shall not be admitted except as a slave State; shall not be admitted except under this constitution. If slavery and Lecompton are rejected, Kansas cannot be admitted as a State—not under this act; not for many years; not with its present population; not till it has been more than doubled; not till Congress sees fit to have a census taken; and then, (in case it has the required population,) as a slave or free State, as time and chance may determine. The people of Kansas may decide for slavery; but not for freedom!

This act allows the people of Kansas to choose whether they will accept the proffered bribe, but not what their constitution shall be. That is dictated to them, and against their will—imposed upon them. If they decide to be admitted, it must be as a slave State, or not at all. If they will not consent to slavery, they are to be sent back to that bitter school in which they have been instructed for the last four years, to learn submission. They are to be remanded back to a territorial condition, to the tender mercies of that odious despotism, beneath which they have suffered so long, and from which they are struggling for deliverance.

An insulting discrimination is made against freedom, in favor of slavery. It can be admitted now as a slave State, with a population of only forty thousand. But it cannot be admitted as a free State. And this odious distinction—this preference of slavery over freedom—is made in reference to a Territory that was pledged to freedom "forever!" for a full consideration accorded to the slave power. And when that pledge was broken, in violation of all good faith, another was made—to leave the people free to decide. They have decided for freedom; emphatically, almost unanimously. And then comes this act of Congress, saying to the people of Kansas: "no matter for your decision; you can come in as a slave State, or you shall not be admitted!" The time may come when these instructions in congressional non-intervention may return to plague the inventors; when the discrimination will be against slavery, and in favor of freedom.

The offer contained in this act has no precedent or parallel. The only thing at all resembling it occurred more than eighteen hundred years ago. When Satan tempted our Savior, and offered Him all the lands they beheld from the top of "an exceeding high mountain," if He would fall down and worship him, he made very much such an offer as this act makes to the people of Kansas, if they will fall down and worship slavery. But to give the Devil his due, he had not the impudence to couple with it any promised revenge in case it was refused, such as this act provides! This proposition far outdoes that in its meanness and malignity. The penalty enacted for non-acceptance is more oppressive and tyrannical a hundred fold, than even the proffered bribe! Take it all in all, it is the most infamous proposition ever adopted by any legislative assembly! The most insulting one ever submitted to any people who claimed to be free!

V. Section second is a master-piece of ingenuity in devising ways and means to render certain the success of the Lecompton constitution and of slavery, at the election provided for; if not by the votes of the people, at least by the returns of the officers, who are to be put in charge, with full power to accomplish that purpose.

It provides that the Governor, Secretary, and District Attorney—all appointed by the President—and the Speaker of the House, and President of the Council, shall be a board of commissioners under the act; any three of whom shall constitute a board; and that this partisan pro-slavery board, appointed by the President, shall have power—

1. To establish new precincts for voting.
2. To cause polls to be opened at such places as it may deem proper, in the counties and election precincts.
3. To appoint three judges of election at each place of voting, any two of whom may act.
4. To appoint such persons as they may deem proper, in the place of the sheriffs and their deputies, to preserve peace and good order.
5. To appoint the day of holding said election.
6. To prescribe the time of said election.
7. To prescribe the manner of said election.
8. To prescribe the places of said election.
9. To direct the time within which returns must be made.

10. To declare the result of said election.

Unlimited powers, without any appeal or review!

By the organic act, the people were to be left perfectly free to form their own constitution in their own way. There was to be no intervention by Congress or by the President. The President has no right to appoint any of the officers of election in any organized State or Territory, or any board to appoint them, and never should be allowed to do so. It is intervention, and most improper intervention. These are local officers, chosen and qualified according to law, and with whom the President has no right to interfere. Why are these officers all removed, and this power to appoint them taken out of the hands of the People and given to the President? Is it that he may fill their places with such men as Calhoun? Can any other reason be rendered? The people have a right to appoint these officers. And no law giving this authority to the President was ever before devised or enacted.

It is true, the Crittenden amendment provided for a board of commissioners, composed of the Governor, Secretary, President of the Council, and Speaker—two of them appointed by the President, and two elected by the people. But the reason for that was because the free-State party, having all the officers of election, (rightfully, for they had the majority,) and desiring no fraud, offered this to the other party as a pledge of fairness at the election. It was like the law of New York, which requires the Inspectors of election to be elected equally from the different parties—each holding a check upon the other. This the free-State party offered, to remove all suspicion of an unfair party board. This board is not made up in that manner. Three out of five are appointed by the President, and three are declared a board. The board is therefore appointed by the President, who represents the minority, or the pro-slavery party, in Kansas, and is their most willing and willful confederate! The two others have no power; they need not be consulted or notified! This act places, therefore, in the hands of three men, appointed by the President, the power of selecting every judge and officer of election in Kansas, the power of fixing its future destiny, by declaring it entitled to admission as a slave State! (But not as a free State, for fear of some unlucky accident!) Can any one doubt the result? Knowing what has been done in Kansas; knowing that fraud, forgery, perjury, and murder, have all been committed there to establish slavery, is there any reason to doubt they will be again resorted to, if necessary, in this last effort? Is there any reason to doubt that enough forged and false returns will be made to secure its triumph at this election? In December nearly 3,000 fictitious votes were returned from four precincts, merely to keep in practice, and make up a show, when no votes were given by the other party. Now, with every means for cheating given by this act, and the strongest motives for fraud, will these same men become suddenly honest against all temptation?

Congress never before interfered with any State or Territory having election districts and voting precincts established by law; Judges, and Officers of election, and Sheriffs chosen and qualified according to law; to annul the laws, change the precincts, and remove the officers; allowing the President to appoint in their places three unscrupulous partisan commissioners, removable and changeable at his will, with full and unlimited power, to appoint all the Judges, Officers of election, Sheriffs, &c.; establish precincts and places for voting; to aid their party in any way they please; to do in all things as they please, control the whole matter, make what rules they please, admit or reject what votes or returns they please, decide as they please, and declare the result; giving to them, as to this election, absolute, unlimited power; answerable to no one, accountable to no one; and without the slightest check or restraint imposed!

It is said unscrupulous partisans will not be appointed. No others can be, or will be, appointed under this Administration. It is morally impossible. In all this matter the most reckless leaders of a desperate faction have been the advisers of the President. Infatuated and obstinate, he will listen only to them. "None are so blind as those that will not see, or so deaf as those that will not hear."

The favored appointees of the President have all been men like Calhoun and Lecompte, the worst of pro-slavery partisans. When any man is found to be honest, he is removed. Honesty is a disqualification; for that Geary, Walker, and Stanton were removed! If an office-holder tells the truth when under oath as a witness, it is sufficient cause for removal; for that Dennis was removed!

Will the people of Kansas maintain their rights like freemen, or submit like slaves? If they will surrender their principles, their independence, their inherent and inalienable right of self-government, promised to them by the organic act, and guaranteed to all by the Constitution, they are offered a large reward, and immediate admission? If they will not submit to this degrading dictation; if they dare to maintain their own opinions, and to prefer freedom to slavery, pains and penalties are provided, and a severe punishment inflicted. They are left perfectly free to do—as the slave power commands! Free to decide for themselves between liberty and slavery! But slavery established in the Territory by Congress, shall be established as a State institution! Free to form their own constitution—but they must adopt the one framed at Lecompton, or none! Free to accept slavery, but not to reject it! They may be admitted as a slave State, but not as a free State! Even the bogus convention allowed a choice between two pro-slavery constitutions! This act allows no choice! It insults the people of Kansas by demanding submission to that very constitution upon which they have placed the seal of their condemnation!

The people of Kansas will not be seduced by the promised reward, or intimidated by the threat of punishment; they will scorn the one and defy the other. But the people of Kansas cannot control the tools the pro-slavery party will prompt the President to use, or the judges and officers of election that will be appointed! And it is by fraud that this "proposition" will be declared accepted, and Kansas admitted as a slave State; and that is the design! And mark the prediction: Calhoun will now declare the pro-slavery State officers, and perhaps Legislature, elected, contrary to the truth, as certified by Governor Denver. It will all aid in the intended purpose of this Administration and of the slave Democracy—that of forcing slavery upon the people of Kansas!

Let us examine in detail the powers of this pro-slavery board, imposed by this act upon a free people, to appoint their local officers without their consent, after removing those legally appointed by them.

1. To establish new precincts and places of voting! This they may do at any time, or in any manner, and without any notice. On the morning of election every precinct may be changed, and the polls opened in any remote corner, or cabin. And not a free-State voter need be informed where he can vote, or towards what point of the compass he must direct his steps to find the polls! What a splendid chance for Delaware Crossing returns! And all according to law!

2. To cause polls to be opened at such places as they may deem proper! Under this act, polls may be opened in any back room of this extended and thinly-settled Territory, and votes returned to any amount. What a coaxing invitation to a few border ruffians, with a Directory, is here extended, and perfect protection given by law!

3. To appoint three judges of election, any two of whom may act! By this, the legal judges and officers of election are displaced, and these commissioners may appoint others—they will appoint partisans, of course—to do any part of this work they may hesitate to do themselves. This is the intention. It will be strange if they cannot find, among the border-ruffians of Kansas, at least two men in each precinct willing to do anything necessary for the triumph of slavery. Judges of election must be men of some character to hold the place. But these temporary judges, who hold office only for a single day and for a specific purpose, will be those who are the most reckless and who will do the most to accomplish the result desired by the appointing power!

4. To displace the sheriffs and their deputies, and appoint others to preserve the peace! This is rather strong. It probably will admit of a military force, to act as a posse comitatus, to vote and to keep away free-State voters. The border-ruffians of Kansas have an instinctive fear of sheriffs and their deputies! This act respects their prejudices!

5, 6, 7, and 8. To fix the day for election, and to prescribe the time, manner, and places of election! This power is unlimited in every respect. No notice of the day of election need be given; or if given, they judge what is sufficient notice. Nothing is fixed by law; everything is left to their discretion, that they may act as circumstances may require. So as to each of the other provisions as to the time, manner, and places of election. The power of establishing new places of voting is deemed so essential that it is twice enumerated!

9. To fix the time for the return of the votes! This is also left to their discretion. It may be fixed so short as to exclude the returns from all the interior and western counties, where the free-State vote is nearly unanimous. Half the returns may be excluded under this act, just as half the counties were disfranchised under the registry law.

10. To announce the result! Again, at their discretion, after rejecting such returns as they hold are not properly made, or not in time, and such votes as they call illegal for any reason, or without any reason, they can do as Calhoun did, declare the result when it is expedient, and not before. There is no limitation or restriction. Indeed, they may require another election; the act says "elections," and may be intended for two or more. They can announce the result when one county is canvassed, or keep back their decision for months or years!

The powers given by this act are so general that any or all of the things I have stated, and many more, may be done; besides the false returns that may be made from any place of voting, by the judges who will be selected by the commissioners, for their zeal in the cause, as Mr. Hand was elected clerk of the Lecompton convention, by acclamation, because he had been engaged in election frauds! Power given is always used; and this will be used to its utmost limit, in favor of the border-ruffian party.

I am told that no men would outrage public sentiment by doing anything so unfair as I have supposed, although they might have the power under this act.

Gracious Heaven! What is it that can outrage public sentiment, that the pro-slavery party have not done in Kansas? And are not all their acts defended by the Administration and the dominant party here? When a judge, appointed by the President, discharged an indicted murderer without trial, and the Governor complained of the outrage and asked his removal, the Governor was first treated with insolence and then removed, and the judge retained in office! He that talks of the restraints of public sentiment upon the pro-slavery officials of Kansas, can know but little of its past history, or of the border-ruffian party. Public sentiment will be no restraint; a military force is stationed in Kansas to crush it out, and to enforce the law—when it favors slavery!

This act gives full, free scope to fraud, without one word to provide against or prevent it. I assume it was intended to be used for that purpose, and could not be intended for any other. Men are presumed to intend the natural and necessary consequences of their acts. And knowing the frauds that have been committed by the pro-slavery party of Kansas at their elections, this act is sent to them, containing ten distinct provisions, each opening wide the door to unnumbered frauds, and inviting to their commission. The means are provided for those who are ready to use them, and a pro-slavery board is given to prompt them on, and to appoint pro-slavery judges and officers of election at every place of voting, who will be aiding and assisting, or the principals to see that the right returns for their side are made!

If instruments for counterfeiting should be furnished to a band of men known to have been for years engaged in that business, those who furnished the means would be as criminal as those who used them, or put the money into circulation. The law would presume they intended, when they sent the tools, that they should be used, and would hold them equally responsible. Yet no engraving was ever made more perfect for counterfeiting than this act is made for the commission of election frauds. I defy the ingenuity of man to make it more so. It is an enabling act, giving impunity to fraud, with proper judges and officers of election, and they will be selected; it is perfect. Is not this act, by which the legal judges and officers of election are removed, and a party board appointed to choose others, for party purposes, in their places clothed with unlimited power, itself a fraud and an invitation to fraud? Could anything be more dishonest or more villainous?

VI. By the third section, all white male inhabitants who could vote under the law for the election of the Legislature in October last, and no others, are allowed to vote. By this law, no person who had not been for six months previous an actual resident, could vote at that election. This law only added an additional disqualification of six months' residence, and in no other respect altered or repealed the general law. By the general law, every free white male citizen of the United States, and every free male Indian, who is made a citizen, over the age of twenty-one years, "who shall be an inhabitant of the Territory, and of the county or district in which he offers to vote, and who shall have paid a territorial tax, shall be a qualified elector."

But no person convicted of any violation of any provision of the fugitive slave act of 1793, or of the fugitive slave act of 1850, shall be allowed to vote—

"Whether such conviction were by criminal proceedings or by civil action.

"And if any person offering to vote shall be challenged, and required to take an oath or affirmation, to be administered by one of the judges of the election, that he will sustain the provisions of the above recited acts of Congress, [the fugitive slave acts,] and of the act to organize the Territories of Nebraska and Kansas, approved May 30, 1854, and shall refuse to take such oath or affirmation, the vote of such person shall be rejected."

The general law also provides that when a voter is challenged—

"The judges of the election may examine him touching his right to vote, and if so examined, no evidence to contradict him shall be received; or the judges may, in the first instance, receive other evidence, in which event, the applicant may, if he desire it, demand to be sworn; but his testimony shall not then be conclusive."

By a subsequent act, the test oaths required to be taken in order to vote, have been repealed.

1. Under this act of Congress, and the laws of Kansas, a citizen, to be entitled to vote, must have resided six months in the Territory. This will exclude thousands of bona fide citizens; all who have gone there this season, although actual and permanent residents of Kansas, and as much entitled to a voice in framing its organic law, under which they are to live, as any other citizens. Emigration is greatly in favor of the free-State party, and therefore this six months' disqualification and this exclusion!

2. Must have paid a territorial tax. This, if enforced, will exclude thousands more, in fact a great majority of the free-State party!

3. Must have sustained all the fugitive slave acts, at least, not have violated any provision of any such law. This, it is not likely, would exclude many voters. But it is worthy of note, as a specimen of the Democratic negro mania in legislation, both in Kansas and in Congress. It shows the animus by which that party are actuated. I call it the slave Democracy, because it has no longer any distinctive principle beyond the extension of slavery. The name is therefore appropriate and expressive of the present condition and policy of the Democratic party.

When voters are challenged, these party judges of election can swear the voter, if he is of their party; and, if he thinks or claims to be a voter, his evidence is conclusive and cannot be contradicted; but if he is a free-State voter, the judges can "receive other evidence;" and then, if the voter is sworn, his evidence is not conclusive. It is, then, a question of evidence, for the judges to decide. In one case, the vote must be admitted; in the other, it can and will be rejected! Is not this law as fair and as impartial as the party board of commissioners; or as the judges they will appoint to administer it?

VII. This act does not submit the constitution to the people, it requires the people to submit to the constitution! The only thing to be voted upon is, whether the people of Kansas will accept a gift worth $24,500,000? Every voter in Kansas is in favor of that proposition! And if accepted, they are to be admitted as a State. That is a still stronger inducement. But the law enacts, that if the gift is accepted, and the State admitted, it must be as a slave State, and under the Lecompton constitution! If that is refused, they are not to have the gift, and are not to be admitted. Admission as a slave State, under that constitution, can never be consented to, let the consequences be what they may. That should be the unalterable determination of the people of Kansas and of the free States. While the people of Kansas would gladly accept the gift, and while they earnestly desire admission, yet not for this—nor for any offered price—will they abandon their principles, or surrender their just rights!

They will reject this "proposition," and yet by fraud and false returns, it will be declared accepted! (unless these party judges are alarmed into being honest, by an indignant people) and slavery forced upon Kansas! When that is done the question will not be settled—like Banquo's ghost, it will rise again before you, to push from their seats the doughfaces that passed this act. It will present the fraud and demand redress. It will not down. It will never be settled, until justice is done, fairly and honestly, to the people of Kansas; then, and not till then, will this question be settled.

SPEECH OF HON. I. I. STEVENS, OF WASHINGTON,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

May 25, 1858.

The House being in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. STEVENS said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: My object in addressing the committee is to present some observations in regard to the Pacific railroad. I am not impelled to speak because I have been connected with the explorations. I am not here the explorer; nor do I rise here to speak as the explorer, but as the representative of the most distant people of our country, situated on the shores of that great ocean, soon, I trust, to be joined with the shores of the ocean hitherward by roads of iron. This is a great national question, and should not be discussed in a sectional point of view. As a western-coast man, dear as is to my heart the home of my adoption—Puget Sound and the Territory of Washington—I see not Puget Sound; I see not the Territory of Washington, but Puget Sound, the Columbia entrance, San Francisco, San Diego, and the other ports of that extended coast. I see Washington, and Oregon, and California. As a national man, crossing the Rocky Mountains, I see both our water lines. Northwards, the line of the great lakes, the New York canals, the river St. Lawrence, its vast and rapidly increasing commerce; great grain ports, from which vessels without breaking bulk, pass on to Europe; grain ports surpassing the grain ports of the olden world; and the line of railroads upon the northern and the southern shore; and southward, the Mexican Gulf and the Caribbean stretching not half way across the continent, but reducing that continent to a narrow isthmus, from whose heights one hears the roaring surges of either ocean. From her ports, Galveston, Matagorda, New Orleans, Mobile, and Pensacola, issues forth the great bulk of our foreign exports; and there we have a commerce rivaling the commerce of the most favored sea.

Such is our rounded and ample domain, magnificent water lines, and a teeming commerce, north and south—vast ocean coasts, east and west, making our country the natural center of the communication, population, and civilization of this habitable globe.

From this stand point, national and comprehensive, I will now proceed to take a survey of our country. First, I will glance at our western coast, show its resources, and ultimate development; then I will endeavor to grasp and present the very genius of our interior; then I will dwell upon the tendencies of population, and communications from our line of frontier States, moving onwards to the peaceful conquest of that interior, and that slope, by occupation and settlement; which done, I will endeavor to deduce the governmental action required by the spirit of the age in which we live, demanded by the exigencies of the public service, looking to the national defenses; looking to the business of the Government, as a great landed proprietor; as a carrier of the mails; as having to transport troops, supplies, and munitions of war; and endeavor to show that all these require that we should carve our way, not on one, but at least on three routes, to the shores of the great western ocean. And first the western slope.

It is scarcely ten years since we had a western coast. We have acquired California only within about ten years; Oregon became ours by the treaty of 1849—nine years ago; and yet, in this space of nine or ten years, we find that we have planted upon that coast, civilization and empire; and six hundred thousand American freemen, whose hearts beat responsive to the hearts of their brethren on this side of the mountains, have there made known the arts and arms and future destinies of this great country—all this in the short space of nine or ten years. Look at the obstruction in the way of this development of the western coast. One half the time the emigrant routes have been blocked up, death was upon the route, savage foes, calamity, and dire vicissitudes, and our hardy pioneers found their way to the Pacific coast by the waters of two oceans, and across the isthmus, at great expense, not simply of money, but of health, and oftentimes of life.

Pacific Railroad—Mr. Stevens.

Eight years ago, when the cry of California gold gave such an impulse to emigration, California was regarded as worthless as an agricultural State. It was predicted of her that but little of her land was arable; that there would be severe droughts, which would always make her crops uncertain; that she was worth little or nothing, except for the miner. But still our people went there; they became acquainted with the country; they became acquainted with the climate; and California stands forth this day confessed a great agricultural community. Her wealth consists not so much in her mines as in her rich and remunerative soil. If you will examine the records of the Land Office, among the slopes of the Sierra, which, but a short time since, was supposed to be, and simply fit to be, the home of the grizzly bear and the California lion, you will find rich agricultural tracts adapted to settlement and occupation. The land surveys have shown that California, east of the Sierra, the western portion of the Great Basin, is arable, and will reward cultivation. In all portions of California the cereals and vegetables thrive well, and she now invites people to her borders, more by her agricultural resources than by her mineral wealth.

Go further north, go to the Oregon of song, and to the present Oregon and Washington. That country was regarded as a magnificent country, not in its resources, but in its scenery. There was the beautiful Oregon winding its way to the ocean; there were the snow-capped Cascades, the Blue and the Rocky Mountains inviting admiration by the grandeur of their scenery. But an agricultural, a grazing community—a community having large resources, it was not admitted to be. Oregon is now seeking admittance into the Union as a sovereign State, glorying in her eighty thousand people, with a well-ordered population, and a well-settled country—a country having great wealth in her soil; great wealth in her timber; great wealth in her genial and delightful climate.

If I go further north to Washington, why it is but a few years since—within the last four or five years—Washington has been regarded as a terra incognita. Puget Sound was almost unknown. It was frequently confounded with Nootka Sound. It was supposed to be some far-off body of water, lying somewhere under the arctic circle. Yet there we have Puget Sound, and the country west of the Cascade Mountains, in Washington Territory, equaling the State of New York, almost, in extent, having two thirds the area of the State of New York, and, in proportion to her area, having as much arable land, and having a climate as mild in the winter as the climate of the Carolinas. We have that splendid and capacious Puget Sound, the most magnificent roadstead on the shores of all the oceans, with her sixteen hundred miles of shore-line, and her numerous harbors, defensible, land-locked, and commodious. We have on the shores of that sound a forest growth which will supply the markets of all the ports of the Pacific with lumber, and the navies of the earth with spars, for all time to come. The Territory is rich in coal, and in the fisheries of her coast—fisheries of cod, halibut, and salmon. If we go east of the Cascade Mountains, either in Oregon or Washington, we come there to a delightful pastoral and agricultural country, inviting not only the grazier and the wool-grower, but the husbandman. I suppose that, within the limits of our Union, there is no portion of the country where wool-growing will be so profitable as it will be on the interior plains of these two Territories. In southern Oregon and northern Washington there are extensive and rich gold fields. Thus, that country, which was supposed to be simply a country for miners and for a few traders, is this day a country of great agricultural capacity, as well as of great mineral wealth. Its mineral wealth I have not dwelt upon, because it is known of all men. The lumbering and timber I need not do more than merely allude to, as I have done. On another branch of the subject, I shall come back to Puget Sound and San Francisco, in connection with the trade of the Pacific, and I shall then take occasion to present some more observations in regard to their resources.

We will now examine, for a few moments, the interior. I recollect that years ago, when I first gave my attention to the interior, the impression was made upon my mind by the narratives of the trappers (and that impression has been made generally on the public mind) that the interior was worthless and uninhabitable. I wish to redeem the interior from this reproach. I desire to present the interior as it is in the light of exploration, and to show that it can be occupied and is habitable. I do not approach the subject as a sectional man or as the partisan of a route, but looking to the whole interior, from the thirty-second to the forty-ninth parallel.

I will commence my observations about the interior at the thirty-second parallel—the parallel of the Gila and its tributaries. It has been described in former reports, and especially in the narratives of the trappers, as a barren, sandy, desert waste, utterly incapable of occupation and utterly incapable of supporting a civilized community. But as exploring parties passed over it, arable tracts were developed, timber was found, and the admission was at last made that on this barren and desert route oases were to be found, and that there was here a place and there a place which invited not to repose, but to the occupation of the country by our hardy people.

But as the matter has become more fully developed, we find that the country changes its aspect entirely; not that there is not much land which is uncultivable, not that there are not tracts of sand, not that there is not here and there a considerable space without water, but we find a considerable area of arable land all through on that route; and we find, from the reliable explorations made by Mr. Gray, in 1853–54, that on what was called a desert there is most delightful grazing during a portion of the year. Those who have read the admirable memoir of Lieutenant Mowry, the Delegate from Arizona—a gentleman I have known long, and known to be entirely reliable—are astonished to ascertain the condition of that country in a past generation. One hundred or one hundred and fifty years ago, when there was something of force and vigor left in the Government of Mexico, when their hero priests went northward, carrying civilization in their train, we find that the country was occupied by a farming population, and especially by a mining population. They had their silver mines by the dozen, and their religious establishments for the improvement of the people in considerable numbers. To be sure they had in part to resort to irrigation; but still there is evidence that a very considerable population occupied that country, and that there was considerable land in the hands of the husbandman. I have seen a most reliable report recently, from Colonel Bonneville. I have known Colonel Bonneville on the fields of Mexico and on the waters of the Oregon, and I have crossed his track in the exploration of the continent. He has the fit conditions of an observer. He is a man of clear observation, a man who has a spirit which seeks to grasp any field that is brought under his observation. In this report he describes the northern tributaries of the Gila and their agricultural capacities; and he states that each of these tributaries will support an agricultural population of twenty thousand souls.

Thus much in regard to the southern portion of the interior, for the purpose of redeeming it from the reproach of being a barren, sandy waste, unfit for the purposes of civilized man. I do not propose to dwell particularly upon the railroad route of the thirty-second parallel, or upon that of the thirty-fifth parallel surveyed by Lieutenant Whipple. The merits of the route of the thirty-fifth parallel; and of the country bordering it, have been thoroughly developed in the reports of the explorations. There is no more reliable officer than Lieutenant Whipple. Since Whipple has passed over that route, we have learned more of it by subsequent explorations. The recent trip of Lieutenant Beale, in mid-winter, with his camels, redeems that route from the charges of being obstructed, and made impassable by deep snow.

I will now pass to the northward, to the South Pass route. I have met many emigrants in Oregon and Washington, who have passed over that route, and who have told me of the sufferings they experienced, how long distances in many instances they went without water, and how many animals they lost from being poisoned by the alkali of the water, and from the dearth of grass. Yet as more is learned of the country, it is found, by side routes and cut-offs, that routes can be followed where there are grass and water all the way, and that the alkaline water can be avoided. We have had recent explorations on this route within the last year. I refer to the exploration of Mr. Lander, who has found, a little northward of the usual emigrant trail from the South Pass to Snake river, routes with water at short intervals and grass all the way. These explorations have developed a large extent of arable and grazing land on the upper tributaries of the Colorado and Snake rivers, and in the midst of the mountains. We have had another exploration within the last year. I refer to that of Lieutenant Warren. He examined a country from Fort Laramie one hundred and seventy-five miles northward, and thence eastward to the Missouri; and found among the Black Hills a tract of six thousand square miles of pine timber. A large portion of the country embraced in this exploration is a beautiful grazing and farming country, abounding in streams of pure water, having a rich soil and furnishing good homes for our people.

I now come to the northern route. I speak of that route from the reports. Of course, here in my position, I refer to the reports of that route as to those to the other routes. I stand here in my representative capacity. The reports of that route show that the Rocky Mountain region, instead of being closed up with ice and snow eight months in the year, is a delightful pastoral and agricultural country, where cattle can graze the year round; where neither the Indians nor the whites have to furnish fodder for the winter; where heifers bring forth young at eighteen months; where the cattle grow large. And this is the character of that Rocky Mountain region route, between the forty-seventh and forty-eighth parallel. We find on that route no desert; we find on that route no tremendous snows; we find the country there nearly all arable, and adapted to grazing; the arable tracts always at short distances apart, and many large bodies of arable land distributed all along the route. On the whole route from the Mississippi to Puget Sound and the Columbia valley, there is not ten miles of sage.

When we look at the changing aspect of the interior in the light of exploration and discovery, we are reminded of the prophet thousands of years ago. The prophet Ezekiel, in the valley of dry bones, breathed upon that valley, and the dry bones came together, bone to bone; and he breathed again, and flesh came upon those bones, and living men stood forth like an army with banners. The genius of American liberty breathed upon our interior, and high mountain ranges rose up, and vast deserts came to view. The genius of American liberty breathed again, and the mountain crests were bowed down, and the desert places disappeared; the dry bones became living men, and the deserts green pastures by sweet flowing waters.

Now, we will consider the tendencies of population and communications from our line of frontier States westward, and the time which will be required for an uninterrupted line of settlements to the shores of the western ocean. It is estimated that the frontier is moving westward at the rate of one hundred miles a year; some estimates put it at seventy. Nine years ago the distance between the frontier settlements of the Mississippi valley and the shores of the Pacific was about two thousand miles. The frontier advanced westward from the Mississippi and eastward from the Pacific, and the distance from frontier to frontier has now dwindled down to about one thousand miles. Even this interior of one thousand miles, by scattered settlements, has been gradually preparing for the movements which will soon cause the whole of it to be occupied and developed. Settlements are now moving westward on an unbroken front, extending from the forty-ninth parallel to the Mexican gulf. They have struck the Red River of the North and have moved westward upon its Cheyenne tributary. They are moving up the Missouri and its tributaries in Nebraska and Kansas. We find it moving through Texas; and thus, in nine or ten years, have our hardy American people reduced the intermediate unsettled distance one half, reducing it from two thousand to one thousand miles. This movement is not looking to a particular pass of the mountains, to a southern pass, or to a northern pass, or to a central pass; but backed up by all these States, it is moving upon them all. These are obvious facts which have only to be mentioned to be assented to.

How is it with our communications? Congress has as yet done nothing in regard to the special measure of a Pacific railroad; but, under the auspices of Congress, it has been working out its own success for years. Congress has made grants of lands to States and Territories; and with these grants the genius of our country, as embodied in its railroad enterprise, has been pushing the roads into the interior, and toward that western slope. Are these roads looking to a southern pass, or a northern pass, or a central pass, or are they marching upon all the practicable passes of the mountains and looking beyond those mountains to the ports of the Pacific coast? This statement will receive the assent of every man. It will receive not only the assent of this committee, but the assent of every well-informed man in this country. Whether we come from the Atlantic or the Pacific coast, we are all proud of this movement of our country. Why, sir, Minnesota is not content with one road westward: she must have three to her western frontier, striking it at Pembina, at the Bois de Sioux, and on her southern line; Iowa has seven; Missouri several; Arkansas three; Texas at least one; and Nebraska now is asking Congress for grants for some three roads.

Whilst we see this great spectacle, roads in all the States moving westward, we, as a nation, are doubting whether we shall simply direct these tendencies in such a way that they shall be consummated as they have begun. We are doubting whether we shall do that, or simply fix on some one route, a northern, a central, or a southern route, and that, too, as I have said, when no State or Territory is content with one road looking westward. Congress has indorsed this action of constructing those several roads in the States and Territories, by making grants of land for that purpose, showing what was its idea of the duty of the Government, as a prudent proprietor, in the way of bringing its own lands into market, and as a business operator in carrying the mails and transporting troops and supplies. I take it that the principle upon which all these grants have rested looks to the duty of the Government as a landed proprietor, and a business operator. It made grants of land for railroad purposes, because by so doing it brought the remainder of the land into market, and derived from it a larger revenue than it otherwise would have got from the whole; and besides that, when constructed, these railroads have answered to carry the mails and the troops and the munitions of war of the Government.

I have glanced in the briefest manner at these tendencies, both of population and of communication from our western States, and it seems to me obvious, that in looking to this great question of a Pacific railroad, it would be wise and prudent for the Government to adopt a policy which will carry out those tendencies to their full fruition. Therefore I would not carve our way to the Pacific by a single route. It would not satisfy the country. It is not for its peace and harmony politically. It could not do the business of the country. It is not up to the exigencies of the occasion. But carve your way to the western ocean with at least three roads. The tendency of railroads westward is rather to three roads. Those in Minnesota, and certain roads in Iowa, look to the northern route. The greater portion of the railroads in Iowa, a portion of the railroads in Missouri, and those asked for in Nebraska, look to the South Pass. The other roads look to the Albuquerque route, or the route of the thirty-second parallel. Then cherish the tendencies of all of these roads. Let us, by wise and prudent arrangement, endeavor to give to all sections of the country their full measure of justice.

It is somewhat difficult, Mr. Chairman, in the brief space of an hour, to occupy the field and yet do justice to many of these important considerations. I propose, now, to consider the economical question. It is unquestionably a great undertaking to complete even one Pacific railroad. No man should deceive himself in this matter. Least of all should he allow himself to deceive others. It is a great undertaking to complete even one road; of course it is a much greater undertaking, and will much more task the energies of the country to complete three. The question is, will they pay? The Government is now sending its mail by the southern route to the western coast. It is sending its mail by the central route. It will soon send it by the northern route, over which an order was given, little more than a year since, to move a regiment and a half of troops, and was not carried out only because of the lateness of the season. The troubles in Utah occurred, and prevented the renewal of the order the present year.

We are now moving to Utah with troops, and they are moving to and fro upon the southern route. Thus there will be business upon each of those three routes, carrying the mails and transporting troops and supplies. A railroad upon the southern route will do but little, if anything, towards the services of the other routes. It can perhaps do something for a short distance over the extremity of those routes looking to the Pacific.

Now, will there be sufficient business upon these roads, in addition to the business of the Government, to make them pay? Well, that is dependent upon two elements—the one is way business and the other is through business. It has been urged against these several roads that there would be no way travel; and then, the experience of roads at home, connecting populous cities, being dependent upon the way business, has been brought to bear, to prove that the roads to the Pacific must depend upon way business. I admit it all, and I will speak upon that point for a few moments. You will observe that in the railroad movements in the States, all the railroads have been going on part passu, twenty, thirty, or forty miles apart; and that the way business is only what has been furnished from ten, twenty, or at most thirty miles, on each side of the road. And yet we see how large a way business is developed along these routes. How will it be upon the great Pacific road? Suppose we have three roads. They will range from three to four hundred miles apart, and that would be quite sufficient to furnish way business for the roads. In the States the roads are so near together that they even compete for the way business, reducing fares and freights, and, of course, returns upon capital. There will be no such competition in the way business of the roads to the Pacific. Granting that you would have nothing but a grazing population, yet you would have a greater population per mile than you have in the most thickly settled agricultural portions of our country. But it is not simply the question of a grazing population, but of a grazing and agricultural population; and on the northern route the latter will predominate.

But it is said, how will the people get there? I will answer the question. How was it with the grants of land made to the States for constructing railroads? In many cases how many people were upon the route? How many people were at the western terminus? Every man knows that the grants were made and the roads commenced going into a country almost unoccupied. And those were not roads which occupied ten or twelve years in their construction, but simply three or four years; and yet in that short time the people went in, and the roads at once found a population to furnish the requisite way travel. How will it be with the great Pacific routes, having twelve years instead of three or four years in which to fill up with population? There is now but about a thousand miles of country not occupied by settlements. The frontier is moving a hundred miles a year; and even without this great stimulus of railroad operations, experience shows that in ten years to come population will spread over the whole of this distance. Let certain Indian treaties which are now before the Senate be confirmed, and this year and next the population of Oregon and Washington will spread over the interior plains of those Territories, and the frontier will be extended two or three hundred miles further eastward from the shores of the Pacific. We have arrived at that point where there is a reflex movement from the Pacific. The wave of population has reached the Pacific, and is now rolling back towards the Rocky Mountains. The tide of population is moving westward and eastward from the two frontiers, and under the impulse of a railroad it will soon fill up the entire interior.

Now, what will be the effect of even two years employed in locating a railroad? It is a large operation to locate a railroad from the Mississippi valley to the Pacific. Parties will have to open wagon routes, and will have to winter on those routes. The very act of location will carry with it trains of emigrants. I venture the prediction that when the Pacific railroad is commenced, you will find the emigrant wagons distributed over the route; and before the road is half completed you will have a continuous settlement along the line.

But it is objected, again, that we have, on several of those routes, snow and ice; that you cannot work in the construction of the road for a long time in winter; and that you cannot run the road many days in winter after it is completed. Well, Mr. Chairman, I can only say that this idea of snow and ice is the veriest myth which ever hung around the brains of sensible men. It exists in the face of all our experience. Our immense railroad developments have not gone on in a country where snow and ice are unknown. The greatest railroad development of this continent is in the northern States of this Union and the Canadas. When I went to school as a boy in the old Bay State, I had to trudge through larger snowbanks than any to be found upon the divides of the Rocky Mountains on the northern route. I speak from personal and most careful information. In 1853-54 my parties crossed, in the depth of winter, the Big Hole Pass, Hell Gate Pass, the Little Blackfoot Pass, and Caelot's Pass, and the greatest depth of snow, except when drifted, was one foot; and where drifted, never exceeded two feet. Through these passes, every winter, the Indians of the eastern portion of Washington pass—not single men, but whole tribes, with their men, women, and children, and their animals laden down with meat and buffalo robes. Nor will there, in my judgment, be any serious obstructions from snow on the South Pass route, or on any of the other practicable routes. As Johnson once said to Boswell, "empty your head of Corsica," I do beg men to empty their heads of this bugbear of snow and ice. The idea should not be entertained as a serious objection to any route.

And now I will come to the defense of the southern route in one particular. I believe the difficulties there, in regard to the heats of summer, are overestimated. It is said that men cannot labor there three months of the year. I cannot speak of that from a thorough knowledge, as I can in regard to the snow and ice of other routes, but I have had some little experience in a somewhat similar region of country; and from the information I possess, I have no question that, by a little management in the hours of working, a party could be kept at work there all the year round. I would like to give my reasons for that judgment, but my time is nearly out, and I have two or three more topics to touch upon.

In the remarks which I have thus far submitted, Mr. Chairman, I have refrained from going into any elaborate statistics. They do not convince much; they simply weary one, and I have preferred to rest my case upon obvious and ascertained facts which come within the experience of all intelligent men.

But I wish, now, to enlarge upon a topic which will require me to refer to some statistics, and that is, that the country requires three routes, and that each is a national route. As regards the southern route, its office is not simply to carry freight and passengers from the Atlantic coast to the southern portions of our Pacific empire, but it has relations with powers south of it, and hence it becomes emphatically national. There are silver mines in Arizona, which will supply the whole country with that metal, and probably the world. There are silver mines in Sonora, also; and the wealth of Sonora, and other parts of Mexico, will find its outlet through that road. That road becomes national, therefore, as regards the whole country, looking to the products of the mines and its influence on a neighboring Power.

Homestead Bill—Mr. Kelly.

As regards the South Pass route, I will observe that there is a larger population on the western slope, on this route, than on either of the others; that it has the direct relations with the great center of the country; and in all respects, except contiguity to foreign Powers, and the carrying trade from Asia to Europe, is entitled to consideration with the other two.

The northern route is, however, preëminently a national one, for the question there is, shall the road which must pass from the great basin of the St. Lawrence, from the great chain of lakes, to the shores of Puget Sound and the Georgian bay, pass through American or through British territory? That is the question.

Sir, great injustice has been done to the country between 49° and 54° 40'. Rejoicing in the acquisition of Arizona, I only wished that her southern line had gone still further south, so as to give us a good port in the Gulf of California. I trust we will have it yet. But it has been our misfortune that we have lost that rich and inviting country between 49° and 54° 40'—a country rich in mineral wealth, in mines of gold, and lead, and platinum, and copper, and sulphur—extending from the shores of the ocean to the Rocky Mountains. At this moment, miners are going to that country from California, and to the northern portion of Washington, where there are equally extensive and rich gold fields, by thousands; and the information which I have is entirely reliable as to the large returns which labor has got there this spring.

Now, the English Government are looking to their communication with the Pacific coast. They have had an examination of the country lying north of the forty-ninth parallel, east of the Rocky Mountains. It is an extensive and splendid grazing country, and has large tracts of arable land adapted to all the cereals and vegetables. They know the wealth of the western coast itself, in its fisheries, in coal, and in all the elements of national prosperity. The question simply is, shall the great line of communication go through American or British territory? I propose to give some figures relative to the question. I have put them in round numbers; but they are very near the mark. The distance from Puget Sound, or Vancouver, on the Columbia, to St. Paul, or the western end of Lake Superior, is eighteen hundred miles; from Benicia to Rock Island, in the Mississippi, by the route of the South Pass, twenty-three hundred miles; from San Francisco to Memphis, by the route of the thirty-fifth parallel, twenty-three hundred miles; from San Francisco to Gaines, by the route of the thirty-second parallel, twenty-two hundred miles. And the distance from Benicia, via the valleys of the Sacramento and Willamette, Vancouver, and the northern route, to St. Paul, is twenty-five hundred miles. If we take the equatic distance, allowing for grade, which, though not important as regards passengers, is an indispensable element as regards freight, we find that the distance from Benicia to St. Paul and the western end of Lake Superior by the northern route, is twenty-nine hundred and fifty miles; from San Francisco to Gaines, by the route of the thirty-second parallel, three thousand miles; from San Francisco to Memphis, by the route of the thirty-fifth parallel, thirty-three hundred miles; and from Benicia to Rock Island, by the South Pass route, twenty-eight hundred and fifty miles. I have made the comparison to the Mississippi river, because this river will be the great artery on which to distribute freight coming from the ports of the Pacific by rail throughout the Mississippi valley.

Thus you see, that looking to the present great commercial depot on the Pacific, San Francisco, the northern route gives her the shortest and best connection with the Northwest and the country lying upon the great lakes, and that this connection is absolutely shorter than her connection with the Mississippi, by the routes of the thirty-fifth and thirty-second parallels. Looking, however, to Puget Sound, and taking the equatic distances, you find that the equatic distance from the Sound to the Upper Mississippi and the great lakes is two thousand two hundred; whereas, from San Francisco to the Mississippi it is two thousand eight hundred and fifty, three thousand three hundred, and three thousand miles, by the routes respectively of the South Pass, the thirty-fifth, and the thirty-second parallels.

But besides the other advantages of the route, Puget Sound is nearest to Asia. The mouth of the straits leading to Puget Sound is on the line of sailing vessels from San Francisco to the ports of China, Japan, and Russia, on the Pacific, and therefore Puget Sound is as much nearer to those countries as is the distance from the entrance of the Straits de Fuca to San Francisco, some seven or eight hundred miles.

Considering, therefore, the greater shortness of the northern route, and its nearer connections with both Asia and Europe, it must become the great route of freight and passengers from Asia to Europe, and even of freight from Asia to the whole valley of the Mississippi.

I have adverted to the views of the English Government in regard to an overland communication through its own possessions. We are contiguous on the forty-ninth parallel to that powerful foreign sovereignty. Which will give us the most strength? which will most add to our defense? which will most stimulate our own genius and force? which will most spread population through our borders and best evoke the resources of our country? which will give us the best footing in the Northwest, and enable us best to hold in our hands the key of the Pacific? a railroad on our own soil, and a great port on our own ocean coast, or a road passing over the soil of that powerful foreign sovereignty, and a great port on its ocean coast? The question of the control of the commerce of the Pacific and of the ascendancy of American genius and enterprise there, is involved in the solution of this question; and therefore I claim for the northern route the friendly consideration of gentlemen from all quarters of the Union, as not a sectional, but as preëminently a national route.

I am of opinion there will be a great freight business on all the routes of Asiatic supplies. By the time the roads are completed, there will be, unquestionably, a population of nearly one million of souls on the line of each route, furnishing the basis of way business, in addition to a vastly larger population resting on the present western line of States, and in the general vicinity of the eastern termini, which will receive their supplies of Asiatic goods by the rail. On the Pacific railroads a great variety of Asiatic products will be distributed to all quarters of the country, and even on these roads pass to Europe. No costly or perishable article, or article which deteriorates by crossing the tropics, will reach our Atlantic ports or the ports of Europe by either cape. Silks, spices, and teas, will go to our depots in the Pacific, and will be taken over the great overland routes to all the States of the Union, to the Canadas, and to Europe.

The imagination of man can scarcely set bounds to the future grandeur of our Pacific empire, and the magnitude of our interests throughout that great sea. Already a commerce is springing up between us and the Russian possessions on the Pacific, by the line of the Amoor, navigable two thousand miles for steamers, whose mouth is but about four thousand miles from Puget Sound, and which will early bring us into connection with thirty millions of people. Lines of sailing vessels now run from our Pacific ports to the Amoor, Japan, China, and the islands of the sea. Fabrics and merchandise of various kinds from San Francisco, but lumber and spars mainly from Puget Sound. San Francisco and Puget Sound are the two great natural centers of commerce on the western coast, and both are essential to its development and control by us, American freemen having a great destiny before us. San Francisco, more developed than Puget Sound, having a much larger immediate population backing it up, is the natural port of California and of our southern States; Puget Sound of our Northwest and our North, and it will be the great port of all the carrying trade by rail from Asia to Europe.

For these reasons, Mr. Chairman, I urge moving to the Pacific on at least three roads. I deem them all national, and required by the exigencies of the age. I beseech American statesmen to take an enlarged and comprehensive view of this great subject; to endeavor to realize our future growth; and, by firmness and wisdom in the policy which they will now inaugurate, to make us one compact and continuous nationality, to make us, in truth, the ocean-bound Republic, controlling the commerce of the world.

HOMESTEAD BILL.

SPEECH OF HON. JOHN KELLY,
OF NEW YORK,IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
May 25, 1858.

The House being in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. KELLY said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I regret that the bill which I had referred to the Committee on Agriculture at the early part of this session has not as yet been reported on, as I would have much preferred addressing whatever remarks I may desire to offer on the homestead question to the bill itself. But the session is now drawing to a close, and the few weeks yet remaining admonish me to avail myself of the privilege offered by the rules of the House, which allow members to speak on all matters appertaining to the general state of the Union. I will take occasion, however, to observe in passing, that the committees of this House have been uniformly prompt in making their reports, even on matters that sink into insignificance when compared with the question of giving a humble homestead to actual settlers on the lands of the Government; and, I will add further, that if the committee should think proper to delay their report much longer I shall feel it to be my duty, at an early day, to move for their discharge from the further consideration of the subject, and ask leave to bring the bill directly before the House. If the Senate bill does not reach us in the mean time, I may fail even in this way to secure a vote on the question; but I will have the consolation to know that I have done my duty to those of our fellow-citizens who are either too modest or too poor to command much influence in this Hall.

I am fully conscious, sir, that this theme is not the most fashionable one I could discuss; to many honorable members it may not even be the most acceptable in other respects to which I might invite their serious attention. But notwithstanding I feel that I shall not appeal in vain, when I invoke this House as I do, most earnestly, to give at least an hour's consideration to the claims upon our liberality and justice, which the bill granting a home on our public lands to actual settlers presents, and thus establish our claims as wise lawmakers and faithful Representatives, to the gratitude of our constituents and the admiration of the world. It has, already, as we all know, become a standing subject of reproach and obloquy upon our national Legislature and upon our Republic, in many of the pampered journals of Europe, that the Congress of the United States can legislate in earnest only when some question connected with slavery or involving the negro race is the subject of deliberation; and it must be confessed that our proceedings, so far, during the present session, would seem to give some show of truth to the unjust and malevolent imputation.

Can we better refute such unfounded calumny, or more forcibly signalize our devotion to the simple republican institutions under which we live, than by adopting every legitimate means within our power; every means which our unparalleled progress as a nation demands, and the Constitution sanctions, to extend the boundaries of our advancing civilization; to people our almost limitless domain with the hardy sons of industry and toil; to expand the wings of commerce, by multiplying our staples of production; and above all, to elevate to the true standard of American freemen, physically and morally, as well as politically, the thousands of our fellow-citizens who are scattered throughout this broad Confederacy of States; who have the heads to conceive; the hands to toil; the unconquerable will to persevere; but, unfortunately, lack the means to purchase an humble homestead, even under the present unexceptionable system of disposing of our public domain. To me, sir, it is a noble theme; one worthy an American Congress, and more than any other which can claim our attention, calculated to illustrate the simplicity and grandeur of our admirable system of government, and to demonstrate its entire capacity to insure to every citizen the full enjoyment of those inalienable rights with which he is endowed by his Creator—life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

The main provision of the bill now before the committee consists in the liberal appropriation contained in the first section, in the following words:

"That any person who is the head of a family, or who has arrived at the age of twenty-one years, and is a citizen of the United States, or who shall have filed his intention to become such, as required by the naturalization laws of the United States, shall, from and after the passage of this act, be entitled to enter, free of cost, one quarter section of vacant and unappropriated public lands which may, at the time the application is made, be subject to private entry, at $1 25 per acre, or a quantity equal thereto, to be located in a body, in conformity with the legal subdivisions of the public lands, and after the same shall have been surveyed."

The other sections of the bill are either explanatory of the first or designed to guard against mistake or fraud in its execution. Its general purport and object is, as its title indicates, to secure homesteads to actual settlers on the public domain.

What is the extent of this domain, or rather of the area of the public lands of the United States, unoccupied and open to settlement at this time? The last report issued from the Interior Department supplies the necessary data to answer this question. "The public domain," the Secretary of the Interior informs us, "covers a surface exclusive of water, of one thousand four hundred and fifty million acres. It stretches across the continent, and embraces every variety of climate and soil, abounding in agricultural, mineral, and timber wealth, everywhere inviting to enterprise, and capable of yielding support to man." The title of the United States to this almost limitless territory is derived from the voluntary cessions of several of the original thirteen States; from the Louisiana purchase under the treaty of 1803; by the treaty of 1819 with Spain; by the treaty of 1848 with Mexico; by the boundary agreement between the Government and Texas, and lastly, by the accession of territory in 1854, from Mexico, known as the Gadsden purchase, by which we acquired twenty-three million one hundred and sixty-one thousand acres south of the river Gila. To ascertain more accurately the quantity of public lands now undisposed of, we take from the whole number of acres, namely, one thousand four hundred and fifty million, that which is disposed of, whether by private claims, grants, sales, &c., namely, three hundred and sixty-three million eight hundred and sixty-two thousand four hundred and sixty-four, and we have an area still to be disposed of, namely, one thousand and eighty-six million one hundred and thirty-seven thousand five hundred and thirty-six acres.

Let us suppose that, by some miraculous manifestations of Him who ruleth the Universe, the United States were called upon to become the grand almoner of mankind—to provide a homestead for every white man, woman, and child on the globe; what would be our first step in fulfilling this apparently impossible requirement? We would ascertain first, how many we would have to provide for; and second, how much we could give to each without disturbing the present condition of landed property, or interfering with existing rights. The population of the globe is estimated at one thousand million, of which the Caucasian or white race, including all the nations of Europe and their descendants in America, also the Hindoos, Persians, and Arabians in Asia, and the Abyssinians, Egyptians, and Moors, in Africa, comprise about four hundred and twenty million souls. Strange as it may seem, it is nevertheless true, that, with the present area of the public domain, which our Government holds for the general benefit of all the people of these United States, we could give to every member of this great Caucasian family, in fee simple, a homestead of over two and a half acres of good cultivable land. Nay, sir, such is the munificence with which a kind Providence has endowed our young and prosperous Republic, that we could, at this moment, give to every one of the inhabitants of the globe, white, black, and red, without either crowding or jostling our own population of twenty-five millions, a lot of ground sufficiently large to build a dwelling and necessary out-houses, and raise a sufficiency of produce for comfortable subsistence.

The proper disposal of the public lands has proved to be a fruitful subject of controversy ever since we became an independent people. It formed a most serious obstacle in the way of a mutual understanding and agreement among the original Thirteen States, at the time of the formation of the Confederation. Some of these States, as it is well known, set up an exclusive right to large tracts of land, which others of them regarded as common property acquired by conquest, and that, in consequence, the title was in the whole Thirteen States, in common, and not in any one of them, separately. This controversy assumed a grave character, and presented a formidable difficulty in forming the Articles of Confederation; and we find that, when these articles were under consideration, the following amendment was proposed:

"That the United States in Congress assembled shall have the sole and exclusive right and power to ascertain and fix the western boundary of such States as claim to the Mississippi or South sea, and lay out the land beyond the boundary so ascertained into separate and independent States from time to time, as the number and circumstances of the people may require."

On this amendment but one State, Maryland, voted; and when the Articles of Confederation were subsequently submitted for ratification, this very question proved to be the most fruitful source of embarrassment, and delayed for a length of time the consummation of the general design. Ever among the first of her sister States in all that concerns the safety or honor of the Union, New York came forward with a proposition for a settlement of the question on a basis that would prove acceptable to her sister States. In March, 1780, her Legislature passed an act proposing to make the cession of these public lands on terms that would prove satisfactory to all, and which ultimately resulted in putting an end to the controversy.

In the preamble to this act, the cause of difficulty is succinctly recited; and an earnest desire is expressed on behalf of the people of the State of New York to remove the impediment. This act of the Legislature of my State was referred to Congress; and the whole subject was ably reviewed by a committee of that body in a report setting forth the necessity of a general cession of the public lands, and the uses to which they should be appropriated, under the control of the General Government. Soon after, and early in 1781, the cession of New York was executed. The deed of cession conveys the property to the United States; and restricts the right of disposal to Congress, and only for the benefit of the whole people. The words of cession are "cede, transfer, and forever relinquish," &c., "to be granted, disposed of, and appropriated in such manner only as the Congress of the said States, or confederated States, shall order and direct." The deed of Virginia was executed in 1784; and cedes unto the United States, in Congress assembled, all right and claim, as well of soils as of jurisdiction, of her public domain. Massachusetts followed, then Connecticut, South Carolina, and subsequently, to the formation of the Constitution, North Carolina and Georgia. All the deeds of cession conform, in spirit and letter, to the resolve of Congress on the subject, adopted on the 10th day of October, 1780, in these words:

"That the unappropriated lands that may be ceded or relinquished to the United States by any particular State, pursuant to the recommendation of Congress of the 6th of September last, shall be disposed of for the common benefit of the United States, and be settled and formed into distinct republican States, which shall become members of the Federal Union, and have the same right of sovereignty, freedom, and independence as the other States; that the said lands shall be granted or settled at such times and under such regulations as shall hereafter be agreed on by the United States in Congress assembled, or any nine or more of them."

The title is thus vested in Congress by the several ceding States, and the power to dispose of them, conformably to the conditions of the several grants, is expressly declared in that clause of the Constitution which provides that:

"Congress shall have power to dispose of, and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory and other property belonging to the United States."

These are historical facts which underlie the public-land system of the United States—constitutional landmarks which must ever be closely observed in any disposition which shall be made of this great public trust.

It is true, that in the mist and fogs of party strife, and in the dim twilight of accidental and short-lived power, when the sun of Democracy had suffered partial eclipse, or when some other similar phenomenon had, for a time, obscured our political firmament, these facts were forgotten and these landmarks were overlooked; but the brood of unconstitutional measures, which, during these intervals, sprung up, with reference to the public lands, soon died out. But few of them emerged from their chrysalis form, and all we know of them is that they dragged with them, into the grave of oblivion, to which they have long since been consigned, the political reputation of every man who shared in their paternity. And here I wish not to be misunderstood. Without committing myself by any declaration of how I should have voted on particular occasions, and in reference to particular bills disposing of portions of our public lands to the new States, I have no hesitation in excepting from the general class of measures to which I have just alluded, three classes of grants—two of which stand upon their own inherent, and, to a certain extent, inalienable merits, and the other upon principles of expediency suggested by a wise and prudent performance of the public trust. I refer to the measures appropriating school lands, swamp lands, and land for railroad purposes.

It is known that, without some express stipulation to the contrary, the new States created out of the territory of the United States, would have the unquestionable power to tax, for State purposes, all the lands lying within the limits of their jurisdiction, without reference to ownership. The exercise of this power by the States, over the public territory within their limits, would necessarily complicate the land system of the United States, and might lead to unpleasant, and perhaps dangerous collisions between the Federal and State authorities. To guard against these difficulties, it has been the practice of the Government, from our earliest history, to enter into a compact with the State seeking admission, by which the United States agrees to transfer to the new State one section of land in each township for "the use of schools," and five per cent. of the net proceeds of the sale of the public lands lying within the State, after deducting all expenses incident to the same for public roads.

"Provided, That the foregoing propositions herein offered are on the condition that the said convention which shall form the constitution of said State shall provide, by a clause in said constitution, or an ordinance, irrevocable without the consent of the United States, that said State shall never interfere with the primary disposal of the soil within the same by the United States, nor with any regulations Congress may find necessary for securing the title in such soil to bona fide purchasers thereof; and that no tax shall be imposed on lands the property of the United States; and that in no case shall non-resident proprietors be taxed higher than residents."

In reference to this provision the Hon. Mr. FAULKNER, of Virginia, in his instructive and able address on the land policy of the United States, says:

"The grant of school lands, &c., is made as a consideration for the attainment of three important objects:

"1. That the State shall never interfere with the primary disposal of the soil within the same by the United States.

"2. That no tax shall be imposed on lands the property of the United States.

"3. That in no case shall non-resident proprietors be taxed higher than residents."

"The importance of these stipulations," continues Mr. FAULKNER, "may be at once seen by reference to the fact that we have at this time, exclusive of California, four hundred and seventy-one million eight hundred and ninety-two thousand four hundred and thirty-nine acres of land lying within the jurisdiction of the States, which is altogether exempt from taxation." As remarked by Mr. Webster, in January, 1839:

"Whilst held by the United States, these lands are not subject to State taxation. They contribute nothing to the burdens thrown on other lands. Here is a great proprietor in a State, holding large territory, exempt from common burdens."

On the subject of the swamp lands, Mr. FAULK-

Homestead Bill—Mr. Kelly.

Ho. OF REPS.

NER is so full, and at the same time so concise, that I shall again quote from his excellent essay:

"In almost every State or Territory of the United States, where the Government holds public lands, and more particularly in the southern States of Louisiana, Arkansas, Missouri, and Florida, are found large parcels of it overflowed by water. These lands are entirely unfit for cultivation, indeed not susceptible of being surveyed, and serve but to infect the States in which they are situated with disease, not confined to the lands themselves, but spreading far and wide in the adjacent country, and depreciating the domain belonging to the Government within the reach of the miasma arising from them. The existence of such a nuisance in the States was, for many years, a subject of loud complaint. Congress at length yielded to these just complaints, and by act of the 28th of September, 1850, granted to the States in which they were located, 'the whole of those swamp and overflowed lands, made unfit thereby for cultivation.'"

"Provided, That the proceeds of said lands, whether from sale or by direct appropriation in kind, shall be applied exclusively, as far as necessary, to the purpose of reclaiming said lands." The States would, doubtless, have much preferred that the General Government had retained the lands and undertaken itself the work of drainage. But in the absence of any such improbable action by the Federal Government, it was not to be endured that these lands should remain in their then condition, unfit for sale, destructive of the value of the adjacent public domain, and a source of disease and death to the inhabitants of the States. So manifest seemed the propriety of this measure, granting the 'swamp lands' to the States for that purpose, that the bill passed the Senate without a dissenting voice, while in the House it passed by a vote of 120 yeas to 53 nays."

The other class of grants, namely, railroad grants, do not rest upon the same obvious and indefeasible grounds of consideration and necessity. Still they are supported by strong arguments, and perhaps by stronger names. The late Secretary of the Interior says, in reference to them:

"The right to donate a part for the enhancement of the value of the residue can no longer be questioned. The principle has been adopted and acted upon for nearly thirty years, and since experience has shown it to be productive of so much good, no sound reason is perceived why it should now be abandoned. It has been of incalculable importance to the great West, and either directly or indirectly to all the States."

That the policy of railroad grants, however, is liable to abuse, and perhaps to extravagance and corruption, is not so free from doubt as is the mere question of its constitutionality. Few of our citizens can ever expect to occupy the alternate sections as actual settlers, because few such can gratify the enormous cupidity of the speculators into whose hands they most generally pass. This, however, is one of the evils which the present bill proposes to remove, and which, on this ground, if no other existed, should commend the measure to universal acceptance. On the subject of these railroad grants, however, I am willing to indorse, to the fullest extent, the views of the present Executive, as communicated to this House in his last annual message:

"Whilst the public lands, as a source of revenue, are of great importance, their importance is far greater as furnishing homes for a hardy and independent race of honest and industrious citizens, who desire to subdue and cultivate the soil. They ought to be administered mainly with a view of promoting this wise and benevolent policy. In appropriating them for any other purpose, we ought to use even greater economy than if they had been converted into money and the proceeds were already in the public Treasury. To squander away this richest and noblest inheritance which any people have ever enjoyed, upon objects of doubtful constitutionality or expediency, would be to violate one of the most important trusts ever committed to any people. Whilst I do not deny to Congress the power, when acting bona fide as a proprietor, to give away portions of them for the purpose of increasing the value of the remainder, yet, considering the great temptation to abuse this power, we cannot be too cautious in its exercise."

With respect to the various other modes proposed at different periods, and by different parties, to dispose of what Mr. Clay, in 1832, properly denominated "a great public national trust," there is now but one opinion among all classes of politicians. They have passed away; and I trust we shall hear of them no more. The questions of dividing the public lands among the States, of distributing the proceeds of the public lands, &c., were in such palpable violation of the constitutional powers of Congress, that for twenty years an express clause was inserted in the national platform of the party with which I am connected in the following words:

"That the Constitution does not confer authority upon the Federal Government, directly or indirectly, to assume the debts of the several States, contracted for local and internal improvements, or other State purposes; nor would such assumption be just or expedient."

"That the proceeds of the public lands ought to be sacredly applied to the national objects specified in the Constitution, and that we are opposed to any law for the distribution of such proceeds among the States, as alike inexpedient in policy and repugnant to the Constitution."

These and other objections which have been urged, and I must confess with much force, against distribution or cession among the States, as well as against any disposition of the public lands, having a partial or special application whether to States or corporations, disappear in view of the general application contemplated by the provisions of this bill. Indeed, in carefully reading over the arguments, as to the constitutional question, of Webster, Clay, Calhoun, Benton, and of others whose names are prominently connected with the different land questions, I find that the very terms in which these objections have, at different periods, been stated, not only logically imply, but in some instances directly declare an assent to the principles and a concurrence in the general objects of any bill which, in the language of Mr. Clay, assumes that the General Government is "bound to hold and administer the lands ceded as a common fund for the use and benefit of all the States, and for no other use or purpose whatever," and on this assumption, proposes to dispose of this common fund in such manner as will benefit the whole people without discrimination, and in an equal degree. And the reason must appear obvious to every one, because what was ceded expressly for the benefit of the whole people "of all the States," and what was acquired by the common blood, or the common treasure of all alike, should inure to the common benefit of all, and not to the exclusive use of private monopolies, or even of individual States. I apprehend, however, that we shall encounter but little opposition on constitutional grounds; that gentlemen will hardly be willing to go before their constituents and tell them that, because of constitutional objections which do not exist, they voted against a measure so essentially Democratic and popular, so imperatively demanded by the great mass of our fellow-citizens, so just and so necessary, in view of the investigations of the last and present Congress, that I look upon the homestead bill as the only means now left us to cut off forever the fruitful source of the corruption and perjury which have already disgraced us in the eyes of the world. And here I might pause, and be willing to trust the fate of the measure I advocate to the influence which this view cannot fail to suggest in its support.

It is objected by those who have heretofore opposed bills of this kind, that the loss of revenue which would accrue to the Government forms one of the principal grounds on which their objection rests; and the precise form in which they are enabled to present this difficulty gives to it an apparent weight which has influenced, to some extent, the public mind. They parade before us the Treasury reports, and marshal in their defense quite a formidable array of dollars and cents. Of the many objections urged against the homestead bill, this revenue one I regard as the most fallacious, and least creditable to a great, prosperous nation like ours. Our progress in the career of national greatness is unequalled in the history of man. In territorial extent, as we are informed by the last census, we are ten times as large as Great Britain and France combined; three times as large as France, Great Britain, Austria, Prussia, Spain, Portugal, Belgium, Holland, and Denmark together; only one sixth less than the area covered by all the Empires, States, and Republics of Europe; and of equal extent with the Empire of the mad Macedonian who wept tears because he had no more worlds to conquer.

We stand first among the nations of the earth in commercial power, and we yield to none in that spirit of national pride which attaches more or less to every man who has a country he can call his own. Our population has increased from a little over three millions to nearly thirty millions, and we have not yet much exceeded the span usually assigned to the life of man. And yet, in legislating for the masses of the American people who constitute this great nation, in devising the best means to give profitable employment and permanent homes to the pent-up thousands who are found in our large cities, without employment and without the means of subsistence; when we desire to subdue our unbroken forests and spread out our population across the Rocky Mountains, and over the fertile plains which our new Territories have added to the sum of our national resources, we are met with the paltry objection that it will diminish our revenues by the stupendous amount of about three million dollars a year! This is about the average sum which our public lands yield one year with another. Three million dollars! Let us look into this argument for a moment. Suppose that ten thousand male adults should apply for the benefits of this bill the first year after it has become a law. It would require one million six hundred thousand acres to give each one the prescribed quantity. Are we to suppose that these ten thousand citizens are to be mere drones in the body-politic of the nation; and that these one million six hundred thousand acres of land are to remain unproductive? That they will not yield sufficient corn and wheat and hemp and tobacco and perhaps cotton to swell our national exports, and to increase our national imports? The supposition, even if the bill did not exact permanent occupation and cultivation as a condition requisite to perfect title, would be ridiculous and absurd. And it should be borne in mind that, assuming twenty per cent. as an average rate of duty on imports, it would require an increased importation of only $15,000,000 in value, to make up dollar for dollar the amount of the revenue from lands which would be retired by the passage of the bill. And another fact gives still greater force to this view of the case. It is this: the public lands, as a source of revenue, must go on diminishing from year to year until they are entirely exhausted, while the augmented revenue arising from the operations of the homestead bill will increase from year to year, and continue increasing so long as we exist as a civilized nation.

But, sir, after all, this is but the Shylock view of a question fraught with so much that affects our glorious destiny and our future progress. If we look at it as becomes patriots and statesmen, mere dollars and cents will vanish altogether from our view, and the living, moving elements of our real national wealth will rise up in all their grandeur before our eyes. Dollars and cents are the miser's argument, but they are not a nation's wealth. That, sir, consists in dross; this is composed of freemen only. The mother of the Gracchi uttered a sentiment worthy the best days of Rome, when, pointing to her sons, she said, "these are my jewels." Truly has the poet answered his own interrogatory:

"What constitutes a State?
Not high-raised battlement or labor'd mound,
'Thick wall or moated gate."
* * * * *
No: MEN, high-minded men,
* * * * *
Men who their duties know,
But know their rights, and knowing, dare maintain them."

Sir, fill up your frontier settlements with such men; give them an interest in the soil; let them erect their log-cabins, and plant their crops, and they will protect both from the marauding Indian until he adopts the habits of civilized life, or quietly recedes before the onward march of American progress. They will constitute a permanent reliance for protection and defense, obnoxious neither to the apprehensions which dread the influence of large standing armies upon our institutions and our liberties, nor to that tender solicitude which would spare Mormon polygamy the indiscriminate slaughter of a disciplined soldiery. This is the way in which Great Britain fills up and protects her colonial territories. She not only gives to her emigrant subjects homesteads, but the means also of reclaiming them to agricultural purposes. It was by such measures Great Britain has succeeded in building up that stupendous colonial empire which has never been equaled by any nation, whether ancient or modern. Says one of her own writers:

"To that empire, Great Britain owes her present exalted station; and to that empire must she look for its preservation and for the preservation of the many advantages she possesses over other nations. But, unless her colonies are productive; unless they are stocked with inhabitants, by whose industry her merchant ships are loaded, how could the colonies subserve to that permanent object?"

Thus, it has always been her policy to grant Crown lands, on easy terms, to actual settlers. She does so at the present day, and on a principle which combines protection with production. It has ever been one of the cardinal principles of British colonial policy to consider as forfeited the lands of such of the aborigines or natives of her possessions as refused to acknowledge her dominion or rebelled against her usurped authority. On this principle some of the richest portions of Ireland, whose lawful and hereditary owners spurned British alliance, and have bravely struggled against British usurpation, were parceled out to the Saxon adventurers who, at different periods, accompanied the armies of England into that beautiful but down-trodden island; and on this principle she sought to purchase the loyalty of the disaffected, during our own colonial struggles, by profuse largesses of land and money. This principle is still recognized in her possessions in South Africa, and a regular system introduced in distributing homesteads to such as may be willing to accept and defend them. I have recently come across a book in which I find the conditions and covenants upon which the Crown lands and those forfeited by rebellious natives are now disposed of.

Here are the leading points—outlines of the conditions and covenants upon which Crown lands will be disposed of:

1. The farms to be from three hundred to four thousand acres.

2. Each proprietor shall be an efficiently armed man, and for every thousand acres, over one thousand, each proprietor shall, in addition to himself provide one armed man for the defense of the district.

6. The farms to be occupied three months from the date of this notice.

8. The grantee to reside upon his farm and in case he shall, without actual necessity, absent himself for so long as six months or upwards, the Government shall be entitled, should it seem fit, to take possession of the farm and grant it out again.

9. The farms to be granted on perpetual quit-rent not redeemable, averaging from two dollars and forty cents to four dollars per one thousand acres. The survey, and inspection expenses to be paid by the grantee.

10. Proprietors of farms after three years' occupation, but not before, to be at liberty to subdivide or sell.

This is the way in which Great Britain builds up her vast colonial power, and extends the limits of her empire, on which, it is said, the sun never sets. But a few years back, and this colony was given up to the native Hottentot and Kaffir; now it boasts of all the arts of civilized life, its churches, colleges, and schools, and a thriving, industrious, and intelligent population of two hundred thousand British subjects, and about one hundred thousand natives reclaimed to a state of civilization and independence, under the colonial rule of Great Britain. What strength is thus added to the power of Great Britain, and what new fields are opened to her commercial enterprise? I have a statement showing the value of her exports to this Cape Colony alone for a period of five consecutive years, and I present it as illustrating the wise policy which dictates the liberal terms on which Great Britain offers her Crown lands to actual settlers:

Value of Exports from Great Britain to the Cape Colony, from 1846 to 1850.

1846.....	$2,404,895
1847.....	3,441,040
1848.....	3,226,090
1849.....	2,604,805
1850.....	3,983,000

For these exports Great Britain receives in return colonial produce, which enables her to put her looms in motion, to give employment to her operatives, and scatter her manufactures throughout every quarter of the globe. I shall refer to only one of these staples—wool—and show the astonishing progress made within a few years in raising this article in the colony. In 1833, the exports from the colony amounted to one hundred and thirteen thousand and seventy-seven pounds. In 1843, they reached one million seven hundred and fifty-four thousand seven hundred and thirty-seven pounds; and in 1850, they rose to seven million seven hundred and seventy-three thousand five hundred and five pounds, with an annually increasing quantity since. When we consider that, next to cotton, wool is one of the most indispensable raw materials entering into the mammoth system of British manufactures, the commercial benefit to Great Britain of homestead grants to actual settlers cannot better be demonstrated than by subjoining the following table, for which I am indebted, through the politeness of the Secretary of State, to the statistical office of that Department:

Statement showing the exports of wool from Port Elizabeth (Cape Colony) from 1832 to June 30, 1857:

1832.....	5,925,059 lbs.
1833.....	6,160,916 "
1834.....	6,446,866 "
1835.....	9,096,256 "
1836.....	11,892,305 "
To June 30, 1857.....	7,659,781 "

Or, at the same rate, during the last six months of 1857, from six million pounds in 1852, to fifteen million pounds in 1857. The trade of Great Britain with her Australian colonies shows similar results; and it may not be unworthy of notice in this connection that, besides her homesteads to her male emigrants to these colonies, Great Britain has, of late years, in the plenitude of her philanthropy, legislated husbands for such of her female emigrants as chose to try their fortunes in the wilds of Australia. The policy is a wise one. Look at its results, even as a question of dollars and cents:

Statement showing the exports from Great Britain to the Australian colonies in 1853, 1856, 1857:

1853.....	$31,394,830
1856.....	49,562,875
1857.....	58,130,730

And it must be borne in mind that these figures exhibit the trade of only one division of the British colonial possessions. The results for all of her colonies are so marvelous that we could scarcely credit them, if we did not know that they were derived from official sources. Here is a brief summary.

Total value of exports from Great Britain to all her colonial possessions in 1853, 1856, 1857:

1853.....	$132,760,000
1856.....	166,500,000
1857.....	185,575,000

These are the results of her system of colonization, of her homestead grants to actual settlers; and this is the true meaning as well as the apt illustration of the passage which I have already cited from one of her own standard commercial writers—Irrving on Commerce of India:

"But unless her colonies are productive, unless they are stocked with inhabitants, by whose industry her merchant ships are loaded, how could the colonies subserve to that permanent object?"

We have all read of the successive commercial ascendancy of Venice and the Republics of the Mediterranean; of the Portuguese, and of the Dutch, in what was then known as Hindostan. The Spanish and French, the Swedes and Danes, the Prussians and Austrians, even played their parts; but, except in the case of France, they have left but little trace of commercial success. And why? Because colonization and settlement did not enter into their commercial speculations. They acquired no territory, and offered no homesteads to industrious emigrants. Great Britain has done this, and now behold in the figures I have given, the stupendous results of her judicious policy. Her manufactures enter into every district of that limitless country, and her merchants, in literal fulfillment of the prophecy of Ezekiel, (xxvii. 24,) introduce "all sorts of things in blue cloths, and brodered, and in chests of rich apparel, bound with cords, and made of cedar, among her merchandise."

With such results as these before our eyes, gentlemen stand boggling at the paltry sum of $3,000,000 a year, while we have a country unbroken and unoccupied, as fertile and as salubrious as any watered by the Ganges or the Nile; capable of sustaining a population of two hundred million freemen; of swelling our imports and our exports far above those of Great Britain and France united; ready for the woodman's ax, and the energy and skill of the adventurous pioneer; but hermetically sealed against the productive labor of the country, now unemployed, except in clamoring for a subsistence which in its present narrow confines it cannot, if it would, procure by honest toil, and which must be supplied while we remain subject to the laws of our common Creator. Let me, therefore, beg of gentlemen, who oppose a homestead bill because it may deprive us of a few million dollars now derived from the sale of the public lands, to take up any of our Treasury reports and compare our commerce and our resources in 1800, with our commerce and resources in 1850; then compare our population at the former period with our population at the latter, and ponder the results for five minutes in their mind. After they have done this, I am willing to trust the fate of this bill to their patriotism and judgment.

In this connection, the following statements, which I have borrowed from the census of 1850, will not be irrelevant. They will show, at least, that we need entertain no fears that our population can ever be too dense for the area of territory now comprised within our limits. Before that contingency can happen, the manifest destiny which is hurrying us onward in our career of national glory, will have opened new fields for our enterprise, and new countries for the influence of our institutions, which are now desolate and blighted under the baneful curse of traditional misgovernment:

The States, taken together, have a density of about sixteen to the square mile; the Territories have one inhabitant only to every sixteen square miles. Texas and California together have less than one to a square mile, whilst nearly twenty-five persons inhabit a square mile in the region east of the Mississippi, and nearly twenty persons in the Atlantic slope. In the Mississippi valley there are only about seven persons to the square mile; west of the Mississippi less than one person to the square mile; on the Pacific slope less than one person to every six square miles. With the density of the Mississippi valley, the United States would have but twenty-one million inhabitants; with the density of the southern States, the number would have been nearly forty-five millions; with the density of New England, one hundred and twenty-three millions; and, with the density of the Middle States, one hundred and seventy millions. According to Tucker, a population of two hundred millions would not require a density of more than seventy to a square mile, and the preceding statement shows how largely that is exceeded by some of the most advanced countries of Europe.

But, sir, humanity claims for this bill the serious consideration of every member of this House, more especially of those who, like myself, represent, in part, any of the large and populous cities of the Union. For the laboring, working classes, large cities, with superabundant populations, are but the portals from wretchedness to death. They can find no employment whereby to "earn their bread by the sweat of their brow;" and idleness, poverty, and crime, are the legitimate results. The very shifts they resort to—the avocations they follow, even if they desire to live honestly, in quest of subsistence, yield but scarcely sufficient to supply unwholesome, scanty, unnutritious diet, and hence the statistics of city life exhibit a frightful mortality. Hear what one of the most logical writers in this or any country says on this subject.

"But the most disastrous and appalling consequences of city avocations is the waste of human life. In the city of New York, the deaths last year (this was written in 1849) exceeded fourteen thousand, or one person out of every twenty-eight; and it was a year of no uncommon mortality for that place. And the mortality of New York is much greater than it seems; because being so largely emigrant from the interior and from abroad; the proportion of adults in her population is much greater than ordinary, and among adults mortality is not so great as among her children. New York has fifty thousand children less than her share. In the last twenty years, the population of New York has nearly doubled, but its mortality has nearly trebled. According to an official statement of the duration of human life, in the several avocations in Massachusetts in 1847, it appears that the average of agriculture is 64.14 years, merchants, 49.20 years, mechanics, 46.45 years, laborers, 46.73 years. This is the average life-time in the several occupations beginning at twenty years. According to this the three avocations of city life, merchants, mechanics and laborers, average about forty-six and a half years, whilst farmers live more than sixty-four years, or one third longer."

Homestead Bill—Mr. Kelly.

Thus, a homestead bill which will make farmers of all who apply for its benefits will not only contribute to our national wealth and increase our comparatively limited population, but it will rob death of its prey, and rescue from his cold embrace one third of his city victims.

But there are other considerations which appeal to our humanity, as enlightened legislators, no less powerfully than this almost atrocious destruction of human life; for it is not only atrocious, but inexcusable to permit it, when it can be so easily obviated—I mean the alarming pauperism and consequent demoralization which prevail in our large cities. The statistics of every populous city in the Union, from Boston to San Francisco, present melancholy details of the alarming condition of society. The annual reports from the poor commissioners, as well as the enormous expenditures called for every year, all of which fall in the first instance on the tax-paying communities of the different cities, though they are ultimately wiped out by the sweat of the laborer's brow, would appal gentlemen if I were to present them now, even in their aggregate magnitude. In some cities we find one pauper for every five; in others, one for every eight; but in all, the proportion of paupers to the whole population is such as to claim and demand the most serious consideration of the law-making power, as well as of the philanthropist and Christian. Does not humanity, then, as well as patriotism, invoke our favorable action on a bill which will withdraw from our large cities this overplus population, and by giving a proper incentive to its industry and labor, rescue it from pauperism and death? It is not for the worthless vagrant who is found in every large city, lurking amid the haunts of vice and wretchedness, I appeal. This pauperism strikes down those who are able and willing to work, and therefore fit subjects for the bounty of Congress. It is a truism in political economy, that when pauperism seizes upon this class of citizens, the wages of labor are reduced to the cost of subsistence. The whole class must therefore be subjected to the necessity of working, rather to avoid the poor-house than of bettering their condition. There is but small hope of laying up a provision for the rainy day, and still less for leaving any means of subsistence for their families, should death snatch them away from the miseries of earth. This kind of pauperism is even more hopeless than that which finds a refuge in the poor-house, because there, in sickness and in health, without destroying or overtaxing the vital powers, the inmate is supplied with healthy food and all that his necessities require; while the industrious laboring classes too proud to depend on charity, struggle on, in toil and labor, until exhausted nature sinks under the burden, and a premature grave closes the scene. Rescue these, and such as these, not from New York, or Boston, or New Orleans, or Baltimore, but from every city and town and village in the Union—rescue them from drudgery and death; transform them into useful, industrious citizens of a free and prosperous Republic; and the day is not distant when two hundred million American freemen will recur with emotions of gratitude and praise, to the crowning act of the Thirty-Fifth Congress. The earth which God made is man's. His title to it is recorded in heaven. Give him, at least, a share of it—a spot for a cot, and a garden, and a grave when he dies, else God will hold us as usurpers, and faithless stewards, when the great day of reckoning shall come.

There is nothing agrarian in this. The rich are not despoiled of their wealth for the benefit of the poor. Our act will be doubly blessed—for it will bless him that gives as well as him that receives. What we grant will make no man poorer; it will lessen the burden of taxation, while the gift will contain the germ of a development in our country's progress that will push us onward to a higher point of national grandeur and glory in a few years than, under ordinary circumstances, we could hope to attain during a whole century. Agrarianism is but the popular name for spoliation. We only give to the people what belongs to them of divine right—to the people of the North as well as of the South—to those of the East and to those of the West—to every section, without distinction, provided they are citizens, or intend to become such. It is folly to say that in any particular section of our common country this bill would be fruitless of benefit. Last session, such an assertion was made by an honorable member from North Carolina; but the facetious manner in which he attempted to prove the assertion, soon convinced us that the gentleman was only poking a little fun at us. He remarked:

"Do you say that the citizen of North Carolina may, equally with others, avail himself of its provisions? I deny it. You require him to cease to be a citizen of North Carolina, and to become a citizen of one of the western States or Territories before he can avail himself of them. His being a citizen of North Carolina stands in the way of his receiving the bounty of his Government. He is condemned to 'outer darkness,' to 'eternal woe,' where the genial rays of his country's favor can never reach him, because he is a citizen of North Carolina and will not consent to leave her."

The poetry of this argument is, I believe, borrowed from Milton; and as that writer flourished long before the days of our Revolution, he cannot be expected to know much about American progress, and still less about the impoverished, worn-out lands of some portions of North Carolina. If the citizen of the Bay State, however, would, in reality, rather pine away and toil on his worn-out acres, or continue to breathe in his virtuous poverty, rather than emigrate to the West, and cultivate his one hundred and sixty acres of virgin soil, granted him by a generous Government, then would the poetry become a reality indeed, and in his case, at least, "truth would be stranger than fiction." The gentleman did not surely forget that, in the remotest corner of our territorial limits as well as in the gallant State of North Carolina, the stars and stripes are floating in the breeze, and the emigrant settler, whether he may have come from North Carolina or from Plymouth Rock, may proudly exclaim, "I am an American!"

If there be any one feature in the bill which more than another commends it to general favor, it is the entire equality with which it embraces and extends to every citizen, of every degree. The millionaire and the day laborer are treated alike, without fear, affection, or favor. It is more just, as well as more equal, than any former bill granting public lands. The last act of this character—that of 1853—is, perhaps, the most liberal on the statute-book. It grants one hundred and sixty acres to every man who had served but fourteen days in the military service. Here the patriotic intention was rewarded. But why stop here? Why discriminate? The bounty of the Government attached to the good fortune of being accepted into the service, and not to the patriotism of being willing and ready, if required, to enter the ranks of our country's defenders; and it would be a libel upon our countrymen to assert that those who were ready at a moment's notice, but were not required, were not as patriotic and deserving as the more fortunate, who were first at hand, and consequently, first called into service. The homestead bill abolishes this unjust discrimination, and regards every American citizen as a patriot and a soldier. It goes further; for it gives to every man a homestead to fight for, and a domestic hearth to incite his courage, should the foeman ever dare invade our soil. And it has, besides, the merit of keeping the homestead out of the hands of speculators, by not being assignable—an inherent curse in all former laws granting the public lands.

At the close of the war of the Revolution, the area of the United States comprised eight hundred and twenty thousand six hundred and eighty square miles, or five hundred and twenty-five million two hundred and thirty-five thousand two hundred acres; now it has expanded to about three million square miles, or within a fraction of two thousand million acres. In the States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Michigan, Arkansas, Florida, Iowa, Wisconsin, and California, together with Minnesota, Oregon, Washington, New Mexico, Utah, Nebraska, Indian territories, and Kansas, embracing an aggregate of fourteen hundred and fifty million acres, there are still unsurveyed ten hundred and forty-one million eight hundred and five thousand acres, inviting the onward march of American civilization, and awaiting only the liberal action of an American Congress to become the theater of a progress unparalleled in the history of the human race. How many homesteads, of one hundred and sixty acres each, would this unsurveyed land alone supply? Not less than six million five hundred and eleven thousand two hundred and eighty-four; or, allowing ten persons to every one hundred and sixty acres, we have a sufficient quantity of public lands—unsurveyed, not yet brought into market, but even now ready for the industry and skill of the adventurous pioneer and the hard-fisted emigrant—for an additional population of sixty-five million souls. What a glorious destiny awaits us, if we are only true to ourselves, and to the high mission which Providence has marked out for us!

There is, perhaps, as little of the enthusiast or the filibuster in my composition as in that of any other member in this Hall. I neither magnify what we have, nor am I apt to covet unjustly what we have not. Still, sir, I am not deaf to the teachings of the past fifty years, nor am I altogether blind to the glorious future which already dawns upon the country. Our destiny, I think, embraces a still wider scope than that included within the figures I have given. It stretches beyond our present confines, and beckons us onwards to regions which are yet to feel the humanizing influence of American institutions. On the north civilization was planted by the Gaul and the Briton; but the growth has been slow; and even now the country, in many places, is but little advanced from a state of primeval barbarism.

The progress made in British America, covering as it does upwards of three million square miles, or nearly two thousand million acres, is not such as befits so near a neighbor of this great American Republic. Of this northern portion of our continent, Canada, which embraces about two hundred and twenty-two million acres, cannot much longer be kept out of the American Union. She has long ago been drifting in this direction, and when she comes we will receive her with a hearty and cordial welcome into the family of free States. After Canada, the other portions of British North America will soon follow; for New Britain, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward's Island, and the other political divisions of this portion of our continent, are not more closely allied to each other by geographical lines and political ties, than the whole are to us by the inevitable union of interests, destiny, and race. Think you, sir, that the two million people who, as subjects of Great Britain, inhabit the fertile valleys and are thinly scattered over the rich soil of East and West Canada, would not soon multiply into ten times the number when, under the benign influence of American institutions, they became transformed into free citizens of a mighty Republic? There are now, it is believed, nearly sixty thousand living in Canada who were born in the United States, (and there are there no Know Nothings to molest or oppress them,) and a large number of descendants of United States loyalists, whose immediate ancestors sided with the British during the American war. The latter we will forgive for the sins of their parents; we will blot out their iniquities, and extend over them the protection of good laws and free government.

The day may not be distant, when, under the provisions of a homestead bill similar to the present, the new States, of what was once British North America, will become the most populous and thrifty in the grand confederacy of the American Union. Then further down south, Cuba already beckons us onward. She is ours by nature—she must soon be ours by right. The South American States are convulsed—anarchy broods over them all. Central America is dismembered, and Mexico is rent asunder by dissension and strife. Let us then be true to our destiny—true to the principles of republican government, and above all, true to our own adventurous and enterprising people. Let our population advance, and with it the principles of free government. Let every citizen have a home, and in every home there will be an altar to freedom.

Sir, the past history as well as the future destiny of our glorious Republic alike demand that this bill should no longer be postponed.

LEGISLATION OF CONGRESS UPON THE AMERICAN FISHERIES.

SPEECH OF HON. S. C. FOSTER,

OF MAINE,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

May 24, 1858.

The House being in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. FOSTER said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: It has been the uniform policy of this Government, from its foundation, and under all changes of Administration, with a single exception, to encourage our cod and mackerel fisheries, by bounties and allowances for the salt consumed in curing the fish. This proposition will not, I think, be controverted by any one who will investigate the subject. And it is equally clear to my mind, that the object of the Federal Government, in thus fostering the fisheries, has been to train seamen for the public service in times of war.

I will proceed, briefly, to establish the historical proof of these propositions, and to show the wisdom of the course which has been pursued. Sir, the second act of the First Congress, passed July 4, 1789—an act for raising revenue—was not unmindful of the duty of protecting the fisheries. The fourth section of the act is in these words:

"That there shall be allowed and paid on every quintal of dried, and on every barrel of pickled fish, of the fisheries of the United States, and on every barrel of salted provisions of the United States, exported to any country without the limits thereof, in lieu of a drawback of the duties imposed on the importation of the salt employed and expended therein, namely:

"On every quintal of dried fish, five cents;

"On every barrel of pickled fish, five cents;

"On every barrel of salted provisions, five cents."

The first section of the act laid a duty on imported salt of six cents per bushel. It also laid a duty of seventy-five cents per barrel on imported pickled fish. (See Stat. at Large, vol. 1, page 24.)

It may be alleged that this bounty was only intended as a drawback of the salt duty. But the allowance or drawback is accompanied by heavy duties upon imported pickled and dried fish—duties ten times the amount of the salt duties—and furnishing a most ample remuneration for the latter. How then can it be doubted that the object and purpose of the First Congress was to foster the fisheries?

In August, 1790, the same Congress passed another revenue act, doubling the tax on salt, and doubling the allowances to exporters of fish. (See Stat. at Large, vol. 1, page 180.)

In 1792, February 16, Congress passed another important act touching the fisheries, and leaving no doubt on the mind of any one that the object was to protect, encourage, and foster them, as schools for seamen. The previous act paid the allowances to the exporters of fish—in other words, to merchants who bought fish in the markets for exportation. The fish consumed in the home market produced no bounty to the catcher, or to any one else, except that indirectly accruing from the high duties upon foreign fish. But the act of 1792 went much further, and paid bounties directly to the owners of vessels and crews. A proviso of this act goes still further to remove any lingering doubt as to the real object and purpose of its framers, by requiring that the fishing vessels shall remain at sea, engaged in the business of catching fish, at least four months of the fishing season. If the object of the bounty was simply to refund the salt duty, there would not be the slightest propriety in any of these regulations. With such an object in view, the Government, by the plainest dictates of common sense, would only require the production of the salted fish as a condition of refunding the duty on salt; and it would be equally absurd and unjust to interfere with the contracts between the fishermen and their employers, or to require four months in the performance of a labor which might be dispatched in two or three. I will read the material parts of this act, in order that the committee, and those who may think proper to read my remarks, may see that I have not misrepresented it. It was passed, as I have said, on the 16th of February, 1792, and is entitled "An act concerning certain fisheries of the United States, and for the regulation and government of the fishermen employed therein." It enacts:

"That the allowance now made upon the exportation of dried fish of the fisheries of the United States, in lieu of a drawback of the duties paid on the salt used in preserving the same, shall cease on all dried fish exported after the 10th day of June next, and, as a commutation and equivalent therefor, there shall be afterward paid, on the last day of December, annually, to the owner of every vessel, or his agent, by the collector of the district where such vessel may belong, that shall be qualified agreeably to law for carrying on the bank or other cod fisheries, and shall actually have been employed therein at sea for the term of four months at least of the fishing season next preceding—which season is accounted to be from the last day of February to the last day of November in every year—for each and every ton of such vessel's burden, according to her admeasurement as licensed or enrolled; if of twenty tons, and not exceeding thirty tons, $1 50, and if above thirty tons, $2 50. Of which allowance aforesaid, three eighths parts shall accrue and belong to the owner of such fishing vessel; and the other five eighths thereof shall be divided by him, his agent, or lawful representative, to and among the several fishermen who shall have been employed in such vessel during the season aforesaid, or a part thereof, as the case may be, in such proportion as the fish they shall respectively have taken may bear to the whole quantity of fish taken on board such vessel during such season: Provided, That the allowance aforesaid on any one vessel, for one season, shall not exceed one hundred and seventy dollars."

The second section extended the allowance to fishing boats of five tons and under twenty tons, at the rate of one dollar per ton, provided they land at least twelve quintals of fish per ton. This statute was to continue in force seven years, and to the end of the next following session of Congress (See Stat. at Large, vol. 1, page 229.)

It will be seen that every clause of this act, proviso and all, keeps in view the leading idea of fostering a school for seamen, while the restoration of the salt duty is either lost sight of or merely used as a pretext. In the first place, the bounty is paid without reference to the exportation of the fish; second, it is paid, not in proportion to the fish caught and salted, but with reference to the size of the vessel. If under twenty tons, only one dollar per ton is paid, on the principle that such a vessel or boat is not calculated to afford the best discipline for seamen; vessels of twenty to thirty tons in admeasurement are treated a little better; they receive one dollar and fifty cents, while all above thirty tons burden are to receive two dollars and a half. Third, the bounty is not paid unless the vessels are at sea, engaged in catching fish, at least four months during the fishing season. If one vessel should be out two months, and catch five times as many fish as another which remains out four months, the latter would receive the bounty, while the former would receive nothing. Could the object of this regulation be made plainer? Is it not clear that the salt had nothing to do with it? Fourth, the bounty was to be divided between the shipowner and the seamen, in certain proportions. The former was to receive three eighths, in consideration of the risk of his capital and superintendence, while the sailors were to receive five eighths. Is there the faintest trace of a purpose to restore the salt duty in this regulation?

The act of May 2, 1792, raises the duty on salt by altering and reducing the standard of the bushel measure. This was done by substituting the weighed bushel of fifty-six pounds for the measured bushel of eighty-four pounds. The effect of this upon the fishing interests was counteracted by increasing the bounties twenty per cent. (See Stat. at Large, vol. 1, page 259.)

The act of July 8, 1797, raises the duty on salt from twelve to twenty cents per bushel of fifty-six pounds. The bounty on pickled fish is raised from eight to twelve cents per barrel; on salted provisions it is raised from five to ten cents on a barrel; and the bounties to fishing vessels are still further increased thirty-three and a third per cent. (See Stat. at Large, vol. 1, page 533.)

The principle upon which these acts is founded is identical with that of February 18, 1792, above recited. I notice them, in order to present a continuous though brief history of the legislation of the country upon this subject. The act of March 2, 1799, increases the allowance on pickled fish exported, to thirty cents per barrel, and on salted provisions exported, to twenty-five cents per barrel. The act of April 12, 1800, continues the preceding acts, laying duties on salt and giving bounties and allowances. (See Stat. at Large, vol. 2, page 36.)

The act of March 3, 1807, reverses the policy of the Government in relation to the fisheries, and repeals the bounties to fishermen, with the salt duties. (See Stat. at Large, vol. 2, page 436.)

This act was passed at the recommendation of Mr. Jefferson, in his annual message of December 2, 1806. It is well known that he discountenanced the idea of building up a navy, and with such views he very consistently and properly opposed the policy of fostering the fisheries as a school for seamen. Had he been persuaded, as the men of all parties are at the present day, of the utility and essential importance of that arm of the national defense, I cannot doubt that his recommendation would have been entirely different. Could he have foreseen the glory which the little nucleus of a navy won for the country during the Administration of his successor, he would never have done anything calculated to cripple that navy, or to weaken the sinews of its strength.

Sir, a navy cannot be spoken into existence at the fiat of the greatest conqueror, with unlimited resources of money and landmen at his command. Bonaparte had all these in abundance, but he was compelled to acknowledge his inferiority to England upon the sea. He had had sad evidence of this inferiority before the battle of Trafalgar swept his navy out of existence, and forever sealed its fate.

How marked the contrast, if we turn to the history of American engagements with England! France could command every element of naval greatness but one, namely, men trained to manage ships. We, in our struggles with the great naval Power of the world, lacked everything but men. Our exchequer was meager, our policy had been narrow, and, as experience has demonstrated, most unwise; but our little ships were manned by intelligent, disciplined, and brave American seamen, who, in a large degree, were graduates of these very fisheries. Sir, I need not stop to recount their achievements; I should not do them justice. It is the task of a poet. The reports and dispatches from our naval heroes read more like the creations of poetry and fiction than sober realities; and I am not surprised that our great master of romance, our American Scott, has been charmed away from his realms of fiction by the truths, "stranger than fiction," to be found in the archives of the Navy Department.

Mr. Jefferson lived to see his error. He admitted, in numerous letters from his philosophical retreat at Monticello, that his prejudices against the establishment of a navy had been ill-founded, and that his great rival, Mr. Adams, was chiefly entitled to the credit of building up the Navy. Those who cling to the secondary error of Mr. Jefferson regarding the fisheries, long after he has himself abandoned and refuted the primary error in regard to a navy, show themselves singularly superstitious in their reverence for the letter when the spirit has left it. He was opposed to the system of supporting a school for seamen, because he was opposed to the establishment of a navy. His modern professed disciples are continually augmenting the Navy, and are willing to expend millions in the construction of ships and the establishment of naval schools for the education of officers, while they will not allow a cent for the instruction and discipline of men as sailors.

Our fathers pursued a different policy; they first took care to have their naval vessels well manned, by training men to the service, and it somehow happened that the same training served the double purpose of fitting some to command, and others to obey. The Hulls, Perrys, and Decatur, were not educated in naval schools; but the men whom they commanded were, in a large degree, educated in the fisheries, whose prosperity, if not their very existence, is dependent upon the system of bounties.

In 1813, the country returned to the system of salt duties, and bounties to fishermen. In the meantime, during the six years which intervened between the repeal of the bounties and their revival, the fisheries had no other support than that derived from the tariff on the importation of foreign fish. That tariff was seventy-five cents per barrel on imported pickled fish, and fifty cents per quintal of dried fish.

The act of July 29, 1813, not only renewed the system of bounties, but increased their amount; and, like the acts repealed in 1807, it gave the bounty to the ship-owners and seamen, in consideration of their spending four months of the year in fishing. No condition was annexed, requiring the exportation, or even the catching of fish—a clear proof that the object of the act was the protection and encouragement of fishing as a school for seamen.

The first section imposes a duty of twenty cents per bushel upon the importation of salt. The second section provides for the payment of twenty cents per barrel upon the exportation of pickled fish of the fisheries of the United States, cured with foreign salt. The fifth section gives a bounty to vessels engaged in the cod fisheries, and is as follows:

"Sec. 5. That from and after the last day of December, 1814, there shall be paid on the last day of December, annually, to the owner of every vessel, or his agent, by the collector of the district where such vessel may belong, that shall be qualified agreeably to law, for carrying on the bank and cod fisheries, and that shall actually have been employed therein at sea for the term of four months, at least, of the fishing season next preceding, (which season is accounted to be from the last day of February to the last day of November in every year,) for each and every ton of such vessel's burden, according to her admeasurement, as licensed or enrolled: if of twenty tons, and not exceeding thirty tons, two dollars and forty cents; and if above thirty tons, four dollars; of which allowance, three eighths parts shall accrue and belong to the owner of such fishing vessel, and the other five eighths thereof shall be divided by him, his agent, or lawful representative, to and among the several fishermen who shall have been employed in such vessel during the season aforesaid, or a part thereof, as the case may be, in such proportion as the fish they shall respectively have taken may bear to the whole quantity of fish taken on board such vessel during such season: Provided, That the allowance aforesaid on one vessel, for one season, shall not exceed $272."

The sixth section gives $1 60 per ton to vessels or boats under twenty tons, and with the condition annexed that they land not less than twelve quintals of fish for every ton of their admeasurement. (See Stat. at Large, vol. 3, page 49.) It will be seen that the same discrimination is made in favor of large vessels, which I formerly pointed out. There can be no mistaking the object of this discrimination. It is clearly on the principle that the larger vessels are the better calculated to discipline seamen. The duration of this act was limited to one year after the termination of the war with Great Britain.

The act of February 9, 1816, continues in force the former act of July 29, 1813, indefinitely. It is as follows:

"That the act entitled 'An act laying a duty on imported salt, granting a bounty on pickled fish exported, and allowances to certain vessels employed in the fisheries,' passed on the 29th day of July, in the year 1813, shall be, and the same hereby is, continued in force, anything in the said act to the contrary notwithstanding."—Statutes at Large, vol. 3, page 254.

The act of March 1, 1817, goes still further to illustrate the object of the bounty system to fishermen. It requires the owners and three-fourths of the crews of fishing vessels claiming the bounty to be citizens of the United States. Section third is as follows:

"That after the 30th day of September next, the bounties and allowances, as now granted by law to the owners of boats and vessels engaged in the fisheries, shall be paid only on boats or vessels the officers, and at least three quarters of the crews, of which shall be proved, to the satisfaction of the collector of the district where said boat or vessel shall belong, to be citizens of the United States, or persons not the subjects of any foreign prince or State."—Statutes at Large, vol. 3, page 351.

This act removes all doubt as to the object of the bounty system.

The first act of 1789 may, with some plausibility, be said merely to refund the salt duty to the exporter. Subsequent acts, however, paid the quarter part of the bounty to the seamen directly, with the evident purpose of encouraging not only the business of fishing, but the profession of seamanship. But it was ascertained that foreigners availed themselves of the benefit of the bounty laws in proportions so large as in some degree to frustrate the purposes of Government. This act of March 1, 1817, is therefore intended to supply this defect, and to place the leading objects of the bounties beyond all question.

The act of March 3, 1819, increases the allowances to boats and vessels under thirty tons, placing those between five and twenty on the same footing as those between twenty and thirty. Those above thirty are allowed a reduced bounty, in case they shall be engaged three and a half months, but less than four, provided their crews consisted of ten persons. It is in the following terms:

"That from and after the passing of this act, there shall be paid on the last day of December, annually, to the owner of every fishing boat, or vessel, or his agent, by the collector of the district where such boat or vessel may belong, that shall be qualified agreeably to law for carrying on the bank and other cod fisheries, and that shall actually have been employed therein at sea for the term of four months at least of the fishing season next preceding, (which season is accounted to be from the last day of February to the last day of November every year,) for each and every ton of such boat or vessel's burden, according to her admeasurement as licensed or enrolled; if of more than five tons, and not exceeding thirty tons, three dollars and fifty cents; if above thirty tons, four dollars; and if above thirty tons, and if the crew consist of ten persons, and having been actually employed in the cod fishery at sea, for the term of three and one half months at least, but less than four months of the season aforesaid, three dollars and fifty cents: Provided, That the allowance aforesaid on any one vessel for one season shall not exceed three hundred and sixty dollars."—Statutes at Large, vol. 3, page 520.

This act has been said to repeal the act of 1817, requiring the owners and three-fourths of the crew to be citizens of the United States. But there is not the slightest warrant for such an assertion. The former act is not so much as referred to, and therefore all parts of it which are not specifically changed by the act of 1819, remained in full force. The rate of allowance is enhanced, and the term required for a certain class of vessels to be at sea is modified; but in every other respect the act of 1817 remained in full force. On the supposition that this act repeals the former, the salt duties would stand repealed, since they were not reenacted by the act of 1819; and in that case the bounty system would stand aloof from any pretense even of refunding the duty on salt. But this question is authoritatively settled by the regulations of the Treasury Department, which require, in conformity with the statute of 1817, that the master and three-fourths of the crew of any vessel claiming bounty must be proven to be citizens of the United States. (See Circular Instructions, dated February 20, 1852, issued by Secretary Corwin.) It is to be noted that the acts passed since the revival of the system of bounties are silent as to the bounty being in lieu of the salt duty, or being measured by the amount of the duty collected. These acts are still in force; while the bounty has continued at the highest point which it ever attained. The salt duty has been reduced from twenty cents the bushel of fifty-six pounds, to less than two and a half cents the bushel; in a word, the increase of the bounty went on pari passu with the diminution of the salt duty. The exact figures, which I find in the recent report of the Senate Committee on Commerce, are two cents and thirty-three hundredths per bushel. It is clear, therefore, that the system of bounties, though originating in the salt duty, has gradually been separated from it, and now stands upon its own merits as an independent policy. It has been in existence, with an interval of six years, from the organization of the Government to the present time; and I think that I have abundantly shown, from the very terms of the several acts on the subject of bounties, that a leading object in the inception, and the sole object for forty years past, of their continuance, has been the maintenance of a school for seamen.

Sir, these bounties to the hardy fishermen of

New England stand before the American people, for their vindication, upon the same footing with the Naval School at Annapolis, and the Military School at West Point. I admit that the system of bounties as a means of stimulating industrial enterprises is objectionable, and, indeed, indefensible. But, where the object is avowedly the training of American seamen, with a view to the national defense, there can be no more objection to this particular plan than to those adopted for the education of officers at the Military and Naval Academies. It is no objection to it that a branch of private industry is fostered by it; but, on the contrary, that circumstance is a strong recommendation to it; for, by the aid of the fisheries, the Government is enabled to accomplish, with three or four hundred thousand dollars, what millions would scarcely do without them.

The expenses of the Navy Department for the last fiscal year, according to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, were $12,726,000; and this sum exceeds, by more than half a million, the whole amount of bounties paid, according to the same authority, from the foundation of the Government to the present time. The average amount of bounties per annum has been about three hundred thousand dollars. In 1856, it was only $134,000; in 1857, the amount ran up to $601,000.

Sir, can that be regarded as an expensive system of training seamen, which, for the paltry sum of $300,000, gives the best kind of practical instruction to thirteen or fifteen thousand men yearly?

Your Naval Academy at Annapolis cost $39,000 during the last fiscal year, which is more than a tenth of the average yearly expense of the school for seamen. Your Military Academy at West Point cost $175,000, which is more than half the expense of training thirteen thousand seamen. Are you ready to abolish these institutions? Have they not vindicated their utility? But, sir, they stand on the same footing with the school for seamen, and must fall with it.

Mr. Chairman, while the duty on salt has been reduced to a very low figure, thereby furnishing the opponents of the bounty system with what they regard as an unanswerable argument in favor of repeal, it must not be forgotten, on the other hand, that protection against foreign competition has been withdrawn from our fishermen in a great measure. I have already drawn attention to the protection afforded by the act of 1789, when a duty of seventy-five cents per barrel was imposed on imported pickled fish, and fifty cents per quintal on dried fish. Under the tariff of 1846, the duty was twenty per cent. on all imported fish, but, by the reciprocity treaty with the British Provinces, we were deprived, in 1854, of the advantages this duty gave us in the domestic market, and our immediate neighbor and greatest competitor in the production of fish was placed on a footing of equality with us. They are given by that treaty the freedom of a market among thirty millions, and we have the benefit of their market of three millions. In other words, we are permitted to carry coal to Newcastle!

The tariff of 1857 still further reduces the duty on imported fish, so that now the whole benefit of that sort of protection amounts to fifteen per cent. ad valorem upon the products of countries of whose competition we have little to fear, even without protection. Here, then, is an additional reason for bounty, unless the policy of Government is to break down the fisheries.

I will proceed to show that the condition of the fisheries is by no means prosperous, and without some efficient protection from the Government, they must sink into insignificance. In order to place the matter beyond dispute, I will quote from an authority which cannot be gainsayed. The Committee on Commerce, in the other wing of the Capitol, have reported in favor of the repeal of the fishing bounties. They say nothing of the repeal of the salt duties, and we are therefore left to infer that they desire to burden the fisheries with that duty, at the same time that they deprive them of what was originally designed as an equivalent.

The report embraces a table marked B, which is too large for my purpose, else I should be glad to incorporate it into my speech. I must content

Sir, this table presents in a nut-shell the history of the cod fisheries. Compare their progress with that of almost any branch of industry in the country, North or South, and their barrenness and unprofitableness to those engaged in them will be made conspicuous. Compare them with the whale fishery statistics, which the Senate committee embody in the same table with those I have quoted. There were but four vessels, with 1,230 tons, and ninety-eight men, engaged in the whale fishery in 1815. In five years, the number of vessels had risen to 103, the tonnage to 32,367, and the crews to 2,590 men. The table exhibits a rapid and almost uninterrupted rate of increase down to 1857, when the number of vessels was 816, the tonnage 195,772, and the crews 19,584 men. Compare the progress of the cod fisheries with that of the production of pig-iron. According to the last annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury, the production of pig-iron in 1820 was 20,000 tons; in 1830, it was 165,000; in 1840, it was 375,000; in 1850, it was 564,755; in 1855, it was 1,000,000; and to-day it is doubtless a million and a quarter tons, or more than fifty-fold in thirty-eight years.

If we compare the cod-fisheries of New England with the coal productions of Pennsylvania, the contrast is still more striking. In 1820, according to the Secretary's report, the coal product of that State was only 365 tons—barely a load for a schooner; in 1830, it amounted to 174,734 tons; in 1840, to 865,414 tons; in 1850, to 3,254,321 tons; and in 1856, the coal product of Pennsylvania was 6,751,542 tons!

I find, in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, a statement of the export of cotton from 1821 to the present time. The total production of the country would present a still more striking contrast with the progress of the cod fishery. In 1821, the export of cotton was 124,893,000 pounds; in 1830, it amounted to 298,459,000; in 1840, to 743,941,000; in 1850, there was a temporary falling off, the amount being 635,381,000 pounds, while in the preceding year it exceeded 1,000,000,000 pounds; in 1856, the export amounted to 1,351,431,000 pounds. In marked contrast with these characteristic developments of American industry, how beggarly do the statistics of the cod fishery appear! Thirty years ago, the number of men employed was equal to what it is at present, and the tonnage nearly as great. It is true, that within a few years (seven or eight) an unusual rate of advancement is observable; but if the bounties be withdrawn, we shall quickly see the cod fishery abandoned for more lucrative pursuits. No one will question the assertion that the men engaged in it are among the most enterprising and intelligent of the American population. It is enough to say of them that they are New Englanders, to procure universal assent to the proposition; and it may be laid down as an axiom in political economy, that any branch of industry which flags in the hands of New England men must be essentially unprofitable.

Mr. Chairman, I now beg leave to present a few brief extracts from high authorities upon the importance, in a national point of view, of preserving the fisheries as a school for seamen. The French Government pays a bounty of fifty francs per man to sailors engaged in the cod fisheries. It is admitted that the bounties are essential to the existence of the fisheries. "The cod fishery," M. Senac says, "furnishes more than a fifth part of the number of our seamen, and by far the best portion of them. There is no cheaper, better, or more useful school for the formation of seamen for the Navy, and none is more capable of extension and development; the doubling of the consumption and exportation of the products of the fisheries would furnish our fleets with twelve thousand more seamen." In 1841, M. Rodet affirmed that "without the resources which were found in the sailors engaged in the fisheries, the expedition to Algiers could not have taken place."

The English have always fostered their fisheries by bounties. I might give some amusing illustrations of this fact, which have been collected by my intelligent and indefatigable friend, Mr. Sabine, in his report on the fisheries, published by the Secretary of the Treasury in 1852. He cites from a British statute passed in 1653, which provided:

"That as well for the maintenance of shipping, the increase of fishermen and mariners, and the repairing of port towns, as for the sparing of the fresh victual of the realm, it shall not be lawful for any one to eat flesh on Wednesdays and Saturdays, unless under the forfeiture of £3 for the offense, excepting in cases of sickness, and those of special licenses to be obtained. For these licenses, peers were required to pay about six dollars, knights and their wives about three dollars, and other persons one dollar and a half."

I might give from Mr. Sabine's report a curious specimen of these indulgences to eat on prohibited days, but the clock admonishes me that my hour is running out. I refer all who wish to be thoroughly informed on this subject of fishing, to the admirable report of Mr. Sabine, who seems to be inspired with a relish for wholesale fishing, as ardent as that of Isaak Walton for the more quiet and pleasant amusement of angling.

I will here notice some statements and arguments which were made some weeks ago in the other wing of the Capitol. The distinguished gentleman who introduced the proposition into that body for the repeal of the fishing bounties, and which has passed, attempts to ridicule and understate the present importance of the cod fisheries, compared with their condition when the Constitution was formed. He presents us with figures or statements to show that in 1790 the tonnage employed in the cod fisheries constituted an eighth of the total tonnage belonging to the country at that time; while at the present time the proportion is as one to forty-eight. The Senator has been led into this error by an error in the Treasury statement of the total amount of tonnage. This statement will be found at page 277 of the financial report for the last fiscal year. The registered sail tonnage for 1790 is put down at 346,254; the enrolled and licensed sail tonnage in another column at 132,123, and by a clerical error these two sums are added together in the column of totals as making only 274,377, as stated by the Senator. The actual amount is 478,377. This is blunder number one, and a very material one to his argument.

He states in round numbers that the present aggregate tonnage of the United States is 5,000,000, adding 60,000 to make the numbers round. The exact figures are 4,940,842, but this includes the steam tonnage, amounting to 705,784. The Senator from Alabama resides some hundreds of miles from the sea-shore, I believe, but he ought to be aware that sailors are not required to man steam-boats. The officers of steam vessels are engineers, and the duty of the "sailors" is not to climb ropes, but to heave coal or wood into the furnace. If this class of persons are to be put upon our marine list, we may multiply it almost indefinitely by going into our steam factories and workshops; and I see no reason why hod-carriers may not be added with equal propriety. Deducting the steam tonnage from the aggregate, therefore as having no more to do with the training of seamen than the railroad tonnage, and instead of 5,000,000, we have only 4,235,058. This is error No. 2, and a pretty considerable one.

The Senator from Alabama assumes, in his speech, that in 1790 the tonnage employed in the cod fisheries was 31,842. He has not given us his authority for this statement. I find in a public document already referred to, a document published by the Treasury Department, Mr. Sabine's report, that the tonnage employed in the cod fisheries was 28,348. This is error No. 3, and not unworthy of notice.

Now, sir, with this corrected data, I will submit the results of my skill in arithmetic. The total sail tonnage in 1790 was, as I have shown, 478,377; and, according to Mr. Sabine's report, the tonnage of the cod fisheries at that period was 28,348. Instead, therefore, of the cod fishery tonnage being one eighth of the total in 1790, it was only one sixteenth and six sevenths, or, in round numbers, one seventeenth. The sail tonnage of the present day, as I have shown, is 4,235,058; and the tonnage employed in the cod fisheries is, as he states, 104,573 tons. Dividing the greater number by the lesser, and we have a quotient of forty, or a proportion of one to forty, instead of one to forty-eight, as stated by the Senator.

The Senator rounds off with the assertion—
"Since 1790, the cod-fish tonnage has increased but three fold, while the other tonnage of the United States has been increased about twentyfold."

Let us see. The cod-fish tonnage of 1790 was 28,348; that of 1857, 104,573, and the proportion is as one to three and two thirds. The total sail tonnage in 1790 was 478,377; the total sail tonnage in 1857 was 4,235,058. The proportion is as one to eight and five sixths. These are material abatements from the sweeping assertion of the Senator. The cod-fish tonnage has increased nearly fourfold instead of three, as he states it; while the total sail tonnage has increased less than ninefold, instead of "about twenty."

Says the Senator:

"In 1804 the total domestic exports of the United States were $11,467,477, of which exported cod made $2,400,000; at this time, the proportion is as one to seventeen and two tenths. In 1857, however, the total domestic exports of the United States were $338,985,065, of which the value of the exported cod was but $570,348; the proportion being about as one to six hundred."

This is true; but it is also true that the increase of population has, in the mean time, been fourfold, and the facilities of internal transportation have increased tenfold; and from these two causes we may assume that the home market for fish has increased fortyfold. The Senator underestimates the importance of the cod fisheries as a school for seamen, by saying that the number of seamen employed in them is insignificant, compared with the whole number of the seamen of the United States. He says:

"In 1792, the cod fishermen comprised nearly half of the whole number of American seamen; now, they comprise not more than a thirteenth part; for we have over one hundred and sixty thousand seamen engaged in the mackerel fishery, in the whale fishery, in the merchant service, and the military marine of the United States."

This is true; but the Senator from Alabama omits to state, what is the well-known fact, and what a Senator from my State brought to the attention of the Senate, namely:

"That something like three fourths of this formidable number of seamen are foreigners, aliens, without any fixed abode; while the cod fishermen are almost exclusively native-born citizens."

The law requires that at least three fourths of them shall be American citizens. The whole fishermen, on the other hand, are said to be almost exclusively foreigners. The Senator from my State, alluded to, has discussed this branch of the subject so fully, and presented it so ably, that I deem it unnecessary to do more than allude to his facts and arguments. He has produced the testimony of high officers of the Navy, and that of other official persons, to sustain his statements; and I think that no candid man will deny that he has more than answered the Senator from Alabama as to this point. He also produces the same high authority to show the eminent services which the cod fishermen have rendered the country in times of war. Commodores Stewart and Shubrick agree entirely on this point with Messrs. Benton, Everett, Webster, and others, whom I shall presently quote; and their high authority will generally be considered a fair offset to that of the miserable stipendiaries of the Administration, quoted by the Senator from Alabama, who, to gratify their masters, have traduced their neighbors and countrymen.

The Senator from Alabama raises the sectional hue-and-cry against Maine and Massachusetts, because their citizens are the chief participants in this fishing bounty. He denounces the bounty system as unjust and unequal, although its design is to train sailors to defend the whole country.

Now, sir, I will call attention to another little sectional bounty, in which the people of Alabama are rather more interested than the people of Maine or Massachusetts. I allude to the Post Office bounty. According to the last annual report of the Postmaster General, the total expenses of the Department in Maine and Massachusetts, for the last fiscal year, were $537,456; the receipts were $734,512; leaving an excess of $147,056, which is taken from the people of those States to carry the mail in States whose expenses to the Department far exceed the receipts. I will point out the shortcomings of one such State, for the edification of those who heard or have read the speech of the Alabama Senator. According to the same report of the Postmaster General, the expenses of the mail service in Alabama were $304,610, and the total receipts $115,397; leaving a deficit of $189,213.

The excess in Maine and Massachusetts falls a little short of this deficit; but if we take in the whole New England States, which are interested more or less in the fisheries, the Alabama burden upon the Treasury will be made good. This total bounty to Alabama is something more than half the amount of the fishing bounty; and if we add the like bounty paid to any one of a half dozen States whose Representatives will vote for the repeal of the fishing bounty, the aggregate will exceed the latter. Take Georgia, for instance, whose bounty is $184,000; or South Carolina, whose bounty is $173,000; or North Carolina, whose bounty is $161,000. Add any one of these to the Alabama bounty, and the sum total will exceed the average fishing bounty. The total postal bounty paid to the South, out of the United States Treasury, is $2,500,000! Is it not injudicious for southern men, under such circumstances, to quarrel with the little insignificant fishing bounty?

The same remarks will apply to several of the western States, which are in the receipt of this postal bounty. New England, New York, and Pennsylvania, pay their postalexpenditures, and leave a large surplus. The States south and west of them (excepting little Delaware) do not pay, but fall far in arrears every year. These facts should teach their Representatives to be a little chary in their assaults upon the New England cod-fish bounty.

I now quote a few American authorities, and I begin with the late Colonel Benton, who signalized his opposition to the fishing bounties in a vigorous report, as chairman of a select committee, in 1840. Near the close of that document I find the following passage:

"Far be it from this committee to depreciate the value or underrate the importance of the northeastern fisheries. It would argue but little knowledge of their own country, in relation to this source of wealth and power, or the contests of other nations in relation to it, so to depreciate or underrate them. They know them to be valuable—of inestimable value—as well for the subsistence they furnish to man, as for the mariners which they create, and the hardy and manly qualities which they cherish in those who pursue them. As a nursery for seamen, they possess a great and lasting, but no longer an exclusive, importance. Things have changed since 1789."

Mr. Cooper, in his naval history, says that "the fisheries may be considered as the elementary school of American nautical enterprise."

Mr. Everett, while Minister to England, in a letter to Lord Aberdeen, dated March 25, 1845, says:

"It is no doubt true that the British colonial fish, as far as duties are concerned, enters the United States market, if at all, to some disadvantage. The Government of the United States, he is persuaded, would gladly make any reduction in these duties which would not seriously injure the native fishermen; but Lord Aberdeen is aware that the encouragement of this class of the seafaring community has ever been considered, as well by the United States as by Great Britain, as resting on peculiar grounds of expediency. It is the great school, not only of the commercial but of the public marine, and the highest considerations of national policy require it to be fostered."

These, Mr. Chairman, are high tributes from high sources, to the fishermen of New England. I will add one other from New England's great orator and statesman, Webster, among the last words, perhaps the last public speech he ever uttered. It will be remembered by many that, in July, 1852, being then Secretary of State, he visited his home, and was publicly greeted by his neighbors at Marshfield. There was much excitement at the time in the fishing world, in consequence of the enforcement of some severe regulations of the British and Nova Scotia Governments in regard to the fishing grounds. Mr. Webster made this subject the theme of his address. I will quote his eloquent and emphatic testimony:

"The most important consequences are involved in this matter. Our fisheries have been the very nurseries of our Navy. Our flag-ships have met and conquered the enemy on the sea, the fisheries are at the bottom of it. The fisheries were the seeds from which these glorious triumphs were born and sprung."

Mr. Chairman, this is or should be a Government of the people. We need no standing army to keep the people in awe. We are separated by the wide ocean from the great Powers of the world, and we have no necessity for large armies to defend us against their sudden irruptions, or their more premeditated attacks. The citizen soldiery of America are amply able to defend their firesides. But, sir, we do need a navy to defend our commerce. We are rapidly becoming the greatest commercial State in the world. Our tonnage and our trade, if not now equal to that of Great Britain and her dependencies, is only second to hers. No other nation of the earth approaches within a bow-shot of us in commercial importance, and, indeed, I believe I may safely say, that the foreign commerce of all other nations, combined, would be inferior to our own. Our sails whiten every sea; and I know not how many countless millions of American property are every hour and moment afloat on the wide ocean, exposed to the depredations of pirates, or of peoples unfriendly or uncivilized.

Sir, this immense property, this vast public interest, demands protection at our hands. Armies can afford it no assistance. A navy is what we need, and a navy cannot be constituted without disciplined seamen. American commerce is every day growing and widening its sphere of operations. We have sent expeditions to China and Japan, at great expense, to back up our commercial negotiations. We have partially succeeded; and there is a prospect of still greater success. We have States growing up on the opposite shores of the Pacific, and a trade and intercourse of vast and indefinite extent is destined to spring up between them and the hitherto exclusive and unsocial, but industrious and wealthy Chinese and Japanese. Here is a boundless field for American commercial enterprise, but one which peculiarly demands the protection of a navy. The civilization of China and Japan is very peculiar; they understand the arts of life well; they have the elements of an immensely valuable trade in the products of their agriculture and mechanical industry; but they are wholly ignorant of the European and American system of international law, and they are prone to treat all foreigners, or "outside barbarians," as enemies, when they happen to fall into their hands.

These people must be schooled in the laws of nations. They must be made to respect the rights of foreigners, individual and national. The only way to compel attention to these lessons is to send an efficient naval force into their waters. The Asiatic character is peculiar in this respect; you must first present the argument of force, or you will not be listened to.

Mr. Chairman, this is not the time to relax our efforts for the maintenance of a home-bred race of seamen, whose patriotism may be relied upon in the event of a war. Are we not at this moment threatened with a war? Has not our flag been insulted repeatedly within the last month?

Sir, when our intercourse is rapidly increasing with all nations, and especially with this new commerce of the Pacific dawning upon us, would it not be most unwise for the Government to fall into the new policy which has been proposed, of crippling our naval forces? Is this a time to abandon a system which has been deemed essential to the existence of a navy by every Administration, from Washington to the present? For Mr. Jefferson is no exception to the remark, since he was opposed to the establishment of a navy while President, but became convinced of his error when he saw what a navy could achieve under the administration of his successor. He saw defeat succeed defeat, and disaster follow disaster, on the land. He saw the spirits of his countrymen droop, and their hearts almost die within them, in view of these saddening events. But he saw that hour of national sorrow, shame, and despondency, relieved as often as tidings came up from the sea. Our Navy consisted of a few small vessels. A mistaken policy had regarded it as of secondary consequence, and treated it accordingly. That policy had provided only a small handful of vessels for this great emergency; and doubtless the general expectation was, that our little fleet would be swept from the ocean by the invincible power and prowess of England. But its achievements have added permanent glory and honor to the nation, and in the hour of greatest need rendered it essential service.

But, sir, I will trespass no longer on the patience of the committee. I will conclude by repeating, in the language of Mr. Webster, that "the fisheries were the seeds from which these glorious triumphs were born and sprung."

FIFTEEN MILLION LOAN—HOME VALUATION.

DEBATE IN THE SENATE.

TUESDAY, May 25, 1858.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 396) to authorize a loan not exceeding the sum of $15,000,000, the question being on the following amendment of Mr. SIMMONS:

SEC. 1.—And be it further enacted, That the provisions of the sixteenth and seventeenth sections of the act of 30th August, 1842, the eighth section of the act of 30th July, 1846, and the first section of the act of 3d of March, 1851, so far as the same relate to and direct the manner of ascertaining and determining the value of merchandise imported into the United States, at the principal markets of the countries from which the same are imported, shall remain and continue in force; and in all cases, when the same is practicable, the invoices of all goods, wares, and merchandise at the place or port of exportation shall be verified by the certificate of the consul of the United States at such port; and in no case shall the duties upon goods be levied in any port of the United States upon an amount less than the value stated in such invoices, as required in the proviso to the eighth section of said act of 30th July, 1846, unless the quantity of the articles imported shall be lessened, or the quality injured upon the voyage of importation.

SEC. 2.—And be it further enacted, That, in order to prevent the continuance of fraud upon the revenue by the under-valuation of foreign imports, and to provide for the valuation of imports in the same currency in which duties are paid, to wit: the legal currency of the United States, it is hereby provided that, in addition to the existing provisions of law for the entry and appraisement, or valuation of any goods, wares, or merchandise imported into the United States, it shall be the duty of the owner, importer, consignee, or agent of any goods, wares, or merchandise imported into any port of the United States, to exhibit to the collector or other proper officer of the customs of such port, a true invoice of the goods, wares, and merchandise entered by such person or persons at such port, embracing a statement of the quantity, description, nature, quality, and the true wholesale market price or value of the same or similar articles in the principal market of the United States, to wit: the city of New York, at the time of such entry of importation, or at the time nearest thereto which is practicable; and such invoice shall be verified and proved by the oath of the said owner, importer, consignee, or agent, who, on conviction of false swearing thereon, shall be subject to the forfeiture and penalties as provided by the laws of the United States in like cases, and prosecuted as for willful and corrupt perjury; and, upon such wholesale market price or value, to include the foreign cost, all charges, duties, and profits, or so much thereof as may enter into and become a part of such wholesale market price or value, the rates of duty imposed by the existing laws of the United States, at the time of entry of such importation, upon each article enumerated in such invoice, shall be assessed and paid: Provided, That if any collector or other proper officer of the customs shall have doubts as to the correctness of the valuation as above described, or should complaint or information be made or given by any person or persons of the incorrectness of any such valuation, it shall be the duty of the collector or other proper officer of the customs to cause the true and actual wholesale market price or value of the same or similar articles in the city of New York, at the time of entry at the port of entry, to be ascertained and appraised in the same mode and manner as the wholesale market price or value is now ascertained and appraised in the principal markets of the countries from which the same is imported; and it shall in every case be the duty of the appraisers of the United States, and every of them, and every person who shall act as such appraiser, or of the collector and naval officer, as the case may be, by all reasonable ways and means in his or their power, to ascertain, estimate, and appraise the true actual market value or wholesale price of such goods, wares, and merchandise, in the city of New York, at the time of entry of such goods, wares, and merchandise, at the port of importation, without regard to any other invoice, valuation, or appraisement, or verification of the same by oath or otherwise, or the difference of any such invoice or valuation to the contrary notwithstanding. And if such last mentioned appraisal or valuation shall exceed by ten per centum or more the value so declared on the entry, then, in addition to the duties imposed by law on the same, there shall be levied, collected, and paid, a duty of twenty per centum ad valorem on such appraised value, as provided in the eighth section of the act of the 30th July, 1846, entitled "An act reducing the duties on imports, and for other purposes." And the several collectors or other proper officers, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, whenever they shall deem it necessary to secure the proper payment of the revenue due to the United States upon the importation of any goods, wares, or merchandise, may, and they hereby are required, whenever the same is practicable, to take the amount of duties chargeable on any article bearing an ad valorem rate of duty on the article itself, according to the proportion or rate per centum of the duty on said articles; and such goods so taken the collector or other proper officer shall cause to be sold, at public auction, within twenty days from the time of taking the same, in the manner prescribed by law, and place the proceeds arising from such sale in the Treasury of the United States. And the said collector or other proper officer of the customs is further authorized and required, when he shall deem it necessary to secure the proper payment of the duties accruing to the Government of the United States, to proceed in the manner prescribed in the eighteenth section of the said act, approved the 30th day of August, 1842, even though no fraud or intentional undervaluation shall be imputed; and, as compensation to the collector and appraisers for their services in such proceeding, they shall be entitled to a commission of one per centum, to be shared by them, upon the amount of duties thus secured and paid, in addition to such other compensation as they are, by law, entitled to.

SEC. —. And be it further enacted, That should any person or persons complain or give information to the collector or other proper officer of the customs that any false or undervaluation of any goods, wares, or merchandise, has been made by any owner, importer, consignee, or agent, as aforesaid, under the preceding section of this act, or of any existing law of the United States, with a view to defraud the Government of the duty legally due upon the same, the proper officer shall proceed to ascertain and appraise the true market value, as provided for in the preceding section and according to law; and if any forfeiture or penalty shall be incurred by any such owner, importer, consignee, or agent, one half the amount or value of such forfeiture shall accrue to the benefit of the person or persons complaining, or giving information which may have led to the detection, of such fraud or undervaluation.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act, be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Mr. HUNTER. I raise a point of order that this amendment is in the nature of the origination of a bill to raise revenue. It is undoubtedly designed to increase the revenues from customs. It is a proposition to assess the duty, not on the foreign value as the present laws provide, but on the home value, and a value which is to be increased by all the costs and charges of bringing the goods here, and by the duty, too, as I understand, for it is the market value in New York. I maintain, that by the Constitution, we have no authority to originate any such measure; and to show what has been the sense of the Senate, I beg leave to refer to the action taken in 1844, upon the bill which Mr. McDuffie introduced, "to revive the act of the 2d of March, 1833, usually called the compromise act, and to modify the existing duties upon foreign imports in conformity to its provisions." Mr. Evans, from the Committee on Finance, reported back that bill without amendment, together with the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the bill, entitled 'A bill to revive the act of the 2d of March, 1833, usually called the compromise act, and to modify the existing duties upon foreign imports in conformity to its provisions,' is a bill for raising revenue within the meaning of the seventh section of the first article of the Constitution, and cannot therefore originate in the Senate; therefore,

"Resolved, That it be indefinitely postponed."

The vote on the first resolution was 33 yeas to 4 nays. The yeas were—Messrs. Allen, Archer, Atchison, Bagby, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Benton, Breese, Buchanan, Choate, Clayton, Dayton, Evans, Fairfield, Francis, Hannegan, Henderson, Huntington, Jamnigan, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Niles, Porter, Rives, Semple, Simmons, Sturgeon, Tallmadge, White, Woodbridge, and Wright. The nays were—Messrs. Haywood, Huger, McDuffie, and Woodbury. That was the action of the Senate in regard to a proposition similar in nature to the one now offered by the Senator from Rhode Island; and I submit that it is against a constitutional rule of order for us to attempt to originate this revenue measure.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. Foor in the chair.) The Chair will suggest that this presents a constitutional question as to the power and privileges of the Senate, and not a question for the Chair to decide as a mere question of order; but it is a question to be submitted to the consideration of the Senate, whether the amendment shall be received as in order.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have heard a great many questions of order and questions of constitutional power raised, which seemed to me to be very strange. I endeavored to get some amendment to the Treasury-note bill, but then there was a question of order, a constitutional question raised. I asked the Senator from Virginia at that time if it would be in order and constitutional to introduce in the Senate such a proposition as I then indicated, and he said it would if it did not raise the rates of duty. I continued to press the matter until I had the assurance of the Senator that he would go as far as he who went furthest to try to prevent frauds on the revenue.

Mr. HUNTER. In regard to that, I will say that I will go for any measure that I think is designed to prevent frauds on the revenue; but I certainly never meant to indicate to the Senator from Rhode Island, (and if he so understood me he is mistaken,) that it was my opinion we could originate in the Senate bills designed to raise revenue. I never entertained that opinion; on the contrary, I have stated, during the whole time the practice of the Senate has been otherwise, and I thought justly so.

Mr. SIMMONS. I would put this question to the Senator from Virginia, and to the Senate: can you introduce a bill to prevent fraud on the revenue in any form, which will not increase the amount of revenue collected? Most assuredly, if you succeed in accomplishing the prevention of fraud, you increase your revenue.

Mr. HUNTER. That may be. You may introduce a bill which is merely designed to prevent fraud; but here is a proposition which is designed to increase the revenue. That is the object, and the Senator cannot deny it.

Mr. SIMMONS. If it increases the revenue, it does so only by preventing frauds.

Mr. HUNTER. And by raising the duty.

Mr. SIMMONS. No, sir, I do not propose to raise a single rate of duty in the whole tariff. Not only do I not, by this proposition, undertake to increase the rates of duty, but I do not propose to change the principles of the existing laws on the subject of the collection of the duties. The whole theory of our present laws is based upon the system of home valuation; and it is only by the most mysterious and unaccountable conduct of the officers of the Treasury, that the provisions made on this subject, from time to time, by the Congress of the United States, have invariably been evaded from the year 1799 to this time. No matter what has been the form of the law, the construction given by the Treasury Department has always been in favor of the importers.

Mr. HUNTER. I hope we shall have a decision of the question of order. Let that be submitted to the Senate.

Mr. SIMMONS. I understood it to be decided that it was not a question for the decision of the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is a question for the Senate to decide.

Mr. HUNTER. I understood the Chair to say that he would submit the question to the Senate whether they would receive the amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not know that we are to take the dictum of the Senator from Virginia as to the objects and purposes of my amendment; but I think I may be permitted to explain its objects, so that the Senate may understand whether or not it is a proposition to increase the rates of duty.

Mr. COLLAMER. I would suggest that, if the constitutionality of a bill or an amendment is not a question of order for the Chair to decide, it is not a question of order which the Chair can submit to the Senate. In the very case cited by the honorable Senator from Virginia, a resolution was introduced calling upon the Senate to pass on the question; but it was not passed upon as a question of order at all, either by the Chair, or put by the Chair as such to the Senate. If this course were allowable, it would put an end to the discussion of almost any question; for a gentleman might rise and say that he viewed it to be unconstitutional, and insisted on having that point decided before receiving the proposition. For example: a gentleman might say that he viewed it to be unconstitutional to pass any law making any discrimination for the purpose of benefiting American industry, and insist that that should be put to the Senate as a question of order. I think whether a proposition is constitutional or not is a matter to be considered by the Senate, and by each Senator in voting upon it after a full hearing.

Mr. SIMMONS. The instance cited by the Senator from Virginia, to show that we cannot entertain the proposition which I have offered, is a most singular one, and it seems to me to have no connection with my proposition. That was a measure to reduce the duties on imports more than one half. It was introduced in the early part of the session of 1844, and was debated here for three months—introduced purposely for debate, and not with any view on the part of anybody here to change the tariff. It was introduced to enable gentlemen to make speeches which should control the next presidential election. Then, for the first time, the doctrine was inaugurated, or, at least, fully elaborated, that there was a certain revenue standard which should pervade all tariff measures in this country, in order to make them constitutional. Without any two members of the Senate who believed in this doctrine exactly agreeing, they all seemed to consider that the revenue standard necessarily ranged from twenty to twenty-five per cent.; and any departure from that range was considered unconstitutional by those who advocated that measure. The party who took that ground at that time, and who debated it during the succeeding presidential canvass, succeeded. When they came into power, they carried their doctrine into practical effect by the tariff of 1846, in which you will find this revenue standard varying from five to one hundred per cent. That was the practical carrying out of this great doctrine of a constitutional revenue standard! I recollect that debate very well; and I cannot imagine how it can be tortured into sustaining the present position of the Senator from Virginia. Upon his rule of construction as to the constitutional power of the Senate, he would deprive us of the power to originate any measure to prevent frauds on the revenue—to prevent smuggling even.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Allow me to suggest to the Senator from Rhode Island that perhaps it would relieve the Chair from embarrassment in the matter, if the question on the constitutional power were submitted to the Senate at once.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair submits the question to the Senate, as he is authorized to do under an express rule of the Senate.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will argue that question to the Senate, and undertake to show that the amendment I propose to this bill is perfectly within our power. I had hoped that I should have the assent of the Senator from Virginia, in an endeavor to relieve the present embarrassments of the country, by preventing what is known to be an extensive system of fraud upon the revenue by the undervaluation of foreign imports. Everybody knows it. I have not departed, in this amendment, from the theory of our present laws for the collection of the revenue and the enforcement of the revenue laws. There is, in the present laws, a provision which authorizes the collector, if he has any suspicion of fraud, to take the duties on the article itself, according to the rate imposed upon that article, and sell it within twenty days, in the market, and put the money into the Treasury, as an equivalent for the duties. I so far vary that provision, and so far only, as to authorize the collector, or other proper officer, to do it, (for, I believe, we have a great many surveyors in small ports where there is not a full board of collection officers.) I provide that the collector, or other proper officer, if he deems it necessary to secure the just payment of the duties required by law to be paid into the Treasury of the United States, may take the duties on the article itself, following the precise language of the law now in existence. I hold that when a collector believes that a man is fraudulently undertaking to enter goods, the proper remedy is to confiscate the goods themselves, and condemn them. I understand that that practice is now prevailing to some extent. I called the attention of the Senator from Virginia to that provision for taking the duties in kind, and he thought it was a penalty. In that, I think, he is mistaken. The penalties for undervaluation are in the two preceding sections of the law.

According to the eighth section of the act of 1846, whenever the undervaluation amounts to ten per cent. or upwards, the penalty provided is a forfeiture of twenty per cent. of the amount of the goods. Under the provision I propose, if a man undervalues his goods nine per cent., though he would not be subjected to a penalty, the collector would have power to take the duties in kind. The present laws provide that the officers shall receive no compensation for this service, and for that reason they do not do it. I propose to give the collector and appraisers one per cent. of the proceeds of those sales as a compensation for doing this service, with a view that they may have some interest in guarding the revenue. Is that unconstitutional? Can we not give the collectors and appraisers one per cent. whenever they resort to a more certain mode of collecting the revenue, though a more difficult and laborious one? I think we can. Under the existing law, we can take the duties in kind according to the rates imposed, and put the proceeds into the Treasury. Take the case of one hundred tons of pig iron imported into New York. If the collector thinks there has been an evasion, and it is necessary for him to take the duties on the article itself, he takes twenty-four tons of that iron, and sells it in the market, under the present law; and he gets the wholesale market price in the city of New York for those twenty-four tons of iron, which is the legal duty payable on the importation under the present law. I only carry out the same principle.

There is another provision in my amendment which I do not think disturbs the principle of the tariff bill at all, by which importers may value their entire invoices, and retain that portion that we have a right to take for duties, provided they satisfy the officers of the customs that the United States will not be injured thereby. If they make out a sworn invoice, stating the value of the merchandise they import, and the collector is satisfied that it is a fair one, I propose that the collector may abstain from resorting to what he is now authorized to resort to—the taking of the duties in the article itself, and, instead of that, let the importer retain the whole of them, and pay to the collector the value of that portion which he is now allowed to take. That is the whole change proposed to be made in the existing law; and I should like to know if there is any constitutional objection to our permitting an importer to retain the whole of his invoice, rather than for us to take twenty-four per cent. of it, if he satisfies the collector that he pays him as much money as twenty-four per cent. of the article would bring in the market? If it is constitutional to take twenty-four tons of iron out of a hundred for the duty, it is constitutional for us to provide a mode by which the importer can retain the twenty-four tons of iron, and pay us their equivalent in money—one is just as constitutional as the other. That law has been in existence the last sixteen years, and I have yet to hear the first strict constructionist or abstractionist dispute its constitutionality. No man ever thought of disputing it. I dare say the Senator from Virginia, if he was in Congress at that time, voted for it. He certainly voted for the tariff of 1846, which included it. Here is the penalty in the tariff of 1846, that I have provided, in the same language, for an undervaluation exceeding ten per cent. Pretty nearly all these provisions are in the existing laws, with the single exception that instead of taking the duties in kind, I provide a mode by which the importer may retain the whole invoice, satisfying the collector that he pays the fair market value for that portion which, by existing laws, we have a right to take as duties.

I acknowledge that I have not a very nice mind to discriminate about constitutional scruples. I generally try to keep about right and honest, and I think that is constitutional; but it may not answer in these days. I have heard a great many speeches here about the unconstitutionality of improving a river or a harbor in our own country; and yet, at this very session, a law has passed through Congress for paying light-house dues in Denmark. It passed through this body so quickly that I could not get a chance to say a word. We can pay light-house dues in Denmark, but we cannot light our own coast because of constitutional scruples! I prefer to take care of our own country, rather than support the light-houses of any other, and I believe it is more constitutional to do it. When a man does not want anything to pass, it is a very easy matter to raise a constitutional question. All I have to say is, that if it be unconstitutional to prevent fraud for the reason that if you succeed in preventing it you increase the money in your Treasury, then you might as well give up that frauds are not to be prevented by any action of this body. It is the first time I ever heard that there was any constitutional barrier to preventing frauds.

The Senator from Virginia yesterday went into an exposition of the revenue system of the country. I think he can have no doubt, that with our present rates of duty, we shall need all the revenue we can collect by a home valuation or foreign valuation. He can have no doubt that all the revenue we can get is wanted for the actual expenses of the Government, without any danger of piling up a surplus. I had hoped that if a measure could be framed to secure to honest importers the trade of this country by preventing frauds on the revenue, at the same time increasing the means in the Treasury, I might obtain the aid and support of the friends of the Administration in accomplishing these desirable objects.

I have said all that I propose to say on the constitutional question; and it is suggested to me that perhaps it would be proper to take the sense of the Senate on that point before I proceed to elaborate and explain what will be the operation of my proposition if adopted. Some gentlemen around me think I had better go on and explain its operation at once; but my health is not very good, and I should not object to being spared unnecessary labor.

Mr. HUNTER. It was not my purpose to prevent the Senator from speaking. I shall listen to him with great pleasure now; and when he concludes, I shall raise the question of order. I shall waive it for the present, if he prefers going on now.

Mr. SIMMONS. It was with a view of preventing waste of breath that it was suggested to me we had better take the question first. I should hope that, if there were no constitutional obstacle, I could induce every man who has examined the subject to support this proposition. I did not exactly understand the Senator from Virginia this morning, when he interposed with a view of explaining some mistakes he had made yesterday. I understood him to say yesterday that he contemplated for next year's revenue $20,000,000 for the first six months, and $32,000,000 for the last six months; making $52,000,000 for the entire year.

Mr. HUNTER. I estimated yesterday that, for the next fiscal year, if there should be a revival of trade, we had a right to expect $52,000,000 from customs.

Mr. SIMMONS. That was the Senator's anticipation under all the circumstances, and that we should get ten or twelve millions from public lands. He said this morning that he was mistaken as to the amount from lands.

Mr. HUNTER. I estimated $7,000,000 for lands for the present fiscal year, and in that I was mistaken. They do not estimate so much at the Department for this year; but they do estimate $10,000,000 for the next fiscal year.

Mr. SIMMONS. I understood the Senator to say that, although he made a mistake of some two millions in the lands, he underestimated the receipts from customs.

Mr. HUNTER. For the present year.

Mr. SIMMONS. Well, the bill is not for the purpose of providing for the present year. I listened to the Senator's estimate, and to his general views as to the increase of the trade of the country. He thinks that within eight months from this time the revenues from customs will be at the rate of $64,000,000 per annum.

Mr. HUNTER. No, sir.

Mr. SIMMONS. If I can reckon the months, we shall commence the last two quarters of the next fiscal year in eight months from this time; and the Senator said that in the first two quarters of the next fiscal year he estimated $20,000,000 from customs.

Mr. HUNTER. I made no estimate for the first two quarters. I said the Secretary of the Treasury estimated the first two quarters at that; but I made the estimate for the year, not dividing it into quarters.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator said he set down the receipts for the last two quarters of the year at $32,000,000.

Mr. HUNTER. I set down the whole year at $52,000,000; but I did not divide it into quarters.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator adopted the estimates made by the Secretary of the Treasury, $20,000,000 from customs, $5,000,000 from lands, and $15,000,000 of a loan by this bill; making $40,000,000 of receipts for the first two quarters of the next year; and he estimated an expenditure of $37,000,000 for the same time.

Mr. HUNTER. I gave that as the estimate of the Secretary—not my own.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator gave $52,000,000 for the whole year; and if I can put the figures together, it amounts to $20,000,000 for the first two quarters, and $32,000,000 for the last two.

Mr. HUNTER. If the Senator will look into my remarks as reported, he will find that I said nothing about the last two quarters. I made the estimate for the whole year.

Mr. SIMMONS. Well, adopting the Secretary's estimate for the first half, it must be that the calculation is that we are to have $32,000,000 from customs for the last two quarters of next year.

Mr. HUNTER. I did not say I adopted it. I gave my estimate for the whole year, and his estimate for six months. It might be that I expected more than $20,000,000 in the first six months.

Mr. SIMMONS. Putting the two statements together, they make out one year; and the Senator may divide it as he pleases. I divide it as the Senator did himself, and I was surprised to hear it said that the last two quarters of the next fiscal year might be expected to yield $32,000,000 from customs, so that if there should be a gradual improvement in the condition of our country, it would be reasonable for us to expect more than $64,000,000 for the four quarters commencing in January next. Putting these facts together, I was astonished at the Senator's proposition to make this loan for fifteen years; and therefore I asked him yesterday if, with his notions about the income of the Government, he would think it judicious to make a loan for fifteen years, pledging the country for an amount of interest nearly equivalent to the principal. I do not want to elaborate the point, but that was the reason I asked the question.

I know that when the Treasury-note bill was passed, it was urged upon the ground that it was a temporary matter, for the use of a year or two years, to authorize the issue of those notes for a year from next January; and I thought that if there was any soundness in such a calculation, it was the worst argument in the world in favor of a fifteen years' loan. That is the way I reasoned. When I heard the Senator from South Carolina say that he knew of a friend who had been cut off in his income the present six months, and would realize his full income after the 1st of July—and he put it to the Senator from Vermont if he would not hire money to maintain his family in the interim—I wanted merely to suggest to the Senator if he would think such a man, if he was prudent, would give his note for fifteen years if he expected a full income in the next six months? No, sir; he would give a short note, and pay it at the end of the time; and that was my view about the length of this loan.

Now, Mr. President, I think the Senator from Virginia, and the Secretary of the Treasury, and, to some extent, I believe the whole country, labor under an error as to the extent of the changes made last year in the rates of duty by the tariff of 1857. I am perfectly clear that it could not be possible, in the Senate, for anybody, at that time, to make any correct estimate in regard to its effect. It was brought in, and hurried through, as I understood, in one night. Here I will call the attention of the Senator from Virginia to the fact of what were the rates of duty under the tariff of 1846. The rates of duty are fixed in the law, and do not alter, although the amount of revenue derived from imports may vary, on account of diversity in the character of the imports. In one year there may be more free goods than another, a great many more goods coming under the schedules that bear a less rate of duty than the average; and, from a variety of such causes, the average rates of duty actually collected upon the goods imported will vary; but the rates of duty do not vary. If the Senator from Virginia will take his pencil, and put down and add up the rates of duty upon each of the schedules, by the act of 1846, in the old-fashioned way we used to do such sums when we were boys, he will find what were the average rates under that tariff; and I will tell him what the rates were. Schedule A was one hundred per cent.; the next was forty; the next thirty; the next twenty-five; the next twenty; the next fifteen; the next ten; and the lowest five. There are eight different rates of duty, and their aggregate amount is two hundred and forty-five. If we divide the aggregate by the number of rates, according to the old-fashioned way, we shall get the average. When you divide two hundred and forty-five by eight, you will get thirty and five eighths per cent. as the average rate of duty imposed by the tariff of 1846 on the dutiable goods; and, if there was an equal amount imported under each schedule, there would be thirty and five eighths per cent. collected on the entire importation on dutiable goods.

There is another schedule that is free, and if you want to have the average on the dutiable and free goods, you must divide two hundred and forty-five by nine, and that will give you twenty-seven and two ninths per cent. as the average rate of duty on all imports, dutiable and free. I heard the Senator from Virginia say yesterday that it was twenty-five per cent., and so said the Secretary of the Treasury, and when I come to that point I shall explain the reason why it was twenty-five per cent. on the actual importations, but I wish now to make a contrast between these rates and those imposed by the tariff act of 1857. The Secretary of the Treasury says that the act of 1857 reduces the rates of 1846 one fourth, and on that calculation all his estimates are based, and so, I suppose, are the estimates of the Senator from Virginia. Let the Senator, by the same old-fashioned rule of arithmetic, see what the rates of 1857 average. In the first place we have a rate of thirty per cent., another of twenty-four, another of nineteen, another of fifteen, another of twelve, another of eight, and another of four. The aggregate of them is one hundred and twelve, and there are seven rates. If you divide one hundred and twelve by seven you have sixteen per cent. as the average rate of duty. That is a reduction of nearly one half on the rates of 1846. That, however, is not a fair way to make the comparison. In order to make the comparison a fair one you must put two thirty per cent. schedules in the figures, because there are now two thirty per cent. schedules. That will make the aggregate one hundred and forty-two, to be divided by eight rates of duty, and that will give you seventeen and three fourths per cent. as the average rate on the dutiable goods. The comparison, then, between the present rates of duty on the dutiable goods and the rates on the same by the act of 1846, is as seventeen and three fourths to thirty and five eighths. If in the same way as before you put in the free list, and make your schedules nine, you will have to divide one hundred and forty-two by nine, and that will give you fifteen and seven ninths per cent. as the average on the entire importations, dutiable and free. The comparison, therefore, is fifteen and seven ninths under the present bill as against twenty-seven and two ninths under the old bill. If anybody can say that that is only a reduction of one fourth, I do not know how to cipher, and let me say they do not know either.

I know very well that there may be circumstances affecting the importations of the different classes of goods, and I agree most cordially with the Secretary of the Treasury, that owing to the revulsion in trade, the operations of the tariff in the present year have been of an exceptional character, and cannot give ground for a just estimate as to whether the proportion of goods in the different schedules will continue as they have generally ranged for the last ten years. I have no doubt, however, that our experience for ten years, under the tariff of 1846, may be considered a just and fair criterion as to the amount of importation under the different schedules for the next ten years; and I suppose the Senator from Virginia can see no reason why it should not be so. I suppose nobody can give me any reason why we should not continue to import about the same proportion of goods, classed in the different schedules, for the ten years to come, that we have in the ten years past. I have had prepared a statement embracing the imports for ten years under the tariff of 1846, with a view of showing what had been our experience as to the proportion the schedules bear to each other; and as I looked it over this morning I discovered that either the Senator from Virginia, or the one who made out my tables, had made some mistake as to the amount of goods that were warehoused last year. He asserted that there was an accumulation of $20,000,000 worth of goods in warehouse during the year 1857.

Mr. HUNTER. I said that on the 1st day of July, 1857, there were twenty millions of goods in warehouse more than in July, 1856. There were about forty-two millions in warehouse on the 1st of July, 1857, and twenty-one millions, I think, on the 1st of July, 1856.

Mr. SIMMONS. I cannot conceive how the man who made out my tables could make such a difference as to the goods in warehouse.

Mr. HUNTER. I can refer the Senator to the page in the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury, where he will find it.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is of no consequence to me. I find that from the 1st of July, 1856, to the 1st of July, 1857, the goods "consumed and on hand"—and I am not aware of any goods on hand, known to the Government, except goods in warehouse of that year's importation—were $336,914,000, and the goods entered for consumption were $333,511,000, showing a difference between the goods imported and those represented in the tables, as entered for consumption, and those as consumed and on hand, of less than three and a half million dollars. I discover that for eleven years, the difference between the goods consumed, and those on hand, of the goods entered for consumption—and the difference must, of course, be the goods in warehouse—has been about twenty-two millions on the average. In 1846, embracing five months covered by the operation of the tariff of 1842, and seven months of the tariff of 1846, the amount of goods imported, and classed as consumed and on hand, was $138,000,000, and the goods entered for consumption, $116,000,000, leaving $22,000,000 in warehouse that first year, and it has averaged about as much ever since. They were put in warehouse to wait for the reduction of duties, to take place under the tariff of 1846, no doubt.

Mr. COLLAMER. That was the first year the warehouse system was established.

Mr. SIMMONS. It was established with a view to let importers keep their goods until we could reduce the duties low. I have indicated to the Senator from Virginia what rates per cent. were imposed by these two laws, and I will now state what were actually collected on the goods by the tariff of 1846. In the first year of its operation, which embraced five months of the tariff of 1842, and seven of the tariff of 1846, the rates of duty averaged, on the whole importation, 20.42 per cent., and in 1848, they were 22.57 per cent., and in 1849, 21.38. The actual rates continued the same all the time, averaging 27.2-9 per cent. on dutiable and free goods. In 1851, the average, taking the total amount of duties, and the total amount of imports entered for consumption, was 24.18, and in 1854, 24.45. The averages continued to rise for the first five years, and from that time to the end of the tariff they continued to decrease. In 1852, they were 24.26 per cent.; in 1853, 23.47; in 1854, 23.27; in 1855, 22.89; in 1856, 22.55; and in 1857, 19.15. Last year, upon the whole importations entered for consumption of goods, dutiable and free, we actually collected but 19.15 per cent., with an average rate of 27.2-9 per cent. I shall not give my opinion about how this state of things happens, showing a steady decline in rates for six years, but I will state what the late Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Guthrie, said about it. I think that this result has been produced by fraudulently placing goods in schedules paying low rates; but he is a little milder in his language than I am. He accounts for it in this way:

"In carrying into effect the tariff of 1846, considerable difficulty has been encountered under the eight schedules of that act, imposing different rates of duties on the merchandise embraced in each. The difficulties, instead of diminishing, as the adjustment of the questions arising at the Treasury, and in the courts takes place, seem to increase, owing to the ingenuity of foreign manufacturers and merchants in mingling materials, and modifying fabrics, and giving them new names, until it is not possible to have uniform action in levying duties at different ports, &c.

"In remodeling the tariff act of 1846, I think it would be proper to retain schedule A of that act, and constitute another schedule to include iron, manufactures of iron, steel, &c., and all fabrics of silk, wool, cotton, flax, or hemp, &c., and to impose a duty on the same of twenty-five or thirty per cent." and to reconstruct the free list so as to include all raw materials used in our manufactures, and to impose on all articles not in the above schedules, or in the free list, a duty of not less than fifteen nor more than twenty per cent."—Mr. Guthrie, Financial Report, December, 1855, page 12.

I think that is a pretty sensible way of accounting for the duties, running down from twenty-four and a half to nineteen per cent., and a pretty sensible remedy; he recommends that all articles, when duties are designed to encourage our labor, be put into one schedule, except liquors, and to put twenty-five or thirty per cent. on them, and then put fifteen per cent. on the articles not enumerated and make free all articles used as materials for manufactures. Now, I should like any man here to tell me whether he deliberately believes that, with an average rate of duty of sixteen per cent., under the present tariff, upon all the goods dutiable and free, we can expect to get any such revenue as $64,000,000 per annum, within the next five or six years, according to the estimate of the Senator from Virginia? or of $69,500,000 for next year, according to the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury? It would require an importation of $400,000,000 of foreign goods annually to get that much revenue, if you collected the whole of the average rate of duty, and were not defrauded. I ask the Senator from Virginia if, practically, the revenue actually collected is not likely to fall just as much short of sixteen per cent., under the present tariff, as it has, under the tariff of 1846, practically fallen short of twenty-seven per cent.? Will there not be the same ingenuity in putting articles in the low schedules as has existed for the last ten years? I would ask him further, if he does not know that the average rate of duty, to be collected upon the whole imports, will depend very materially upon the amount imported in the free list? The greater their relative proportion to the aggregate amount of importations, the less is the rate of duty actually collected, and the free list was largely augmented at the last session of Congress. I see, by the tables I have, that the imports of free goods during the first three quarters of the present year, excluding specie, are about $45,000,000, at the rate of $60,000,000 a year. If $60,000,000 be our ordinary importation of free goods, it is nearly double the average of the last ten years. I have no idea myself, nor do I believe there is the least ground for any expectation, that we shall be able to import and pay for as much merchandise as we did last year, at any time within the next five years. We know very well it is a matter of demonstration that the importations returned have not come within hail of representing the real amount of importations we make by any fair estimate I ever knew made at the Treasury. According to the Treasury returns, the exports of this country, with an addition of ten per cent. for the earnings of freight, would leave a balance in our favor, for the last ten years, of about two hundred million dollars; but it is as well known as almost any fact of common report, that, instead of having a balance in our favor, we have actually got in debt to England, for that is the place where the debt concentrates, to the amount of about five hundred million dollars, in the form of United States and State stocks, and railroad stocks and bonds, during the ten years. The exportations and importations of last year, according to the Treasury books, without reference to freight, would show a balance in our favor of $2,000,000, and yet we all know that there was a balance against us the whole time, and a continual payment in bonds and stocks.

The Senator from Virginia said yesterday that it was unfair to impute to him and his friends, who thought it was safe to reduce the duties, a design to approach free trade and direct taxation. I do not impute that to him; but he said, in the same connection, that he did not believe anybody thought the reduction of duties last year had anything to do with the monetary revulsion which is not yet over. I am not one of those who think it had a great deal to do with it. I believed, before that fatal blow was struck, your system was a gradual consumption of the prosperity and wealth of the country. There were causes at work then that would have ultimately prostrated the industry of the country; but the very great reduction that took place on the 1st of July last was the occasion of the revulsion. Anybody who will look at the imports and exports for that quarter, can come to no other conclusion. The year before that, with an importation of $336,000,000, we exported $69,000,000 of coin. We exported more coin than the whole product of the mines of California; and, of course, that drew on the reserved funds of the banks. In the first quarter of the present fiscal year, the importations were $108,000,000. No man who pays attention to the course of trade in this country, and to the effect of over importations upon its prosperity, can fail, in my judgment, to perceive that it was the over importation which took place from the 1st of July to the 1st of October last, that occasioned the revulsion. The imports for these three months were $108,000,000; the exports of domestic products and specie were $53,000,000, of which specie formed about $14,000,000, leaving a commercial balance of $55,000,000 for a single quarter, to be paid off in coin or stocks; and every man who knows anything about the subject, knows that about the 1st of September railroad stocks and bonds ceased to answer the purpose of remittance to Europe to liquidate debts; and thus this commercial balance was thrown upon the bank vaults, and we had not at that time $60,000,000 in all the bank vaults in the country. If anybody supposes that a commercial debt of $55,000,000, in a single quarter, can be paid by the banks in three months, he must, in my opinion, never have had anything to do with business. It was just as impossible to avoid revulsion and suspension under such circumstances as it would be to build a new world. The only complaint I have ever made in regard to it was that the banks did not suspend at once as soon as the case arose, that nothing but specie could pay this balance; they might then, to a great extent, have saved the failure of the merchants. They would not have had any more denunciation than they have now. Everybody who does not understand the question lays the whole financial troubles of the country to the banks, and to what they call an inflated paper currency. To talk about an inflated paper currency, with interest on money at thirty per cent. per annum, is perfectly ridiculous. There must be a great plethora of money when it bears thirty per cent. per annum, as it had borne for a year before this crash came!

There were other causes. The importations of 1857 were $110,000,000 more than the average for the ten years preceding, and $33,000,000 above the average of the five preceding years. Such an excess is about as much as our people can well take care of; but when you come to $55,000,000 in a single quarter immediately following, it is such a balance as no country could ever meet in coin. A great deal has been said about an inflated paper system; and it is complained that the banks had not coin enough on hand; that they had trash instead. Now, sir, if you look into the cities that were most affected—the importing cities—where the crash bore with the most resistless fury, you will find that there has been no time within the last year when they had not more coin on hand than bills in circulation, except, perhaps, for a fortnight just before they suspended. I look occasionally at the bank returns of the city of New York; and nine times out of ten they have twice or thrice as much gold and silver on hand as they have bills in circulation; and besides that, their bills are secured by State stocks deposited in Albany; and yet such bills are called trash.

If anybody will look, he will see that our troubles resulted from over importations. When prices rule high throughout the country, it would be just as impossible to do the business of the country without an increase of the currency as it would be to transport a large crop of cotton without a large number of ships. The volume of the currency depends on the prices of commodities. It is a very convenient way to denounce the banks whenever there is a revulsion; and I am willing to admit that I have no great love for them. I would like them a great deal better if they never charged more than six per cent. That is all the objection I have to any money-lenders, corporate or individual.

I have before me a statement as to the failures, taken from a paper called the Commercial Agency; and these people have the failures with wonderful accuracy. I have made a comparison of the failures in the different cities, and I find that the more wealthy the city, the larger the failures; the more coin in a city in proportion to the circulation, the more failures there were. The aggregate of the failures during the present revulsion in the United States, up to the 1st of January, amount to about $290,000,000; of which $135,000,000 was in the city of New York, $42,000,000 in Boston, $32,000,000 in Philadelphia, and $6,000,000 in New Orleans. I have looked over the bank returns of those four cities to see the relative proportion of their coin and circulation, and I found that they recently had $51,000,000 of coin in the bank vaults to about $15,000,000 of bills in circulation—between three and four dollars in gold and silver to one in paper. Then I took the city of Charleston, which did not run into over importations. They have, I believe, about one hundred thousand people, as I was told by the late worthy Senator from that State; and I heard his successor say, the other day in the Senate, that the imports this year had been two thirds what they ordinarily were.

Mr. HAYNE. We do not wish to appear under borrowed colors. The population of Charleston is about sixty thousand.

Mr. SIMMONS. Well, it is a pretty old city, and a good one, and, I think, a very respectable one. The failures there did not amount to over one million dollars.

Mr. HAYNE. Bless my soul, sir! we had not a single failure that I know of.

Mr. SIMMONS. These things are pretty apt to be correctly stated by such papers as I quote from.

Mr. HAYNE. The Senator says that Charleston is not an importing city. Although we do not import directly from England, we do in some measure import, and import largely, from New York, and from Boston, and from Philadelphia, and pay just as much, and more, than if we imported from abroad directly.

Mr. SIMMONS. If I can get this system going, I hope to give you a fair share of the importations. I find that in the city of Providence, with a population of about fifty thousand, a population less than that of Charleston, the failures amounted to $4,500,000. We are connected in trade with the large cities; we sell our products in New York, where it is mingled with the importations, and an over importation is just as fatal to the producer who sells his produce in these great markets, as if he was engaged in importation himself, for the produce is sold to the same class of purchasers, and their failure involves everybody that deals with them. The Senator from South Carolina is mistaken. I find, on reference to the figures, that the failures in Charleston were thirty-one in number, and amounted to $992,000.

Mr. HAYNE. I think that is a mistake.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think my statement is correct. The failures in Charleston were the least of any seaport town of any magnitude in the United States. The city of Providence has a bank capital of $14,000,000, just about the same as the bank capital of the whole State of South Carolina; and we had a circulation at the time of the suspension of about one million eight hundred thousand dollars, with coin to the amount of, perhaps, five hundred thousand dollars, deposits in other banks, and other means that we could draw on to meet it.

Mr. SEWARD. Where was your circulation? Mr. SIMMONS. All over the country—West, and everywhere. That city had failures to the amount of $4,500,000, five times as much as the city of Charleston; and the banking institutions of South Carolina, with $14,000,000 of capital, had $16,000,000 of immediate liabilities in the form of circulation and deposits, with less than a million in specie to meet them; and yet that was the most sound city in the United States, showing that the proportion of coin had no more to do with the revulsion than the cotton which will be raised next year had to do with it. Over importations upset the country. It seems, however, there is the same feeling in South Carolina that there is in the Senate; and I received a speech from a gentleman in the South Carolina Legislature, which he made in December last on the subject; and the Senator from South Carolina gave me a copy of their bank returns—the report of their comptroller on finance. The comptroller of finance recommended to the Legislature of South Carolina, in order more severely to chastise the delinquent banks, to increase the penalty on them for issuing bills when they were under suspension, from five per cent., as it then was, to ten per cent., and denouncing them in the strongest terms. The gentleman who sent me his speech did not fall into that notion, but proposed to repeal the penalty altogether, and carried it through the South Carolina Legislature.

Mr. HAYNE. Not altogether, sir. The penalty on the first two installments exacted by the State, the banks were required by the comptroller general of South Carolina to pay, and did pay, and never refunded. I am of the opinion that the cause of a portion of our banks having suspended, is to be traced to this fact: we have a bank, the capital of which is owned exclusively by the State, and must partake of the character, more or less, of a political bank, subject to no responsibility, and, at the period of the crisis, its circulation was so large it was compelled to suspend; but if the bank of the State had not been the very first to suspend—no bank suspension—none of our banks in South Carolina would have refused to continue to pay specie.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think it is very likely.

Mr. HAYNE. In Alabama, they tried the experiment, and my friends can say they lost the whole of their capital there.

Mr. SIMMONS. I never knew banks that would be likely to suspend if they never accommodated a customer. Everybody can manage a bank so that there will be no suspension, by not lending money. I think the bank of the State of South Carolina is the only bank that deserves a banner in the State, if the rest did not loan their money, and they did. I honor them for it. It is what they were incorporated to do.

Mr. HAYNE. They all did it but the Charleston Bank and the Union Bank.

Mr. SIMMONS. Tell me about the banks sustaining themselves against a pressure, when the whole mercantile community are falling about them, and not loaning money. They will find no sympathy from me in such a course. I am not condemning the suspension; I am only saying that, after this denunciation of the banks by the officers of South Carolina, they had intelligent men in the Legislature who got this law repealed; and they continued suspended after the banks in the northern cities had resumed, and wisely so continued. Instead of laying this revulsion on the banks, I think that those who continued to accommodate the community, and sustain the crops, acted wisely. At the time resumption was talked of in South Carolina, cotton in Liverpool was five and a half pence a pound. It had gone down in four months from nine and a half to five and a half pence, eight cents on the pound. If they had resumed specie payments at the time it was talked of, and other southern banks had done so, and pressed their debtors, the whole crop would have gone at five and a half pence; but since that, by accommodating the public without a resumption, it has gone up to seven and a half pence. That item alone will make more difference to the cotton crop of the cotton-growing States than the whole bank capital in them.

But, sir, that is a matter rather aside from the proposition before the Senate. I have undertaken to show that the rates of duty imposed under the last tariff act cannot be considered adequate to supply the Government with revenue for its use; and if the revenue decreases as the rates are diminished, we should not collect $40,000,000 a year on the same importations upon which we collected $63,000,000 under the former tariff. You will have to add seventy-two and a half per cent. to the present rates of duty to bring them up to the rates under the tariff of 1846. As I said before, I do not give any opinion as to what the amount of importations may be. I see no reason, in the value of any great staple product of the United States, to justify any hope that you can increase the amount of exportations and importations; and unless there is some new basis of credit introduced, I agree that this proposed loan of $15,000,000 will increase your importations $15,000,000. It will all be in England in less than six months, if there is any revival of trade; and having $15,000,000 of good evidence of debt; its tendency would be to make other stocks and bonds appreciate. That is the way we got into credit at the commencement of the Mexican war. The Senator from Virginia said yesterday that everybody predicted there would be an insufficient revenue under the tariff of 1846. Well, sir, I happened to be here when it passed, and in two months from the time it went into operation, I know there was such an opinion; but I ventured to declare that we should have revenue enough under that tariff; that the issue of bonds for the war with Mexico would raise you credit in Europe; and if you would issue six per cent. bonds of the United States, you could import foreign goods as long as you would send such bonds abroad; and so you will again; and they will take a pretty large proportion of that which is worthless in payment of their goods, if you will only send them a few of these bonds. It was the resumption of the payment of interest by the different States, after we had redeemed our foreign indebtedness, that gave the State stocks and railroad bonds of the country a currency in Europe; and they have now got $500,000,000 of them. If you were to take the books of the Treasury as authority, instead of our having got in debt to them $500,000,000, they ought to owe us $200,000,000 for the last ten years. This difference is occasioned by undervaluation—I call it fraud.

There is one remarkable fact in reference to the mode of collecting and levying duties. We have had different forms of expression in different laws of the United States, with a view of having the revenue collected on the value at the port of entry.

In 1795 it was provided that the officers should take the value at the port of exportation and should add charges, except commissions, outside packages, and insurances. In 1799 the phraseology was changed, and the law said the valuation should be made at the port of importation, including all charges except outside packages, insurance, and commissions. In three or four months after that law passed, invoices came from London containing freight in the schedule of charges. An invoice came into Charleston with an item of £321 as freight upon goods sent; and the collector of Charleston, not knowing that the phraseology of the law had been changed, wrote to the Treasury Department to know what he should do with this new item embraced in the charges. The Comptroller of the Treasury happened to be absent, and the clerk wrote him a letter giving him directions. The clerk wrote that the charge for freight would be a proper charge at the port of importation; but as the law required the value to be made up at the port of exportation, he should exclude it, and he would have him strike it from the items of cost and charges, unless he found some other practice in other ports of the United States; and if he did, he must submit the matter to the Department and they would give further instructions. A few months afterwards the Department received a similar letter from a collector in Virginia, stating that an invoice had come from London with a certain item for freight among the charges. Mr. Steele had then got home, and he wrote pretty lengthy instructions, stating that as the language in the sections of the acts of 1795 and 1799 were word for word identical, the same ruling must be applied to each. One law required the value to be fixed at the place of exportation, and the other at the place of importation, and yet the Comptroller said they were identical! I have had some curiosity to look into these matters, and I find that is the way it happened that the legal principle came to be settled that it is unconstitutional to include freight among the dutiable charges upon imported goods; and I suppose it will be settled forever hereafter that that is unconstitutional, because this clerk did not happen to read the law, or failed to perceive the change in phraseology, as compared with the former one.

In the year 1816 Congress revised the tariff laws, and provided that—

"In all cases where an ad valorem duty shall be charged, it shall be calculated on the net cost of the article at the place whence imported, exclusive of packages, commissions, and all charges, with the usual addition established by law, of twenty per centum on all merchandise imported from places beyond the Cape of Good Hope, and of ten per centum on articles imported from all other places."

That was pretty plain, and they rightly continued and applied the same instructions to imports under that law.

In 1818 Congress revised the law again, and put in this phraseology, that the dutiable value should be made up at the port of importation, to include the original cost, including all charges except commissions, outside packages, and insurance, with the twenty and ten per cent. additions as before. This as clearly included the freight as the other excluded it and all charges; but Mr. Steele, referring the collectors to his letter of 1799, which referred to the act of that year, again repeats, the laws remain the same as to including the freight.

I happened to be here when the compromise tariff was made, when there was much debate in the Senate as to the reduction of duties proposed to be made. Some urged that that law was one abandoning the principle of protection; but I happened to be in favor of the compromise. In the course of the debate, the very distinguished Senator from Kentucky, Mr. Clay, said that he found by conversation that a great many of the manufacturers were with him on that question. The distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, Mr. Webster, got up and said, "those are the cotton manufacturers; they are not affected by this reduction; they are protected by the minimums—by the legal valuation of the goods in the law." Mr. Clay said that that legal valuation was put in for another purpose, to prevent frauds, and that of course nobody expected the minimums to be disturbed. That was the general current of opinion throughout the Senate, and it was agreed to be the proper construction of the law. But Mr. Clay suggested to me, in conversation, that we had a very peculiar kind of Comptroller, and it was best to give the original reasons for putting the minimums in the law; and I sketched out a few of them, and the paper was handed to Mr. Grundy, who agreed to give it to the Secretary of the Treasury, and insist that that should be the construction; but before the law took effect, the Secretary concluded that the minimums were repealed, and gave such instructions, illustrating them by forty bales of blue cottons. On the 26th of December, 1833, the Comptroller issued his instructions to the collectors to take effect January 1, 1834, and he told them to put the minimums aside; that they were to take twenty-five per cent. and to strike off ten per cent. of the excess over thirty, &c. This made considerable noise; and when Congress met resolutions were passed calling on the Secretary for his reasons for this. A peculiar part of the Comptroller's second letter of instructions was, that he found he himself was mistaken in the letter of the Secretary; but that letter was just as plain as his instructions were. A law as plain as that was construed in that way. If there is a law to repeal or diminish duties, there is no constitutional objection to any construction you may please to place upon it; but if you undertake to get what the law exacts, every item is unconstitutional; every provision you propose to make is offered in the wrong place, at the wrong time, and to the wrong bill, and it has been so ever since I knew anything about tariffs.

It is a matter of demonstration that, unless the character of the imports be very much changed from what it has been in previous years, the present tariff will not yield us sufficient revenue. Last year the amount of imports entered for consumption was $333,000,000, yielding a revenue of $63,000,000; but, under the present tariff, the same amount of imports, if of the same character and description, would not yield more than forty million dollars. Surely, nobody can believe that we can pay for a larger amount of importations than $333,000,000 for any length of time. Why, sir, flour, a great article of exportation, has not been so low for ten years as it is now. Cotton is twenty per cent. lower than it was last year; so of tobacco; and can anybody see anything in the commercial relations of the world to justify the hope that there is to be any great advance in the price of our great staples? I see none; I wish the prospect was better. If we are to continue this business of importing and getting in debt, I would much rather have direct taxes. Such a system is absolute ruin, dependence, and degradation. I would rather we should owe anywhere and to any class rather than to foreigners.

We never have a discussion on any of these subjects when constitutional objections are not made. Now, sir, I never knew so extravagant an application of constitutional doctrines as that which says it is unconstitutional to levy duties with a view to incidental protection—I call it with a view to encourage the industry of the country, I care not what others call it, if they will only think of the labor of the country when they are levying the duties—as an abstract proposition. I have heard nearly every one of our strict constructionists, during the present session, say that they believed the only way to bring the Government back to a fair amount of expenditures was to resort to direct taxation; not because it was exactly the best mode, but because it was the only mode to make Congress honest, and prevent its squandering the public money. That is a kind of incidental use of the power to levy taxes that I never heard of before—that you are to levy direct taxes for the purpose of making members of Congress honest! You cannot levy indirect taxes with a view to encourage industry, but you may levy direct taxes with a view to make the members of the Administration and the members of Congress honest. That is an incidental power I never expected was to be derived from the Constitution.

We have had one law that imposed a duty on goods at their fair market value at the port of importation, called the compromise act. We had a long debate about the constitutionality of levying duties upon a home valuation. It lasted two months; and, in the course of that debate, I witnessed one of the greatest evidences of the effect of public sentiment and public discussion upon the human mind that I ever saw in my life. A distinguished Senator from South Carolina—a man of as high character, honor, and truthfulness as ever lived on this earth—called me to order three times in the Senate for saying that he voted for an amendment levying duties on the home valuation. He said that he had never voted for it; that he always insisted that it was unconstitutional; and he believed it as much as I believe that I am standing in the Senate Chamber, and persisted in it until he went into the other room, and got the Journal of the Senate, and found his own name recorded in favor of putting that amendment into the bill. I mention this as an instance of how a protracted and excited discussion in the public press, and by the public men of the country, will literally wear a channel into everybody's mind, so that a man will come to believe almost anything. I do not blame any man here for believing that anything is unconstitutional. If that idea goes through two or three presidential elections, the whole public will be imbued with it. When the compromise bill—to which there were such peans sung in every State of the South, praising it and its illustrious authors—approximated towards its final close, one of those abstract constitutional propositions got across the mind of our President, that he could not levy duties on a home valuation. The duty was twenty per cent. on a home valuation, but he finally instructed collectors to collect sixteen and two thirds; and that would be perfectly constitutional! Only reduce the duty, and any of those propositions are constitutional in the minds of the most thorough abstractionist that ever lived. Only put the duties low enough, and there are no constitutional scruples in the way. I think our duties now are practically low enough for any constitutional objector. All I ask, is, to try to stop cheating, for the benefit of the prostrate labor of the country; and do not throw constitutional abstractions in their way, blocking their path to an honest livelihood. If I thought I should lose a vote for this proposition by any constitutional scruple, I would almost be willing to withdraw it; but I do not see how that can be. Sir, I believe there are men in this country who would take up fraud and cheating, and make a party hobby of it, if they thought they could win an election by it; but, if there is anything unconstitutional in trying to have a duty fairly and honestly levied on everything that is dutiable, I am at a loss to know why it should be so. It is a mere variation of the existing law; and if any part of the present system is constitutional, I do not see why this is not.

I had intended to say something more on this subject; but I fear I have exhausted the patience of the Senate, and I know I have exhausted my own strength. I will say to Senators who have troubles about incidental protection and incidental encouragement to labor, that, although I do not propose to raise a dollar more, or to vary, to the amount of one eighth of one per cent., any rate of duty now imposed by the law, I should consider it a great blessing to the laboring men of this country, if Congress would call this law a provision for the encouragement of American labor. Nothing has tended more to discourage the laboring men of our land, than the deliberate turning of the backs of the public men of the country upon the products of their labor. Sir, you are decorating, in the new Senate building, a room to represent the agriculturist, for the Committee on Agriculture; but you have discontinued the committee. You have no organ by which the tillers of the earth can reach the ears of the Senate. You have turned your backs on them, as if they were of no account. So it is with the manufacturers and mechanics. I regret that such should be the case with the Government of the United States. It is not the case with the Government of England. Their Lord High Chancellor—principal man—sits upon the wool-sack, and every emblem points to some branch of labor as the source of the greatness of that great country. I wish we could come back to the ways of our forefathers, who, when they made the first law for revenue, put in it a preamble, saying that it was done with a view to "the encouragement of manufactures." The simple fact that the dignitaries of this Government regarded the pursuits of labor, would give a stimulant to every man engaged in it. I would keep up a Committee on Agriculture here, even if I knew the farmers would be so independent that they would not petition you for anything in a century. The effect of Congress recognizing that great pillar of national strength would, of itself, give it encouragement and cheering hope, and would be seen in the countenance of every plowboy as he whistles to his team. These things go further than we think. There is not a mechanics' shop in the United States where the men, if they thought the President or any member of Congress was coming to visit them, would not make another effort to give a little higher polish to their work, to make it more slightly for their gratification.

Sir, in my deliberate judgment we have got far off from the old-fashioned path of true republican government. I speak somewhat warmly, but not unkindly to anybody. I know, in my own heart, that I feel just the same interest for the working men of the land who reside in Louisiana, as I do for those who reside in Rhode Island. I will advocate their rights and refuse to withdraw the encouragement they receive just as readily in the one case as the other. I think it a great advantage to the productions of the South that the sugar duty should be retained. I think it will give a great deal more protection if the sugar is valued in this country than if it is valued in Cuba. We had a case before us the other day from New Orleans, showing a series of under valuations in four years, of certain importations, to the amount of over eighty thousand dollars, depriving the Government of $24,000 duty. It was suggested that the Government was cheated by carrying out the prices in the invoice. I intimated that the exporters of sugar at Cuba, making out their invoices in arrobas and reals, made the computation very easy. It is a pretty uniform practice, as I am told, for the exporters of Cuba to make out two invoices for every shipment they make—one true and one false invoice.

The arrangement in the New Orleans case of which I speak, was made with the young man who was finally detected; he became a partner with two respectable men, because he was well acquainted with the custom-house portion of the business. I do not say that the respectable men in New Orleans shared in the profits; but I have no doubt that the men who made the consignments had an understanding with him. It is so all over the country. Cheating the Government in this way is as much a system as it used to be in this country to get an honest livelihood.

I said the other day, in the sugar discussion, that there was not a man in the employment of this Government who had upon his back a broad-cloth coat made in this country. I believe I stated, in December, that when I began to think of this question, it was on account of seeing in an English Review, which made a sort of left-handed acknowledgment of the prowess of our naval forces in the war of 1812, a statement that Americans were pretty hard fellows to fight; but concluded by exultingly asking, who wears an American coat, or who reads an American book? Sir, it is disreputable to the people of the United States that no man here to-day wears an American coat. We have been listening to this siren song of free trade for twelve years, and we have forgotten our duties to our country. This Government spending its $70,000,000 which it levies on the people, is, in its effect, like $70,000,000 levied on the people of Ireland, and spent abroad—an aristocratic levying upon a degraded and dependent tenantry; for no man in the service of this Government spends his earnings or his salary in the products of the labors of the people who pay him. I do not mean to complain of any party for this, but I say it is a great mistake to have it so; and it is the duty of Congress to alter such a condition of things as soon as possible, and it will cost no man a dollar to do it.

I do not expect to enlighten the Senate by what I have to say on such subjects. I have, before now, served a term of six years in the Senate. I was in it at a time when it had some men of more extended renown, and more universal reputation for talent, than any I now see about me; but, in my deliberate judgment, there has been no Senate since the foundation of the Government, that had a larger aggregate of talent than the one I now sit in. I say this, after having been an attentive observer while I have sat here—having served in the present Senate one year, and listened with great admiration and delight to the debates. I will say one thing further: that having formerly served here with some Senators more distinguished, or rather with more wide-spread renown, than any now living, that for what I call eloquence—that which is effective to convince and to move men, which springs from the heart, and beams from the eye, and finds utterance in words fully spoken—I have never known one here who surpassed the Senator from Kentucky, who now sits near me, [MR. CRITTENDEN.] Sir, when the Senator introduced a resolution, in December last, declaring it as the sense of the Senate that, to prevent frauds, Congress should provide for a home valuation of foreign imports, he related what had recently been told him in Philadelphia, by a man who had recently been obliged to discharge some seventeen hundred men from work in some of the iron works of Pennsylvania. His plain, but graphic picture of that occurrence showed that he loved his country and his countrymen, and that with him the laboring men of his country are his fellow-countrymen. All men can love their country, but few men can urge upon others the practice of that virtue as effectually as that Senator can.

I invoke Senators, if it be possible, to overcome their constitutional scruples, and try to prevent these frauds, that are like mill-stones around the necks of the laboring men of this land. I know what it is to labor. I know what it is to have labor receive the encouragement of the Government it loves. I know what it is to have a public sentiment everywhere speaking the language of patriotism. There is no patriotism that does not center in the laboring men of the country; for it is the industry of the country to which you must look not only for pecuniary aid to Government, but for general sustenance, civilization, and renown. I would say a word about fashions, and the current notions that prevail among moralists, as to the way to get out of these difficulties. I always take notice and listen with great delight to the clergymen of our land. Both moralists and political economists, as a general rule, attribute the disasters of the times to extravagance, and recommend economy as the remedy; that people should economize; and that there have been extravagant expenditures. That, to some extent, is true; but when there is pecuniary revulsion and distress among the laboring classes, it would not be my mode of getting out, to recommend to those who are blessed with affluence that they should economize their expenditures. On the contrary, they should enlarge them for the benefit of those in distress. I know it is a ready way of accounting for trouble to lay everything to extravagance; but I do not believe the resources of any nation in the world were ever crippled by the extravagance of its people, if they laid their money out upon the products of their own country, and the labor of their own countrymen. There would be no distress in Ireland if the landholders spent their rents upon that island.

Sir, this Government is pursuing the same course in reference to our people. Professing to be democratic, they buy clothes made abroad; they import their breadstuffs from Canada; and I saw a notice in the Union yesterday morning that there was a little revival in trade, some increase of the importation of market vegetables from Bermuda. That is your system; buy your marketing in Bermuda, your wheat in Canada, and your clothes in England and France; and that is the way these $74,000,000 go—not to the people who pay it, but abroad. The people of this country are like the tenantry of Ireland. I do not profess to have any great knowledge on these subjects; but I know the influence of fashion; I know the influence of public men upon public opinion; and I invoke them, and invoke the females of this land, instead of decorating themselves with fabrics from abroad, in times of distress at least, to expend their means in adorning their persons with articles which are the handiwork of their own countrywomen. They can make as fine articles as those made by any women in the world. They may cost a little more; but what of that? If the cost is to be a matter of consideration, buy less of them; but let what is laid out exert a beneficent influence upon our own people.

I say this, Mr. President, in no spirit of a cynic; I am no disciple of Diogenes. I like articles of taste, and like to see people wear them; I recognize the influence of the beautiful in elevating society everywhere, and especially the influence of ladies in our society; but I ask you, sir, if by this exclusive use of foreign fabrics, they are not forgetting the jewel in their care for the casket? Are there not, in times of general distress such as we are passing through, considerations of a higher character than those of mere outward ornament? These are times when, by judiciously employing the skill of their own people, they may send comfort to the homes of many who are destitute, and thus add to the beauty of exterior ornament the internal graces of an Annie Andrews and a Florence Nightingale, which have attracted the admiration of the world.

Sir, if we could individually, as Senators, make up our minds, and if this Government and its em-playes would determine, from this hour onward, to countenance and encourage the labor of our people, this would be the last revulsion in the history of this country.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. President, it is not my purpose, for I am anxious to conclude this question, if we can, to-day, to enter into an elaborate reply to the Senator from Rhode Island; but, in order to show that the point of order which I raised was well taken, I will refer to this provision in his amendment:

"And upon such wholesale market price or value, to include the foreign cost, all charges, duties, and profits, or so much thereof as may enter into and become a part of such wholesale market price or value, the rates of duty must, by the existing laws of the United States at the time of entry of such importation upon each article enumerated in such invoice, shall be assessed and paid."

That is to say, we now impose the duty upon the foreign value, upon the value at the place of shipment, including all the charges of putting the goods on board the ship there; and he proposes that we shall levy the duty upon the market value in New York, including the duty, the profits, the freights, and all these charges. In other words, his proposition is, upon all the high-priced schedules, to raise the tariff, in some instances, I believe higher than it would have been in 1846. Take, for instance, the thirty per cent. schedule, and there are a large number of articles imported in it. He would lay the thirty per cent. duty on the duty, profits, and charges, so that he would raise that more than nine per cent. He would raise the thirty per cent., in that way, to something like forty.

Mr. SIMMONS. The articles that now pay thirty per cent., under the tariff of 1846 paid, some one hundred per cent. and some forty per cent.

Mr. HUNTER. Very well; but those articles the Senator would raise to over forty per cent., because the addition would be nine on the duty alone, to say nothing of the profits and charges. On articles paying twenty-four per cent. duty, he would lay twenty-four per cent. on that duty and charges. That was reduced from thirty to twenty-four per cent., and the result would be that he would raise the duty beyond thirty per cent. On articles now paying nineteen per cent., he would lay the same duty upon the duty, profits, and charges. So that upon all these high schedules, and under these most of the importations are made, he would increase the duty so as to put them back to nearly where they were before. But upon the low-priced schedules, those upon which low duties were laid for the benefit of manufacturers, the increase would be hardly anything. On the four per cent. schedule the increase would not amount to one per cent. Thus he has introduced a cunningly-devised scheme by which there is hardly any increase on the articles which the manufacturer wants, while on those upon which high duties are laid, he gets a very large increase, and so far as sugar and iron are concerned, it will be worse for the consumer under this tariff if his scheme be carried, than it was before; and yet he talks about offering this proposition to prevent frauds on the revenue. That is a question which I do not wish now to go into; I do not wish to go into that unless the Senate shall determine that it is in order to offer such a proposition as this; but I think if I did, it would not be difficult to show that there are ten times, yea twenty times, the opportunities for frauds under such a scheme as this, as there are under the old system. To undertake to value a yard of cloth in New Orleans or in San Francisco at what it would cost in New York, who does not see the difficulties to which such a law as that would subject the importer? But into that question I do not choose now to enter. It is enough for me that this scheme proposes in effect to raise the tariff very largely, that this is a measure to originate revenue, and I hope we shall have the opinion of the Senate whether, under that view, such a measure can be originated here.

Mr. TOOMBS. I feel myself constrained to maintain the point of order raised by my honorable friend from Virginia; while, in the few observations I now intend making, I shall concur very much in the policy proposed by the Senator from Rhode Island. The Constitution says that "all bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives; but the Senate may propose or concur with amendments, as on other bills." If this amendment should be added to the bill for borrowing money, which I do not intend to support, this would be the bill by which the taxation of the country in the future would be assessed and collected; and therefore it is a bill for raising revenue. I have not been able to bring my mind to the conclusion that a bill for raising revenue means a bill for increasing the revenue. They are different words, and they mean different things. If a bill were introduced into this body to levy one half the present duties on imports, the objection would be just as good. Suppose a bill were here introduced that all duties now levied on imports should be reduced one half, and all other laws on the subject repealed: that would then be the only law by which taxation should be levied for the support of this Government; and hence it would be a bill for raising revenue; it would be the only bill for raising revenue; and it strikes me that is conclusive on this point. I should be glad if this objection could be got rid of on the present occasion; but this proposition does raise revenue; it does repeal three or four sections of the existing law.

Mr. SIMMONS. It does not repeal any sections.

Mr. TOOMBS. I thought there were certain sections of the old law repealed.

Mr. SIMMONS. No, sir.

Mr. TOOMBS. Whatever it may be, whether it repeals any portion of the existing law or not, if it should be passed, it would be the bill by which revenue would be assessed and collected. The custom-house officer must be guided by this rule prescribed by the supreme power for raising taxes upon imports.

Mr. SEWARD. Only for part.

Mr. TOOMBS. But the essential part. Now my own opinion is that it will increase the revenue, as the Senator from Virginia says, on some things, and diminish it on others; but I do not put my objection on that ground. I cannot vote for it as an amendment to this bill, because it is a proposition to raise revenue. If it had nothing to do with taxing the amount to be paid, and nothing to do with the collection of the revenue, I would go for it; but in its present shape I regard it as a revenue bill, and it is as such a revenue bill if it diminishes revenue as if it increases revenue; and I am not able to see the distinction.

I am sorry that the question has struck me in this light, because I have looked at it rather with a view of being convinced on the other side; for I am quite satisfied that the existing mode of levying the revenues of the country is improper. I believe the views of the Senator from Rhode Island and on the point are correct. I am satisfied that so far as our dutiable imports are concerned, we lose duties upon about one hundred million dollars of goods a year. I should not mind that much if it was a real relief to the people; but it is not. As duties are levied, say upon two thirds of your dutiable articles, allowing one third for undervaluation, that one third will be sold in the market for the same price as the two thirds that pay duty; and therefore it is no ease to the consumer, the tax payer. It is a mere bounty upon fraud, and, as such, I desire to defeat it; and I am willing to confess that I know of no mode that is so proper and so just as a home valuation. My honorable friend from Virginia says it will be a bad rule to adopt, for the valuation at New Orleans and San Francisco, the price at New York. I admit that is rather bad; but I suppose the main object of the Senator from Rhode Island, in making that provision, was to meet objections heretofore made. Some gentlemen from my section of the country supposed it in some form conflicted with the Constitution. I do not think so; but I was very glad that he adopted that rule to meet prejudice, and not argument; for that is all there is in it. It was to meet false opinions upon the great questions of revenue in the past, that ought to be buried with the past.

My reasons for supposing that the revenues of this country are defrauded to an enormous extent, are formed upon a few facts which I can state to the Senate in five minutes. It will appear by reference to the table of the imports of this country for the last three years, that our exports have exceeded our imports to the extent of $28,000,000. That does not include the earnings of freight or insurance, or profits upon commodities exported. These are great elements, and they must amount, I think, to twenty-five per cent., certainly not less than twenty. That would give us, on the exportations of $307,000,000, at least $62,000,000 per annum. Add that to the $28,000,000 of excess of exports, and there are $90,000,000 per annum that our imports are short of our exports. There are but two ways of accounting for this. Have we been doing an unprofitable business in exporting our commodities? I say we have not. On what basis do I say so? During this year, by looking at your tables of exchanges between this country and all the nations of the earth, you will find that the exchanges have been in our favor, and chiefly with the great commercial nation from whom we import the most, England. That is a business which my own pursuits in life have led me closely to examine, because I have a personal interest in it. During all this time, exchange between us and England has been below par. This conclusively shows that we have not done an unprofitable business. The commodities valued at our own ports, sent abroad, have sold for more in foreign ports than they were valued at home. This is evidenced conclusively by the state of the exchanges. That no man can gainsay.

What are the only two elements that can effect this result? We are sometimes told that we have sent our bonds abroad; they do not appear in the exports, and if they did they would enlarge the exports, and, therefore, make a greater difference than the state of the tables, as now presented at the Treasury Department, shows. The dollars we borrow do not appear in the exports, but appear in the imports; because we bring back the value of these bonds in gold and silver, or in commodities; and, therefore, every dollar we borrow should appear in the imports, though it does not in the exports. There is but one other element to interfere with this calculation of mine, and that is the interest which we paid abroad upon previous loans. If our borrowing abroad for these three years was only equal to the interest we paid in the three years, that account ought to be balanced. That it is greatly more, is very clear; because that is subject to another element. All the bonds that have been sent abroad, at a period of revulsion, come home for a market whenever they are higher in New York than in London, because they are the cheapest mode of remittance.

These elements I throw out, and I merely take nakedly from the reports of the Secretary of the Treasury for the last three years the exports and imports of commodities, leaving out the bonds and interest in regard to which, as I have already shown, the balance would be entirely in favor of our own country; that is, we have borrowed more than the amount of our interest on previous loans. I wish it was not so, but it is the truth. Then our imports for the last three years have shown a difference of $28,000,000, or about $10,000,000 per annum in our favor. I state it in round numbers rather than exact figures. For the years 1854, 1855, 1856, and 1857, the exports amounted to $1,239,000,000, averaging $309,000,000 per annum; and the imports to $1,243,000,000, averaging $310,000,000. In 1854 the balance is rather against us. But take the three years 1855, 1856, and 1857: in 1855 the imports were $261,000,000, and the exports $275,000,000; in 1856, the imports were $314,000,000, and the exports $327,000,000; in 1857, the imports were $360,000,000, and the exports $363,000,000. These three years show a difference of $28,000,000—a surplus of that amount that we have had, exclusive, as I before observed, of the earnings of freight and insurance, and the profits on the exports. Put these at twenty per cent., and we should have above $60,000,000 besides the $10,000,000 per annum, making a total of $70,000,000 a year that our exports have exceeded our imports; and therefore if we bought the same amount in the foreign country, there ought to have been $70,000,000 more imported than exported, or the trade was a disastrous one, and would ruin the country if it was followed; but I have shown that it was a good trade, because the exchanges were in our favor. Now, what becomes of the $70,000,000 a year? I want to know if there are not other elements that do not appear in the tables except those I have stated—loans and interest abroad? and I would ask my honorable friend from Virginia if he knows of any other element that would disturb the calculation?

Mr. HUNTER. There is another one which I believe does disturb it: that is, smuggling.

Mr. TOOMBS. That may be; but I have looked upon smuggling as a very small item, considering the force we have in the revenue department; and I am sure, if they work faithfully, there ought to be but little of that. I have no doubt, however, there is some of it.

Mr. CAMERON. I would suggest to the Senator from Georgia that the foreign valuation makes up the difference.

Mr. TOOMBS. I am coming to that point; that is the basis of my argument. I say we are cheated to the extent of $70,000,000 a year; and I want all the elements my friend from Virginia can give me. What will he allow for smuggling? Twenty million dollars a year on the foreign values I think would be a very fair estimate for smuggling.

Mr. COLLAMER. It depends on what you call smuggling. Is it this cheating?

Mr. TOOMBS. No; by smuggling, I mean illicit trade brought in by going around the custom-house. No doubt a great deal of it is done in Vermont, [laughter;] and the Senator ought to be acquainted with it, as he represents a frontier State.

Mr. COLLAMER. There is very little of it since the reciprocity treaty.

Mr. TOOMBS. I should suppose there would have been more. The greatest objection I had to the reciprocity treaty, was that it would increase smuggling; but I confess I have always had a rather tender regard for the smuggler. I thought that, as we brought in all the products of Canada free, the manufactures of England and other countries might be brought in through Canada; and I have no doubt that treaty, instead of diminishing, has increased the facilities for smuggling; because, when you open trade with a country, and bring in a great many articles free, it is very easy to put illegitimate articles with the legitimate; I have no doubt, with no practical information on the subject, simply reasoning, that there is more smuggling than before. I counted that in when I voted for the treaty; and, by the way, I would remark that I find, from the developments of open session here, that very few voted for that treaty, though it got a two thirds vote in the Senate.

Mr. CAMERON. There is nothing to be smuggled now.

Mr. TOOMBS. British manufactures that are subject to a duty of thirty per cent. would pay for smuggling, I think. I have given the statement of difference between the exports and imports, and I believe I have left out none of the elements of the calculation; but I should be glad if any could be suggested. Deducting $20,000,000 for smuggling, it would leave $50,000,000 as the extent of undervaluation. I believe it reaches $100,000,000.

There is another very important element we ought to consider. In the three or four hundred million dollars of imports there is a very large amount of specie and other articles that do not pay duty, and they, of course, will not be smuggled. There is no reason for smuggling any article that does not pay duty; while, on the other hand, there is a motive for increasing its valuation. If a merchant, who wants to sell an article that he imports free of duty, can make the purchaser believe that he gave a great price for it abroad—as, for example, coffee in Rio Janeiro, or tea in China—he can sell better; and the fraudulent man is more apt to put his invoices on free articles up than down. The greatest smuggling will, of course, be in regard to those goods paying the highest duties, except as this is controlled by the facility of smuggling. Of course, a man would smuggle more jewels at ten per cent. than sugar at thirty, because jewels are more easily secreted; but that is the only abatement of the principle which I lay down, that the great body of the undervaluation is upon the highest and most convenient dutiable goods.

Among our imports there are some articles very little liable to undervaluation. Iron, that is brought in by the bonds to which I have alluded, is very little liable to it, because a price current comes with every steamer; the iron men in England are in the habit of getting together and fixing the price for thirty days ahead; there is a combination among them. But when you come to textile fabrics, spirits, and wines, where the price cannot be readily ascertained, where it requires skill, and that skill even is defeated by the circumstances of a voyage—for I have been told by importers that wines get drunk as well as those who use them, and this makes very great difficulty in detecting their real value—the case is different. Taking all these elements into consideration, the deficiency is upon goods which bear the highest duty, and the tables show it cannot be less than fifty millions, and I think, on fair principles, it might be shown to be $100,000,000.

How are we to prevent it? What is the best means? It is notorious to every well informed man, that, as a general rule, there are two invoices sent with every cargo from a foreign country. Custom-house oaths have become a proverb. Everybody knows that you can buy wines from the best cellars in France, for as little money, in New York, as you can in France; and I presume they would not follow the business unless they made money somewhere.

There is another element in reference to ad valorem duties, as laid by the act of 1846, which makes undervaluation greatly to the detriment of your own traders. For instance: a man will go to Oporto and buy wines, say at fifty dollars a pipe. He buys them of a merchant in Oporto and ships them in a vessel at that price. Probably the same vessel will carry the same description of wine valued at twenty-five dollars a pipe. Why? It is true it did not cost the merchant in Oporto more than twenty-five dollars: he paid that to the grower, and he pays only half the duty of an honest merchant of this country, who buys his wine there at fifty dollars a pipe. I know of no means on earth, even on the broadest principles of free trade, by which this can be prevented, except by putting the duty upon the value at the place where imported. That can be tested. You have your prices current in New York, Savannah, San Francisco, New Orleans. It takes but a moderate degree of honesty to tell what a thing will sell for in the market among merchants and traders. If there is any better plan than to put the valuation on the article at the place of importation, I do not know it; but if my friend from Virginia can suggest a better one that will defeat the frauds, I shall go for it. I have shown from the tables that there are frauds—frauds greatly to the detriment of the honest trader; frauds greatly to the detriment of the Government revenue, and not in ease and favor of the people. I might put up with the frauds if they only cheated the honest trader or only cheated the Government, especially the latter. I might be reconciled to them if they benefited the people; but they do not benefit the people. If a man who imports one hundred hogsheads of sugar, undervalues the importation to the extent of fifty per cent., so that he actually pays duty on but fifty, the whole hundred will bring the same price in the market necessarily; and therefore the people are not benefited; the Government is not benefited; but the ruin of the honest trader is effected. I want to defeat that. When you levy taxes of five, or ten, or twenty per cent., as long as you lay duties on imports, I want them levied fairly and honestly.

I admit that the argument used by my friend from Rhode Island is a very good one. Believing myself that the best way of levying the revenues of this Government is by indirection—by duties on imports and not by direct taxation; and in that I agree with my honorable friend from Virginia; for, like him, I do not wish to resort to any other mode than indirect taxation. I consider the principle of the act of 1846, as I declared in a speech I made in the House of Representatives when it passed, was to discriminate for the protection of the industry of the country; and as far as that bill did it, it met my approbation then, and does now. I would levy twice the duty on sugar that I would on coffee, because coffee is not raised in this country. I would levy duty on an article raised by my own countrymen. In laying taxes for revenue, I would rather do it so as to benefit my countrymen than put them on what would not benefit them. These are the principles I have acted on through life. I have read and studied this question as thoroughly as I am capable of, and these are my opinions to-day.

Well, have you a better mode than home valuation? I think this is a fair mode. As to the small difference there might be in selling goods in New York and San Francisco, I do not attach much importance to it. The Senator from Rhode Island has endeavored to get rid of an objection in that respect, and I should like to have it got rid of if possible. It is rather a bungling mode I admit; but I do not believe it is possible to avoid difficulty on that point. Whether it can be done or not, fixing the price of the articles according to their value at the place sold is the only mode I have been able to elaborate, or have heard from others, which will correct this great evil to the honest trader, to the public revenue, or to the people; and therefore I am in favor of it.

Hence I say that I regret that I cannot support this amendment now, because I believe it is a proposition to raise revenue which this body is prevented from originating by the terms of the Constitution. I am willing to admit that the reasons do not exist to-day; but if my ancestors made a provision in the Constitution upon a reason that has passed, I must stand by it as it is. I am well aware of the reasons which led to the insertion of this clause in the Constitution, but they have no application to this country, though our ancestors did not think so. Their idea was taken from the best friends of British liberty, that inasmuch as the Commons were the people who paid the taxes, they wanted to keep the purse-strings always in the hands of the Representatives of the people, and not with the Lords, or the Crown, and they adhered tenaciously and wisely in their day and generation, and considering their form of Government, to that principle; but in a republican Government like ours, where I am as much a representative of the people as any man who sits in the other House, elected by them, interested with them, standing for them, the reason has ceased; but the law exists. Acting upon fallacious ideas, the framers of the Constitution put down this rule for me. I intend to observe it, whatever may be the consequences. Inasmuch as I was compelled to support my honorable friend from Virginia, though in favor of the amendment or principle of my friend from Rhode Island, I have deemed it necessary to say what I have said, that I might not be misconstrued. I was very much obliged to my honorable friend from Kentucky, who introduced the proposition at an early period of the session, and to my friend from Rhode Island for pressing it, and I only wish they had brought it here through that Department of the Government to which it is properly consigned by the Constitution.

Now, a word in reference to the question of expenditure, and I shall no longer detain the Senate. I stated that I would not vote for this bill. Why? I approve the policy which is laid down by the Secretary of the Treasury, and I intend to follow it, and it is because I do approve it that I will not support this loan. I do not intend to vote for the appropriations demanded by the Departments, and therefore I will not raise the money. Those gentlemen who intend to vote for the appropriations, however, may very well vote for this measure. I consider it no statesmanship, I consider it dishonorable for me to vote for estimates here to support the Government, and then to refuse to raise the revenue necessary by loans or taxation, and to go about through the country and stifle about economy. I will act upon no such principle for myself. I will vote to raise by taxation, or by loans, every dollar that I will vote to spend; and, ordinarily, I will vote to raise what my fellows do, until they have transcended a principle I lay down for my action, and which I now desire briefly to state.

When the tariff of 1857 was passed, the revenues from customs were $63,000,000 a year. In a speech which I made in the place where I now stand, in favor of the bill which received the vote of every man in this body but eight—the Republican, the Democrat, the outsider, all supported it except eight—I avowed that it would reduce the revenues $15,000,000, and they being then $63,000,000, that would bring them to $48,000,000. That was the avowed principle of the supporters of that measure. My own opinion was that it would yield a revenue of between forty-five and forty-eight million dollars. My honorable friend from Virginia told me the other day that he had a calculation made at the Treasury, and that according to it, the imports of last year under the tariff of 1846, would have produced $48,000,000 with the present rates of duty. That is exactly what I expected this tariff to do, and by turning to the Globe you will find that I said I expected it would reduce the revenue to $48,000,000 a year, and therefore I am not disappointed in the money I sought to raise off the people. This tariff will raise exactly what I expected it to raise. I voted to reduce the custom revenues of the country, from $63,000,000 to $48,000,000, and adding the proceeds of the lands, we should have fifty-two or fifty-three millions in the Treasury. When I voted for that, I intended to bring the expenditures of this Government down to $50,000,000, and I intend it now. I have not changed my policy. Then it was a Democratic policy, then it was a Republican policy, then it was a national policy. In the other branch of Congress two thirds of the members of which, when elected, were against the Democratic party, and the outsiders who joined them on the then issues before the country—and a great many gentlemen from my section of the country united with them on the pending issues then with regard to their essential rights, but, put them all together, there were two thirds of that body against the Democratic party, and by a majority of fifty-four, including I believe every Democrat, as far as I know, this tariff bill was passed. It met the support of the Senate, consisting of about two thirds Democrats, and of the House of Representatives of two thirds Opposition. I looked upon it as a fair national policy. It struck me as a matter to rejoice at, and I have alluded to it before my constituents in Georgia. I thought it was a harbinger of better times; I thought it was a lesson of wisdom, that Massachusetts, that sternest friend of the protective system, upon which twenty years before a large portion of the people of my country were ready to dissolve the Union, voted side by side with South Carolina upon a system of revenue; for the Senators representing those Commonwealths both voted together on that point.

I intended to bring your revenues to that point, and to bring your expenses to that point. I had considered the question, and I gave in my place my reason for supporting the measure to be, that it was a reduction of public taxes. It has, therefore, produced precisely what I supposed it would; but its operation has been disturbed by a commercial revulsion. The honorable Secretary of the Treasury tells us we shall get but $41,000,000 this year on that account; and therefore he is $7,000,000 short of my calculation. To that extent I will borrow money, if it is a temporary deficiency; and we have already borrowed to the amount of $20,000,000 by Treasury notes.

There is another element. If there was an extraordinary temporary expenditure, I would borrow for that, for there are two disturbing elements. I will borrow for a deficiency of revenue from temporary and extraordinary causes, and I will borrow for temporary and extraordinary expenditures. I have accounted for the extraordinary deficiencies—only $7,000,000 below my own estimate. What are the extraordinary expenditures? Very reluctantly, and I must say, on further consideration, with great regret—though I voted against the bill finally, when you had struck off some amendments of small amount—I voted for the estimates for the Army in the deficiency bill; but having done that, I intend to raise the means, and we have done it. That bill amounted to $9,000,000, and, adding $7,000,000 for the deficiency of revenue, you have $16,000,000 to be provided for. A bill for $20,000,000 of Treasury notes passed before I came here, thus more than providing for the deficiencies arising from these extraordinary causes—principally the Utah war, as it was called, but by others it was more justly called the contractors' war. It seemed at one time to be regarded as likely to be a formidable one, for the Secretary of War wanted five regiments, and the Military Committee wanted nearly as many; but, according to the statement of the chairman of the Committee on Finance, we have probably got rid of that expense. It is true Congress subsequently provided for raising three regiments of volunteers. Now it is in our power not to call them out, and I will not call them out. In my opinion, we have more troops in the field than we have use for. The Utah war has passed; I never believed it had an existence; I believed it was got up on false rumors; I believed it was got up by contractors; I believed it was got up for the sole purpose of a foray on the Treasury, and not on Salt Lake City. It will partially answer that purpose, but I wish to stop it when I can.

Then having borrowed all the money which the revenue fell below my estimates, and having provided for all the extraordinary expenses, I will not go further. I do not look on the extraordinary expenses in the light of my honorable friend, the Secretary of the Treasury, in whose ability and integrity I have the most unlimited confidence; and I am quite satisfied that if all the Departments of the Government brought their estimates as rigidly within the wants of the Government as he did, this loan would not have been demanded. But, however that may be, my duty as a Senator is to take care of the interests of the people. That is my first business, and that I intend to do. Having raised enough to meet the deficiency in the revenue, and enough to meet the extraordinary expenses, I will not raise another dime. The Army has been carried up under the discretion vested in the President, in reference to frontier posts, to sixteen or seventeen thousand men. I do not believe there ought to be any of them, or at least, not beyond the ten thousand men we had a few years ago. They have got up a quartermaster's department that is magnificent for spending money, but for nothing else. As to the appropriations for volunteers, I will not vote a dime for them. The Government can reduce the quartermaster's department, and I wish to reduce wherever I can.

I understand my friends here have got into a difficulty with England, and that is made an excuse. Well, sir, she has acted very badly, and nothing would have given me more pleasure at any time for ten years past, than a war with England. We have had cause of war for the last ten years, and I think it has been a scandal to this people that we have not had it. So I am always ready for it. If I have not got the particular reason you have, I have other reasons: she interferes with our business; and, therefore, whenever you want to fight her, put me in for one chance. I am ready for that at any time, but I do not think there are half as many difficulties growing out of these questions of war, as people generally imagine. They say they want to build more ships. I am willing to give great efficiency to the Army and Navy, but I find that the same troops we kept up twenty years ago, now cost us twice the money; and I find that when we have run our Navy up from $3,000,000 to $16,000,000 a year, we do not float a single additional gun. England is kicking you all over your own neighborhood, here in the Gulf of Mexico, that ought to be a mare clausum. It is our sea, and that ought to be a sufficient right to keep her out of it. While she is searching your ships, and kicking you out of your own water, the best public ship in the world, the best in your Navy, certainly, is toting her cable from one of her dependencies to the other. I think you had better have it down in the Gulf protecting your commerce. At the very moment your vessels are being searched, disgraced, fired into, spit upon, right here in sight of your own coast, by British gun-boats, the best ship in the American Navy is engaged in laying down a cable to connect two British possessions. Gentlemen must excuse me from that expense. I will not submit to it.

I will bring the force of the country where it is needed to protect its honor; I will give every dime that is necessary to protect the honor and the safety of my country; I will throw in its purse, and I would throw its people even in the fiery furnace, to its maintenance; but such occasions are merely made excuses and pretexts for an increase of the public expenses. I suppose when Congress has voted six sloops and ten gun-boats, we shall receive an apology: they will have got the money and we shall have the insult pocketed.

That is the way it will turn out. Well, sir, I have been fooled so before, and I do not intend to submit to it. I will not pay. You will not get up ships now soon enough, unless you make war. As to the idea of building your ships with a view of going to war, I think that is bad policy. I know I am running against great authority, but I think it is much better to get ready to fight when you have a fight on hand. You have the men; you have the money; you have the materials to build ships; and if you are fit to defend yourselves, you will do it, and I have no doubt the country is fit to do it. It has all the materials of war; and when you want the mere instruments of war, (cannon and ships,) you can make them as quick as the enemy can get to you, or as quick as is necessary to defend your honor in the cheapest way.

There being no war, I do not intend to raise a false cry of war, to make a foray on the Treasury. I do not want to do it with regard to Utah or England. If you want to fight England, I am with you, and will give you plenty of money to do it. I say you have plenty of cause to do it. It is a shame that you allow her to come to your own seas, fire into your own vessels, and search them. The Government ought to send a force to the Gulf, and seize the vessels committing these outrages, and either sink them or bring them to our ports and hang the officers. If the Government of England does not authorize it, let us have somebody to hold accountable; but as for their apologizing to us, I suppose I could take a wringing of the nose patiently once, with a decent excuse, if it was by a mistake; but I do not think I could keep taking them. I suppose we have had about twenty such cases in the Gulf of Mexico, and I think it is time to stop that business. I think it is time for us to have something to apologize for ourselves; and I am willing to make an occasion for an apology, and I will apologize when I have got satisfaction. It is becoming my honor to do it then. If I have sunk the enemy's ships, I can make an apology respectably. But all these things are to be made now excuses for increasing the revenue. I cannot do it. If you want war, say so, and I will give you war supplies; if you want peace, I will give you peace supplies; but everywhere there can be retrenchment. When I voted to reduce the revenue, I intended retrenchment, and I did not intend to carry the ordinary expenses of this Government over $50,000,000 last year, and I do not intend to do it now; and therefore I must tell my honorable friend from Virginia that I will vote for none of his loan bills.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. President—

Mr. SEWARD. Will the honorable Senator give way for a motion to adjourn?

Mr. HUNTER. No, sir; I have not a great deal to say, and I still hope that perhaps we may get the question this evening. Mr. President, my friend from Georgia, in the course of his remarks, it seems to me, has made some unjust strictures on the ad valorem system, founded, as I think, on a mistaken comparison between the imports and exports. In the first place, he wishes to ascertain whether we receive as much back, in the shape of imports, as we export, or whether our official tables show the same amount returned in imports as we send out in exports. He ought to take the exports at the market value of the country into which they are sent, compared with the imports at their market value here. Instead of being contented with that, he adds to the exports the profit on that side, and says nothing of the profit to be put on the foreign value of the imports when they come here. But be that as it may, he seems to think that if there be this difference, there is no other way of accounting for it except by under valuation. He allows nothing for smuggling; he laughs at the idea that we can be cheated in that way, while he thinks it is palpable, and easy to prove, that we can in the other. Now, sir, I submit that with such a coast as we have, with the long, unguarded frontier between this country and Canada, from which they can bring in manufactured goods at any time without paying duties, if they choose to do so, it is far easier to smuggle than it is to deceive the appraisers by under valuation.

Sir, what system could we establish that would be better calculated to prevent fraud than the identical system we now have, and which has been in force since the institution of this Government? We take the foreign value, and we submit that to experts who are appraisers. If the invoice show that it is under the foreign valuation—and with that they are acquainted by information from the consul, and by prices-current—they have a right to put it up; and if, in their opinion, the invoice is to be put up more than ten per cent., the importer forfeits twenty per cent. If the invoice shows such an undervaluation as to amount to fraud, the cargo is subject to seizure, and the vigilant custom-house officers who thus subject it to seizure are entitled to a portion of the fines and penalties as their reward.

We have, under the present system, as a check upon fraud, first the foreign invoice; then the opinion of the appraisers, from whom an appeal can be taken, if necessary, to the merchant appraisers and the appraisers-general with regard to the value; and they have the power, if they believe an article is undervalued, to put this up; and if the decision of the appraisers be, as I said before, that it was undervalued more than ten per cent., the importer forfeits twenty per cent. With all these means of detecting fraud and all these safeguards against it, is it reasonable to suppose that we should be cheated by the undervaluations of goods which thus pass through the hands of skillful and expert men, than that we should be cheated by smuggling goods into the country? The temptation is greater to the one than to the other, because the profit is greater; and it is perfectly true that the smuggling would only be upon goods which paid duty, as the undervaluation would be; but I do not see what that proves in the argument. I believe, that whenever we come to compare the present system, which is the system founded at the very origin of the Government, with any other that is proposed to be substituted in its place, it will be found to be fairer than any other which can be substituted for it. If you take specific duties, there is as much chance for being deceived in regard to the quality as there is in regard to the value under the present system. If you take a home valuation, you either have it impracticable, as in this scheme of the Senator from Rhode Island, or else you have it unconstitutional, for the Constitution does provide that you shall give no preference to the ports of one State over those of another. Will the Senator say that it is no preference given to the ports of one State when you impose on an article imported from Liverpool into New York only the lesser costs and charges of freight, &c., and impose upon the article imported from the same place into New Orleans the greater costs and charges? This difference of freight constitutes an immense element in the value. Take, for instance, goods carried to San Francisco from England; the freight enters as an immense element into the value of the coarser and the cheaper varieties of goods.

I believe, then, that whenever the comparison shall come to be fairly instituted, it will be found that the present system, which has been approved by experience, and which has been improved by practice, will be found to be safer than that which may be proposed to be substituted for it. Why, sir, how can it be said that it is easier to ascertain the market price in New Orleans, or New York, or Boston, or Baltimore, than it would be for skillful and expert men to ascertain the market prices in Liverpool or in Havre, when they come to be tested as the laws and regulations of our country require them to be tested?

But, as I said before, Mr. President, I am anxious to get this question. I will not enter into the general argument, but merely say so much by way of caveat; for when the question does come up, I, for one, shall be ready to enter into it; and I believe it will be easy to show that the present system is a fairer system than that which is proposed to be substituted for it. But it seems to me to be so obvious that this amendment is one which cannot now be entertained, by reason of the constitutional objections which I have raised—not because we cannot entertain a thing which is unconstitutional, but because it is contrary to a constitutional rule of order—that it can hardly be necessary for me to go beyond that question itself.

It does, as my friend, the Senator from Georgia, has said, give us a new revenue system. It does originate a revenue bill, and for that reason I think ought not to be entertained. At least, I hope we shall take the sense of the Senate upon that question before we go further into the debate.

Mr. SEWARD. I am totally at a loss to understand how the question of the constitutional power of the Senate to pass this amendment becomes a question of order. There must always be, as the jurisdiction of the Senate is limited, a question in every case, if any one shall see fit to raise it, whether any action proposed is constitutional or not. There is no rule of order of the Senate that they shall first determine what is consistent with the Constitution and what is inconsistent with it. That is a question which goes to the final passage of every bill, and every amendment to every bill that is proposed. This is not a court of law in which a plea to the jurisdiction or a plea in abatement may be interposed before a trial upon the merits; but every bill goes through its three consecutive readings, and at every stage a question may be raised whether the Senate of the United States have power to perform the act which is proposed. I therefore see nothing to be gained by interposing this question.

Mr. President, I am equally at a loss to understand how it is that it is fancied that this amendment conflicts with the constitutional power of the Senate. The British constitution, which was before the framers of our own when ours was made, provided that all money bills should originate in the House of Commons. The money bills included bills for the expenditure of moneys as well as bills for the levying of taxes or the raising of money. The framers of our Constitution left to the Senate, between which and the House of Lords they imagined a kind of resemblance, the power to originate bills for the appropriation of moneys, and to amend all bills which were proposed to them for the raising of moneys, leaving to the House of Representatives nothing peculiar and exclusive in regard to money bills except the right to originate, which is of quite little value, because their bills can be changed by the Senate; and a bill which levies a tax of one per cent. as originated in the House of Representatives, may be raised by amendments in the Senate so as to levy a tax of one hundred per cent. on any article, or a bill proposing to levy $1,000,000 when it originates in the House of Representatives and passes there, may be made in the Senate a bill to raise $100,000,000, and sent back to the House of Representatives in that form. Nothing is left to the House of Representatives, then, that is exclusive in regard to this question, except the power to originate the bill.

Now, here is a proposition which does not propose in any way to levy any tax whatever. Our imposts upon foreign commerce are regulated by a tariff which imposes a duty of thirty per cent. on one class of articles, twenty-four per cent. upon another, and nineteen per cent. upon another, and four per cent. upon another, and which bill specifies in what class every article that is or can be imported into the United States shall fall. If we add this amendment to this bill and pass it, we do not tax one article more than it is already taxed, nor do we impose upon any article that is taxable by the existing law a duty of one per cent. more, or one fraction of one per cent. more, than the duty which is already imposed upon it. What is it, then, that we do? We propose to amend the details of the imposition and collection of these duties, and nothing more. Suppose, on this question of undervaluation, that, having ascertained that goods are undervalued at the custom-house, we, in passing this bill, should think that we might guard against that fraudulent undervaluation by directing that the shipmaster should take an oath different from the one which he now takes, or that the collector at the custom-house or the tidewater should be sworn? Have we not a right to amend the oath? Suppose it should appear that, although the oaths are prescribed by the existing laws to secure an honest and just collection of the revenue, yet that, owing to some default in our law, the punishment denounced against them cannot be enforced: could we not amend the system by an amendment to this bill which would enforce the penalties or punishments for the taking of oaths falsely and fraudulently? Suppose we should ascertain there was a place near to the vessel to which goods were taken from on board ship, and were concealed, hidden; could we not in this bill amend the law, so as to prevent that concealment?

I state these illustrations for the purpose of showing that what is proposed here is a mere detail; and the fact that the price, or cost, or valuation of the article is to be affected by the amendment which is proposed, does not at all take it out of the class of details for the collection of the revenue which I have described. Let us suppose that instead of fraudulent undervaluation, there was a fraudulent misstatement of weights or measures; that frauds were committed by passing off a hundred pounds of any given article, or a hundred gallons, under a fraudulent representation that there were fifty of either, could we not in this bill guard against frauds thus misrepresenting weights and measures? It is precisely in the same class with them.

I am, therefore, unable to see how it is that this constitutional question is supposed to arise here. Something has been said by the honorable Senator from Virginia about a parallel case which occurred in the year 1844. I can only say that if the Senate was constituted then as it is now—and I suppose it was very much the same thing then as now, and always will be—probably the interests or passions of the hour influenced the determination which was then arrived at, and that at least, with the lapse of time and the increase of human knowledge, we are quite as well prepared to decide a constitutional question to-day as the Senate of the United States was in 1844.

I have but one word to say to enforce the peculiar propriety of this provision as an amendment of the present bill. We are brought to the necessity of raising $15,000,000 by a loan. I think it has been demonstrated with great success, with triumphant success, by the honorable Senator from Rhode Island, that the passage of the provision he offers will save to the Treasury, in one year, one half of the whole amount which it is proposed to borrow. I have no doubt that will be the effect of it; and that, year after year, we shall save the same sum.

The honorable Senator from Virginia thinks that, on this side of the House, we misestimate the loss which the Treasury sustains by these frauds; that we ought to take into account the loss which occurs by smuggling. We must lose by smuggling so long as we maintain the system of indirect taxation; for smuggling has been incident, from the beginning of the world to this day, to every system of taxation on imports from foreign countries. But because we lose so much by smuggling, which we cannot prevent, is it necessary to enhance the loss perpetually by adding the loss sustained by fraudulent valuations?

The time, the place, the circumstance, everything, seems to commend this proposition to the acceptance of the Senate and of Congress; and, if there was any confirmation of the argument of the Senator from Rhode Island necessary, there is one circumstance to which he alluded, but did not fully enforce, and that is the fact that the importation of foreign merchandise in our great cities has fallen altogether, or nearly so, exclusively into the hands of foreigners; that they have control of the importations of foreign merchandise, by reason of the fact that they have skill in manipulating the invoices, so as to exclude our own citizens from this most important branch of commerce.

Mr. STUART. This, sir, is certainly a very important question in either aspect—one upon which I should have been very glad to submit some views myself; but I think it has been very fully elucidated by the Senators who have participated in the debate. I shall therefore refrain from going into any discussion here at all, in the hope that, in view of the shortness of the session, and the many important subjects which we have before us, which we are all anxious to dispose of, we may be able to get a vote on this question to-day. I make this suggestion with great respect to others, but in the earnest hope that we may dispose of this matter to-day.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Mr. President, if I understand the object and effect of this measure, it may be summed up in a very few words. It is to substitute a home valuation on dutiable articles for the foreign valuation on which we now assess the duties. That is the great object. The objection to it is, that in the first place, it is unconstitutional, that it conflicts with that provision of the Constitution which declares that bills for raising revenue shall originate in the other House. It seems to me that no just construction of these terms can exclude the Senate from the power of making any changes or alterations in the mode of collection, although the effect of those changes may be either to diminish or to enhance the revenue. Still they are different subjects of legislation. Nothing can be more distinct than the revenue which is collected, and the means or system which you employ for its collection. On one subject only are you inhibited, and that is, from originating a bill of revenue. We may originate a bill here altogether altering and changing the laws which constitute our system for the collection of the revenue. The revenue and the system of laws for its collection are distinct and separate things. We are only precluded from originating bills for raising revenue.

35TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Fifteen Million Loan—Home Valuation—Mr. Crittenden.

SENATE.

But can this provision offered by the Senator from Rhode Island be brought within the prohibition contained in that section—the prohibition upon the Senate? If a gentleman shall trace out the change in the mode of collection, and show that it would, by preventing frauds or otherwise, increase the amount of revenue, can he therefore on this construction turn around and say, "You cannot change the mode of collection; that is beyond your constitutional power?" By this sort of construction, how much power might be brought within the influence of this clause of the Constitution, and how might the force of the Senate upon many questions of legislation be withered and made entirely nugatory? Can you do nothing to increase the commerce of the country, to encourage industry, to increase its importations and its exportations, because thereby the revenue would be increased? Can you not change the mode of collection, or adopt any other means within your competency and the wisdom of the Senate to increase the revenue by increasing the subjects of commerce, the amount of importations and exportations? Why might not gentlemen, by the same sort of construction of the Constitution, bring all these subjects within the influence of this provision of the Constitution? Sir, where is the policy, where is the propriety of the Senate of the United States making this sort of construction, and then construing these constructions, and extending and widening out this prohibition as far as possible? Why should we be guilty of this species of industry merely for the purpose of circumscribing our powers?

It is the privilege of the House of Representatives, if we infract our duties and undertake to originate bills of revenue or bills that can be fairly considered as conflicting with their power of originating bills of revenue, to take the exception; but if we add all the exceptions which may be taken here to serve a particular purpose on a particular occasion, and the House of Representatives sets up pretensions there, between the parliamentary doctrines which may be urged here on a particular occasion and the pretensions which may be got up in the popular branch of the Legislature, what is to become of the power of the Senate? Sir, I will give to this provision of the Constitution as strictly fair and as fairly strict construction as I can; but, by mere construction, I will not divest the Senate even of a doubtful and questionable power. If it is a doubtful one, there is no necessity for us to surrender it at discretion—make a voluntary surrender. If the House of Representatives can find in it any encroachment on their privileges, let them make the objection, let them take the exception. I do not think there is any fair ground of exception here or there; but if there was any constitutional question presented now to the Senate and involved in this amendment, I confess my surprise that it is attempted to reduce that question to a mere question of order. Questions of order are generally summarily decided. They relate merely to the proceedings of the Senate. When was it thought of before that upon every bill which might be introduced here, a question of order may be made and the Presiding Officer called upon to decide that point of order, involving, in that very decision, whether it is constitutional or not? Suppose you were to put the question of order, which is still persisted in: sir, how would you put it? "The question is: is this amendment constitutional or not?" When was such a question ever heard of as being put otherwise than when you come to vote upon the passage of a bill, from one stage to another, or upon its final passage? That is the solemn decision which every constitutional question must have. Suppose, upon putting it in that way, a majority could be found in the Senate to decide that it was a question of order, whether a bill, or any particular provision of a bill, was constitutional. The Senate, then, having settled the question, when the next bill comes forward and the same point is raised, who is to settle it? It has been already determined that it is a question of order; then it devolves on the President of this body to decide; and although, in the first instance, it being a new question, it is referred to the body to decide it, yet, if it be a question of order, it is the business of whoever occupies your chair to settle it, and if that question should again occur to-day on another bill, is it to be continually referred to the Senate? Questions of order are a proper subject of decision by the Presiding Officer. If this is decided to be a legitimate course of proceeding, the gentleman who occupies the chair must decide it in the next case, and the next. To be sure, there is a right of appeal; but this summary decision is on the most important question we can have in our legislation. It is no question of order; it is a solemn decision to be made upon the final disposition the Senate makes of any question submitted to it, and cannot be brought within the range of that summary authority which is to be exercised by the Presiding Officer. Questions of order are hastily sprung; and should be decided summarily and promptly, in order that business may proceed; and if this summary jurisdiction of the Chair is to be extended to embrace all constitutional questions, we shall be eternally debating abstract questions, whether a bill is constitutional or not; and then, when we come finally to act upon it, every Senator will vote according to his own final judgment and opinion. What do we gain by deciding that it is unconstitutional? Nothing at all. It is a question of a much more important and serious character.

But, sir, I have said more than I intended on this subject, and I shall detain the Senate but a short time longer. I agree with my honorable friend from Georgia in every position he has taken in regard to the merits of this amendment, and I feel gratified at having his concurrence in these provisions. A home valuation is the only fair and safe one. To say that we cannot have one that will be fair under our Constitution, is to suppose our Constitution a failure. There is nothing in the Constitution to intimate that we are to look to a foreign country to furnish us with the means of making up that uniform value to which taxation is to be applied throughout the United States, upon all imported goods. It is to be uniform; no preference is to be given. Why cannot we tax that uniform value here? There is no reason why we cannot. It may be more difficult, but that does not show that it cannot be done. It may be more easy, and I think it is. If fairness is one of the objects to be attained by valuation, if prevention of fraud is to be an object, undoubtedly it is the best means of countervailing fraud. Every Secretary of the Treasury who has spoken on this subject tells you that the foreign valuation is the source of frauds, to a vast extent, upon the revenue of the country. We know it. The gentleman from Georgia has demonstrated that from fifty to one hundred million dollars of the goods imported into this country are left out in the valuation to which we apply our taxes. Shall we not, then, in the face of this state of things, endeavor to counteract this great evil—a fraud upon our Treasury, a fraud upon every fair competitor in carrying on the commerce of the United States, a fraud upon the people to whom these goods are sold for the same prices as if they had paid the duty? It is nothing but a fraud in all its characteristics and in all its operations. It is a fraud upon the industry of your country; it is a fraud upon every man engaged in the production of the same articles here, thus cheapening the products of his labor.

The effect of this measure, I presume, will be, of course, to enhance the aggregate of duties which we are to collect; but still the rate of taxation is the same. It is only an enforcement, and a fair and thorough enforcement, of the laws which now exist. Suppose we were to look for analogies to what occurs in our States; I will take the State of Kentucky, for instance. A great deal of live stock is imported from Europe into the United States. Suppose a gentleman who is applied to by the tax-gatherer, in Kentucky, where taxes are paid according to the value of the property, was to say: "Now, sir, make up the value by taking the price of this animal in England; I got him on board the vessel for so much, and that is all I will pay taxes on." He would be answered: "That is not the rule we apply." We find out the home valuation, and, if he does not value his animal at a proper price, the tax-collector does, and he pays it. That, in its simplest form, is the justice of the case, and that is the proper rule for taxation. A home valuation only applies the principle, in that simple case, to this more complex one—that is all.

These frauds affect our revenue. They affect the industry of our country. I want to give that industry every advancement I can, and set our people to work. Labor is the source of all value—of all property. Why has not your commerce increased? Why has it not revived according to the calculations of the Secretary of the Treasury? Because that labor which is productive, that labor which consumes, has been paralyzed, and is not able to sustain itself as it used to do; is not able to purchase as much. That must be one of the causes. Money is abundant in the country; we have a great many wealthy men able to buy; but yet the demand for foreign goods is diminished, and continues at a lower rate than has been estimated by all calculators on the subject. Why? Because that great fund, amounting to millions and hundreds of millions, the product of the labor of the laboring men of the country, has been paralyzed, and they are yet unrewarded for their labor to such an extent as to enable them to be the consumers of goods. That far the demand is diminished; and that far, of course, the supply is diminished. I venture to say that the commerce of the country will increase just exactly in proportion as you set the wages of the laboring class of our countrymen everywhere increase; I do not mean mere mechanical labor, but agricultural labor and every sort of labor. When that comes to its reward, when that is fairly remunerated, the parties remunerated will be able to purchase foreign goods, and then commerce will supply them, and then commerce will revive.

Now, sir, we must set the hand of industry into activity. We have the means of doing it abundantly, as I am induced to believe by my friend from Rhode Island, who is my pilot on this subject. Any fair and just revenue, collected with proper discrimination upon foreign goods for the supply of the Treasury, will furnish, by fair, incidental operation, all the protection which the labor of this country now wants. It will set the men of Pennsylvania to work; her hills and her valleys will pour forth their treasures of coal and of iron, and the labor of the country everywhere will rise up and enrich and strengthen our land. That is our great resource. That is the great source from which our strength and our greatness are to come. Yet we find the Government admitting and tolerating these frauds in our foreign commerce, thus checking the hand of industry; checking the progress which, as a nation, we ought to be making in all that relates to the development of the natural resources of our own country and our own labor. Sir, I want to see something done in this direction. I think we can do it without offense to any, without offending any principle that has ever been announced, North or South, to our own general and universal benefit.

I agree with my friend from Georgia, that the expenditures of this Government ought to be, and must be, diminished. Instead of that, they have increased, and are increasing. Another thing must be done. Public prodigality, public extravagance, is public profligacy—they are one and the same thing. If we want to preserve our Government, if we want to protect ourselves against exorbitant impositions and taxations, we must put a stop to this. The honorable Senator from Tennessee [Mr. Johnson] said, the other day, that our expenses had become enormous; that they were increasing; that they ought to be diminished; that they were leading to corruption, and making this Government one of the most corrupt in the world; that he would reiterate these declarations and these lessons in the ears of his countrymen on all occasions. I hope he will go on to do so.

It is within the recollection of every gentleman here that a great outcry was made against Mr. Adams's administration, but a short while ago, for expending, upon an average, thirteen million or fourteen million dollars a year to carry on this Government; but under a Democratic rule almost ever since, Democracy has increased the expenses of this Government from thirteen million dollars until they are now over seventy million dollars, which is the least sum computed as necessary for the annual expenses of this Government. In this last year you have spent, as has been shown, if there is any truth in arithmetic, $37,000,000 more than your revenue of $48,000,000—I speak in general numbers, not exactly according to the figures. We are approaching another year, and before we set our feet upon the threshold of that coming year, before its first hour has come, we are met by a demand for a loan of $15,000,000 to commence with; and when a proposition is made to accompany it which has the effect of increasing the revenue, the Senator from Virginia denounces it as raising revenue contrary to the provisions of the Constitution, which forbid us to originate a bill for raising revenue. Sir, ought we not to begin to look about and see how we are to redeem the debts that we are contracting so rapidly? When the first loan of $20,000,000 was applied for, at the beginning of the session, I thought and said then that we should accompany the measure for incurring the debt with some measure for its redemption. That was not listened to. You have come again, at the same session, for another loan; and yet a feeble hope is expressed that our revenue need not be increased—that it will increase itself when commerce revives. The Senator from Georgia tells you that he never estimated that your present revenue law would produce you more than fifty millions. How are you, out of that $50,000,000, to pay the current expenses of the Government and accumulate a fund to pay off the debts you have contracted? We are dreaming, sir. These calculations are such stuff as dreams are made of, and nothing better. We sit down idly, and borrow and borrow money from day to day—two loans in one session, and they only to provide for six months. The times are such that no calculation can be made for distant periods. Our Secretary does not venture upon them, wisely and prudently enough. We are like a man borrowing money to go to market every day, hawking about our credit from one year's end to another to raise money to defray the ordinary expenses of the Government; and yet those who manage the affairs of the Treasury turn a deaf ear to every proposition for increasing our revenue for the purpose of meeting these extraordinary demands.

Sir, has it not been demonstrated, and is it not demonstrable that in the next year you will require $100,000,000 to defray the expenses of the Government, and pay off the $20,000,000 you have borrowed? The Government has estimated for over seventy millions. That will be increased. The current expenses of the next year, according to appropriations, and according to estimates, will not be less than eighty million dollars. The $20,000,000 of Treasury notes to be redeemed, will make $100,000,000 to be met; and in the face of these circumstances, gentlemen put aside the disagreeable necessity of making provision for payment, by saying trade will revive, and the revenue will enable us to go on in our course of expenditure, and give us a fund to pay all these debts. I do not believe any such thing; but I think the fair, honest, and bold way is at once to face the difficulty. It is idle to blame the past for what has been done. What has been done, has been done. We are in debt. We want $100,000,000 next year, and we are relying upon a revenue that will bring $50,000,000. That is not provident or wise, I think; and I vote for the amendment, because, though it is not, in the sense of the Constitution, a revenue bill, yet by a better means of collection and valuation which it applies, it makes the same rate of taxation more productive. Though it does no more than affect the system of collection, and therefore steers clear of the Constitution, which says that bills for revenue shall not originate in the Senate, I vote for it because it prevents cheating; and because, by preventing cheating, it makes the amount of duty larger on foreign goods, increases their value, and to that extent affords an encouragement to the labor of our own country. I look to that also.

Sir, I do not know that any application has been made to us to increase the revenues of the country in anticipation of a war with England. If the accounts we have received of wrongs and insults committed on the commerce of the country, in the Gulf of Mexico, by British cruisers, be true, I think we ought to be prepared and ready to resist them to extremity, and the utmost extremity, of honorable warfare. I am of no belligerent temper; I want the peace of the world and the peace of nations preserved; but I do not want to see it preserved if it can only be preserved at the sacrifice of the rights and honor of this country. I consider it a great aggravation of these wrongs, a great aggravation of the insults, that they are committed in our own face, as it were, right on our own coast. If these wrongs be vindicated, and be avowed and justified by England, I see no peaceful escape for us but in pusillanimity and disgrace. I would no longer dispute with England about any error of her abstract doctrine as to the right of search or right of visitation. The war of words is over; the argument is exhausted. I care not what title she pleases to give to the principle she contends for; I care not from what ancient records, or what ancient pretensions she derives it. She may indulge her own theory, and pride herself in her own pretensions as long as she pleases; but the moment she, under color of them, or under any other color, commits an act of aggression on our rights, an aggression on our honor, I will fight her with effect. She may have the argument on the principle; I make no war on that; I leave her to distinguish between the principle which she will not renounce, and the act which she cannot justify. I will not quarrel with her about the principle, or her laws and rights on the sea, though we have our own notions about them. Our vessels engaged in lawful commerce on the seas are not to be called and stopped on their way. The summons of the British cannon shall not make one of them change her course, and command her to give an account of herself. No, sir; that is a state of degradation and disgrace to which I will not see my countrymen reduced, if it can be prevented by any extremity of war. I am ready for it whenever that necessity shall come. I want to raise up no belligerent feeling in the country. My policy, like my feelings, is all for the preservation of the peace and harmony of the world, as most advantageous to its liberties, and most advantageous to the prosperity and advancement of mankind; but war is not the worst thing in the world. The silent submission to wrong, or puling about it awhile until it is forgotten, and then letting it pass—that is not the way in which this brave nation should act. No, sir; her honor, her character, her rights as a people, must not be allowed to be violated with impunity. I will vote, then, with my honorable friend from Georgia on that point, when that time shall come. I hope that time is far distant. I believe the British Government will disavow the act, and will give us atonement, as we have a right to expect, and that she will make all the atonement which the honor and rights of the United States of America require. I believe she will do it. I cannot think it possible that she will justify the aggressive and offensive attack that has been pursued by her cruisers in the Gulf of Mexico in all these cases.

I am happy to agree with my friend from Rhode Island, and my friend from Georgia, as with all those who have spoken upon the subject who have spoken in favor of this amendment, and with some of those who are not in favor of it. I have not usually been so exceedingly cautious, perhaps, as I ought to be in regard to the expenditures. I have been willing to trust the Administration—every Administration. Constitutionally they have, to some extent, a claim upon our confidence. Personally I am willing to give it. Then, again, there is the risk of necessity. Those who have the machine in their hands, those who manage it, and those who work it, say it must stop unless you give so much money. I say it is prodigal to demand so much money; that you have abused the public confidence, and wasted the public money; but still the machine must not stop, and I must give the money.

Sir, you talk about reform. The White House is the center from which all economy and all reforms must proceed. As long as that great head of the Government shall abstain from applying himself to the work of reform we cannot do it. What do I know about the estimates that the Government send to me here? What do my brother Senators know about these estimates in any sense whatever? Very little; very little indeed.

I have reason to believe that everything this Government wants to purchase costs them an enormous price—not for want of fairness in the administration of our Government, but on account of the men who come around them and make these contracts, and they have to pay the highest price for everything. There can be no economy unless it begins there. You can have no system of economy unless it comes from there. You will have bills for deficiencies, you will have extravagances and money badly laid out, unless you can get a system of economy which shall proceed from the executive officers who control and manage the disbursements. We may stop the wheels of Government by refusing to allow them money, but that is a dreadful remedy—a remedy worse than the disease. You submit to the disease rather than make the fearful experiment of stopping the Government, and yet you cannot, for the soul of you, make those estimates and make those calculations which would enable us to see what is the minimum sum for which this Government can be respectably administered. You can know it only by historic fact. You know that twenty-five or thirty years ago the Government was administered for thirteen or fourteen million dollars. You know that during the Mexican war it was administered, with all the war expenses, at $48,000,000. You see the annual expenditures now, in time of peace, without extraordinary causes, increased to seventy-five or eighty million dollars. You see the estimates for the next year, when all those extraordinary causes have passed away, and what are to be our expenditures next year? Eighty million dollars for current expenses, and $20,000,000 added for sums anticipated by loans and by Treasury notes, making, altogether, $100,000,000.

I agree that the progress of the expenses of this Government has been frightful; that it calls upon us by every consideration to apply ourselves, by all means in our power, to correct this great and growing and destructive evil. But, I say again, the people of the United States must go to the Executive Departments for any effective system of reform to be shortly applied. My friend from Georgia, I fear—though I am willing to see that experiment made—cannot bring down the expenses of this Government simply by saying “I will vote no more than $50,000,000.” It is enough. God knows it is enough. Still, you will be pressed with these evils of extravagance, and these deficiency bills. That is what I am afraid of—that they would be encouraged to make contracts imposing obligations upon us. I doubt whether we can do it in that way, or in any other, unless the President of the United States, now when his attention is called to this great and growing and overwhelming evil, shall apply himself to one of his greatest and highest constitutional duties—to enforce the administration of every department of the Government to the strictest accountability.

Sir, we may find extravagances, useless expenditure, here in the Senate of the United States. I have no doubt of it. The expenses of the judiciary department have increased in a most extraordinary and unexampled manner. So it is in every department of the Government. Everywhere there can be means found for retrenchment. None can do it so well as the Executive Departments, each for itself. The President, presiding over all, can alone give the impulse to the correction of this evil, or save us from evils untold that are yet to come if we go on in this way. If twenty or thirty years have advanced our expenditures from $14,000,000 to $75,000,000 a year, what will they be in twenty-five years more? The enormity of them is frightful. We must stop. We have not the means of going on in this course of extravagance. Let us do this while we can. Let us raise this little protection. Let us cure these frauds that are practiced upon our revenue, small as they may appear to be. We cannot originate a bill in the Senate for raising revenue, I acknowledge. If we could, I should deem it the bounden duty of the chairman of the Committee on Finance to introduce a bill instantly upon that subject; but I hear of no such thing anywhere. Borrowing money is an easy mode of obtaining it; but to think of collecting and getting together means to pay debts, is a more disagreeable obligation, a more disagreeable duty in respect to individuals, as well as to States. That is the disagreeable part. To borrow is easy, almost as easy as it is to beg, and pretty nearly as bad. Borrowing is rather superlative, and begging the positive. That is about the whole of it. I do not say that it is unwise under the circumstances to borrow. I say it is wise; but to borrow $35,000,000 in one year, I confess astonishes me.

I hope, Mr. President, that the amendment of my friend from Rhode Island will be adopted. If adopted, I may vote even for this bill, because I do not know how to avoid it; but it is not as a matter of volition, not as a matter of judgment, but as a matter of necessity, that I shall vote for it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. FOSTER.) The bill authorizing a loan not exceeding the sum of $15,000,000 is before the Senate, to which bill the Senator from Rhode Island moved an amendment, to which amendment the Senator from Virginia took exception, making a point of order that the amendment cannot be received in consequence of a constitutional inhibition.

Mr. STUART. I desire to appeal to the Senator from Virginia to waive that preliminary question. The same result will be arrived at on a vote. I confess I should prefer that course. I hope he will agree to it.

Mr. HUNTER. I will do so if the Senate are ready to vote, so that we may have one vote instead of two. ["Question! question!"]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. DAVIS. The closing remarks of the Senator from Kentucky impose upon me very reluctantly the necessity of making some reply. In the same breath he argues for economy, and for an increase of the revenues of the country. Blowing hot and cold he proposes to increase the duty upon imports, in order that he may reduce the expenditures of the Government. If his purpose were economy, it would seem that he would take the other direction, that he should seek rather to depress than increase the revenues of the country, known to fill the Treasury to overflowing whenever our commerce is in a prosperous state. It is temporarily checked by the revulsion which has met our commerce at home and abroad; but that constitutes no rule which is applicable for any longer period of time to come.

Then the Senator says that we are to look to the White House for all retrenchment and reform and progress in economy. Now, to take a supposable case: if the honorable Senator were in the White House, what power would he have to take one dollar out of the Treasury? None, sir. Money can only be drawn from the Treasury by appropriations of Congress. What power would he have to impress upon Congress retrenchment and the reduction of expenditure? None, save the veto power, and that has been exercised against his vote for expenditure, time and again. Whatever be the motive of economy, it is as operative on the position of a Senator here, as upon the Executive in the White House. The Senator who votes large appropriations here, and seldom votes against them, is hardly the man to demand to be selected to resist those appropriations, if he should be transferred to another sphere.

But, with a view to make a lick at what he pleased to call the Democratic rule of the country, he alluded to the very low expenditures which existed in Mr. Adams's time, and the heavy expenditures which have been incurred since. But the Senator had a more intimate connection with an Administration of a more recent date. Why did he not take that, when the expenses rose steadily until the obligations incurred in the last year of that Administration went over $44,000,000, $46,000,000, $50,000,000? There has been a necessary increase of the expenditures of the Government, and some of it has been unnecessary; but the responsibility rests not upon the executive department only; it begins here. It is not, as argued, the result of the estimates which are sent to Congress. Those estimates are the result of the laws you make. If you desire to reduce the expenditures of the country, legislate upon the object of those expenditures. Change the service, and then the expenditure goes down at once. If you insist upon maintaining the service in any particular form, it belongs then to the executive officers of the Government to estimate for the money that will effect the service which the legislation of the country requires.

This is the place to begin retrenchment—the Congress of the United States. Much more frequently have I seen recommendations from Executive Departments to change the service so as to promote economy, than I have seen votes in Congress to sustain the recommendations. Spasmodic exhibitions of an economical desire are frequently brought forth in both Houses of Congress; but the votes upon the great appropriation bills, the objects of the expenditure to which the estimates are made, I have seldom seen.

What shall we gain, sir, by refusing a carefully prepared statement of the Secretary of the Treasury, sustained by the Finance Committee, for a loan? Do you reduce the expenditures by refusing a loan? If they need the money to execute the service imposed upon them, the necessary consequence is one of two: either that the service fails, or that they run in debt and come back with a deficiency bill. I prefer to meet questions face to face. Let reform begin here, by changing the objects of expenditure. Let it be in a direct manner; then cut down the estimates to correspond to the service to be rendered; and then appropriate according to your reduced estimates. It is worse than idle to say I will withhold this or that sum contained in an estimate, and yet require the service to be performed.

Mr. BELL. Will the honorable Senator allow me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. DAVIS. Certainly.

Mr. BELL. I see, by the tenor of the Senator's remarks, that it is impossible for this debate to be closed to-night until a late hour.

Mr. DAVIS. I can close mine. You may go on if you please.

Mr. BELL. That is not my object. Will the Senator allow me—

Mr. DAVIS. To do what?

Mr. BELL. I think, from the position the honorable Senator has assumed here, that economy must commence in Congress, not depending on the will or policy of the Executive, that he will be obliged to extend his remarks to a considerable extent in order to support his position; and I trust he will give way to a motion to adjourn now, after the remarks he has already made. ["No! no!"]

Mr. DAVIS. I will merely say that the position—

Mr. BELL. I do not propose, if the honorable Senator will permit me, to speak against the will of the Senate; but I should feel compelled, on a measure of this importance brought to the notice of the Senate only yesterday, that it should not be concluded under such circumstances without further investigation.

Mr. DAVIS. I have nothing to do with forcing a vote. It is very little that I intend to say, and if I stop now, I shall never add anything to what I have said.

Mr. BELL. Very well; I only made the suggestion. I see there is a very great anxiety to get a vote.

Mr. DAVIS. I thank the Senator from Tennessee; but I have no extended speech to make. The little I have to say I prefer to say now.

The Senator misunderstood me in supposing I said economy was not at all affected by the Executive Departments. Both are responsible; and that man of so long experience and such demonstrative capacity, Mr. Calhoun, once said on the floor of this Chamber that it was not to be done here, it was not to be done in the executive department alone, but in the two co-operating together. A judicious expenditure of the money appropriated, and estimates for no more than is absolutely required, belong to the Executive. The objects of expenditure and the money granted belong to Congress. Would you hold a Secretary or a President responsible for large expenditures for internal improvements, where both are opposed to them—the one giving his vetoes on bills for such purposes, and the other charged with the disbursement of money found in his hands appropriated by Congress? If so, it would be vastly unjust. But if he squandered the money in his hands, if he applied it to other purposes than those contemplated by legislation, then, I say, he would be responsible. Then you might charge him with wastefulness, with improvidence, with malfeasance; but the just application of the appropriation made to the object for which it was made, is the duty of the Executive.

Then, again, your deficiency bills show you conclusively, I think, that the estimates are made at the lowest possible figure to execute the work. Those estimates from exports, I may say, are very frequently cut down after they are brought in to the officer who has closely examined the subject, under some hope that a change in your administration will reduce the expenses. At last some contingency arises, and a deficiency occurs. If you lay your hand upon an occasion where an executive officer himself departed from a just and wise course of administration, and thus created a deficiency, there you arraign neither the man's head nor his motive; but executive officers, no more than ourselves, are prophets. When this session began, we found in progress a campaign against the Mormons, in the Territory of Utah. I had not the foresight that enabled me to tell what would be the result. I have not now, notwithstanding the rumors which are flying through the air. I doubt if there be a great deal of truth in them. I think there is reason to hope that there will be no conflict of arms; but, as I said on a former occasion, that does not vary much the service or the expenditure; that, to preserve order in that country by military force, if that be the policy, will require nearly as much money without conflict as with it.

The Senator from Georgia [Mr. TOOMBS] did injustice to the Committee on Military Affairs. He spoke of a proposition to raise five regiments being a recommendation, at the beginning of the session, from the executive officer in charge of the War Department; and he spoke of the Committee on Military Affairs as bringing in about the same thing. It was not the same thing.

Mr. TOOMBS. It was for the same number of men.

Mr. DAVIS. No, sir; it was not for the same number of men.

Mr. TOOMBS. My impression was that it proposed an equal, if not a greater number.

Mr. DAVIS. Then I am sure the Senator will not object to being corrected. It was to make each regiment consist of twelve companies; that is, fifteen regiments were to be increased by an addition of two companies; that is, thirty companies, or three regiments of ten companies each.

Mr. TOOMBS. Then there was another section to carry up the number of each company to ninety-six.

Mr. DAVIS. It was to increase the maximum of each company under certain circumstances.

Mr. TOOMBS. I think that carried it further than the five regiments, and it exceeded the demand of the Department for men. I should be glad to be corrected if I am in error.

Mr. DAVIS. That was never put to a vote. My recollection is that it was withdrawn by the committee.

Mr. TOOMBS. I spoke of the report of the committee.

Mr. DAVIS. Thirty companies were all that it was proposed to add; and it was proposed to add them with a view to the service then pressing upon us, without any possibility, on the part of the committee, to foresee when that necessity would cease. Since that time, however, the Congress has been pleased to add three regiments, one of mounted men and two of infantry, it seems, though all might be mounted. The addition proposed would have just been equal to three regiments of rank and file. One of them would have been mounted and two of them necessarily on foot; whereas now, it is a matter of discretion with the executive department. But then all the field officers and staff were added to the bill which Congress chose to prefer to that reported by the committee, and the expense was increased for an organization of the same character of troops. It was a bad stroke of economy. It increased the higher officers, it increased the staff, and it gave the same number of effective men.

As to the number of troops that are necessary, it is an endless question. It is a thing, at last, which is a matter of speculation. Men will differ, from the different points in which they view it. I should be very glad, indeed, were I to see arise a spirit in Congress that sought to draw in the small posts they have thrown out beyond the reach of civilization, concentrate them in large garrisons, and thus have a service by which great economy can be obtained. More efficiency, and a vast saving of money, would be the result of that policy. Thus far, exactly the reverse has been the case. It is Congress that has driven the Executive to that dispersion of military force; so much so that I doubt very much indeed the prudence or propriety of any executive officer undertaking to change the whole system of the disposition of military force, without first having an expression from Congress in relation to it.

I am, Mr. President, opposed to the amendment. I think the question of order was fairly raised. I understand that is withdrawn. Being withdrawn, I have nothing to say upon it. I am opposed to the amendment for a few reasons, which I will attempt, very briefly, to give. The home valuation is to make the goods worth different prices in different parts of the United States. It is to give the advantage of one port over another. It is to aid the centralizing power of commerce—as centralizing as the exterior pressure—to bring the whole trade into one great metropolis, and, from that, to allow it to radiate to the smaller towns. Paying less duty in New York, and charged with no additional duty when sending from New York to other ports, there would be a direct interest to the importer to bring his goods into New York, and then send them to other ports of the United States.

Mr. SEWARD. The amendment proposes a valuation at the city of New York, in all cases.

Mr. DAVIS. How can you establish a valuation in New York, when you add to the foreign value of the goods the freight and charges at San Francisco? How are you to know the value of those goods in New York? How can you possibly do that? It would be unequal in its operation. Still more, sir, would it throw wide and open the gate to fraud. Constantly it has been assumed that this was a measure to check fraud; and how? You have appraisers now; and the appraisers and the invoice are checks upon each other. Then you abandon the invoice, and rely on the appraiser alone. If a man be ignorant or corrupt, you turn him loose to every species of corruption, and to every possible degree of avarice. Now, it is a part of the appraiser's duty to examine the invoice, and examine the goods, and if they be below value in his judgment, then the importer is subject, in one case, to an increased charge, and in another, to a forfeiture of the goods for a fraud. Are you to get better men by changing the law? Are you to change the mode of appointment? Are you to secure experts under one system and not have them under another? I take it for granted that the appraisers will not be improved. It is upon your appraisers now you are compelled to rely. You have appraisers who pass from point to point. You have such officers now. They might seek thus to render uniform the duties and valuations. That it is their duty to perform now. Now you have the invoice of the foreign value. Then you could have the inspection of the goods and the invoice also. You can resort to the inspection now, whenever you choose. The appraisers have all the power now they would have then. They have less temptation to fraud now than they would have under a change of the system. I rely upon the maxim of Mr. Jefferson: trust nothing to man; fetter him in the chains of the law. The present law is more restrictive; your appraisers are now more confined to the performance of their duty with integrity, than they would be if you abandoned the present system, and left the appraisers to fix the home valuation. Home valuation is another mode of discriminating between the less favored ports of the Union. Home valuation is but another mode by which we are proposing now to increase the commerce of cities; and home valuation, instead of being the means by which we would get rid of fraud, according to my judgment, would render us more liable to fraud, and it would increase the number of our custom-house officers, now swollen beyond the limits I am willing to bear. These are my opinions.

Mr. BELL. I have been looking through this question, Mr. President, and the proposition which I supposed would come from the Executive for an increased means of carrying on the Government in the present fiscal year as a test of what we might expect as to the future policy and destiny of this country. Here is a proposition to increase the debt of the country for the present fiscal year in a time of profound peace; and this is acknowledged by the chairman of the Committee on Finance, who represents the views of the Government of the country, as an inevitable necessity, that the Government cannot be carried on without this additional supply. I remember that when the proposition was made to issue $20,000,000 of Treasury notes, it was stated that that was contemplated as a temporary relief—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is too much disturbance in the Chamber.

Mr. BELL. I am very well aware, sir, that I am speaking against the sense and wishes of a large majority of the Senate, and even of many of those whom I should expect to listen to me. But I was proceeding to state that I consider this as a great test question—

Mr. DOUGLAS. Will the Senator from Tennessee yield?

Mr. BELL. I do not; and yet I think it will be in vain to attempt to proceed, from the temper manifested all around, with which I am utterly astonished.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I think it is the desire of the Senate to adjourn.

Mr. BELL. I wish to say that I do not mean that this question shall pass away until I have an opportunity at least of invoking the Senate to a more serious consideration of the importance of the question which is pending, and what the consequences of it will be when it is announced to the country under all the circumstances of the case.

Mr. MALLORY. Will my friend from Tennessee allow me to say a word?

Mr. BELL. With great pleasure.

Mr. MALLORY. It is very evident that we cannot get through to-night. It is now close upon six o'clock; and I therefore move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. BELL. I am very happy to yield for that purpose.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

SPEECH OF HON. HENRY M. SHAW,
OF NORTH CAROLINA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

May 31, 1853.

The House being in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. SHAW said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I am very reluctant in obtruding myself on the attention of the committee at this late period of the session, particularly on a question that is not immediately before the committee. But I feel that the provocation under which I now speak must be a sufficient apology, in the estimation of every gentleman in this House.

It will be recollected, perhaps, by some gentlemen present, that some time since I addressed the committee on the question of the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution. I think I can appeal to you, Mr. Chairman, and to every gentleman who heard me on that occasion, in proof of the declaration I now make, that, from the beginning to the end of that speech, I treated my colleague from the fifth congressional district of North Carolina, [Mr. GILMER,] to whom I then replied, with the utmost courtesy. What, sir, has been the course of my colleague?

Mr. GILMER. Will my friend allow me to ask him a question right there? I want to know why my colleague represents me in his speech as being opposed to the admission of Kansas as a slave State—using the words, “otherwise as a slave State?”

Mr. SHAW, of North Carolina. I will answer the gentleman on that point, before I resume my seat, as I should have done if he had not called my attention to the subject.

I ask again, what has been the course of the gentleman towards myself? Why, sir, on the evening of Saturday week, my colleague came into this Hall after I had left it, (having been here many hours,) and announced that it was his intention to address the committee in reply to me; but, with an affectation of generosity, of liberality, and of magnanimity, which I believe never found a lodgment in his heart, he pretended that he could not do so because I was not present. Sir, if the gentleman had desired me to be present when he made his speech, it would have been a small tax upon him to have indicated the fact to me. On the following Monday evening, after the House had resolved itself into Committee of the Whole for general debate, it being understood that no business was to be done, having seen my colleague take his hat and leave the Hall, and being wearied and exhausted by a continuous session of seven or eight hours, I followed his example, and retired to my hotel. He returned and made the assault upon me, to which it is now my purpose to reply.

It was not till the next morning that I saw it reported in the Globe that he had given notice on the previous Saturday night of his intention to reply to me, and this was the first intimation I had of his design. I repeat, if he had had a desire, or the least disposition, to have me present when he made that reply, why did he not state it to me, so that I could have been present? But, sir, while professing regret on account of my absence on that occasion, he went so far as to say that in making the speech which I did the 20th day of April, I had studiously and intentionally waited till he had gone to North Carolina—and for what? In order that I might take advantage of his absence to do him injustice. Now, sir, I tell the gentleman, what I believe he feels and knows, that there is nothing about him, physically or intellectually, that I fear, and nothing that should have caused me to desire his absence when I spoke.

For a considerable time after the publication of his speech, whenever the House went into Committee of the Whole, it was for the consideration of a special order, which, as you are aware, and as my colleague, I presume, knows, excludes general debate, so that, as many of my friends know, I was unable to obtain the floor for the purpose I had in view, until the time I made my reply. But my colleague says that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LETCHER] obtained the floor soon after he made his speech, and replied to a portion of it. That is very true; but my colleague knows it occurred before his speech was printed, and I was unwilling to reply to him until I had seen his speech in print, for I was determined to do him no injustice.

My colleague saw fit to apply to me injurious terms and offensive epithets. I shall not enter into any such contest with him; he is a proficient in an accomplishment which my tastes never led me to cultivate. If I have a personal grievance to redress I will seek a proper opportunity to do it, and a more appropriate arena than this Hall. Moreover, when my colleague was called to account for the offensive language which he applied to me, he declared that he did not intend to be personally offensive; and yet, sir, he suffered his speech to go into the Congressional Globe, the official paper of this House, without any correction or qualification of the offensive terms! Was that fair, was it manly, was it just? Mr. Chairman, I will not undertake here properly to characterize such an act; but I will undertake to say that whenever I make a speech upon this floor and pronounce another, made by any colleague of mine, or any one else, to be unjust and untrue, prevaricating, and unworthy the gentleman who made it, I never will go out of this Hall and say that I did not mean to be personally offensive. Never, sir! And if, in the heat of debate and the excitement of discussion, I should use language toward a gentleman which upon cool reflection I was forced to consider unjust to him, never would I be found guilty of the injustice, the gross injustice to him, the injustice to myself, of sending that speech abroad to the world without retraction or qualification. And yet, sir, with all his prating about fairness and justice, that is what my colleague did, after having made the retraction to which I have alluded, and made it in his own hand-writing, and over his own signature!

Personal Explanation—Mr. Shaw.

Sir, the gentleman has applied to me a number of anecdotes by way of disparagement and ridicule. This, too, is a favorite mode of warfare with my colleague. Where a lawyer or a statesman would use an argument, my colleague applies an anecdote; one gentleman on the other side was so deeply impressed with his ability in that way that he declared, (as I was informed,) during the delivery of my colleague's first speech, that he was "as good as a comic almanac." He has already acquired for himself the soubriquet of the "funny Representative from North Carolina," and is fairly entitled to that of "the little joker." Let my colleague cultivate his talent and increase his fund of anecdote, and he may look forward with confidence to the time when he will be able to obtain an engagement as chief buffoon in some strolling circus. But, sir, I shall not follow his example in this regard either; if, however, my tastes and my sense of propriety led me to do so, instead of treating this enlightened assemblage of the people's Representatives to the stale anecdotes and coarse jokes which my colleague has indulged in, I would procure a copy of Joe Miller and read from its pages such as would be vastly more amusing, though a hundred times repeated, than any that my colleague has so far entertained the committee with.

Now, sir, my colleague charges against me that I took the ground in my speech, that he voted in favor of the Green amendment, which was attached to the Senate bill when it came to this House, while I, at the same time, was found advocating the views of the Executive in regard to the principle of that amendment. He goes on further, and denies that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUITMAN] moved to strike out that amendment. He denies that I voted to strike it out. He denies emphatically that he voted against striking it out. Now, sir, what are the facts? First, does the Green amendment embody the doctrine which my colleague says is contained in the special message of the Executive? Does that amendment declare, as I understand the President to have said in his message, that the people of Kansas would have a right to alter and amend their constitution after they had been admitted into the Confederacy, without regard to the restrictions contained in that instrument itself? I ask the House if the Green amendment embodies that doctrine? I say it does not. The most that can be said of the first branch of the proposition contained in the Green amendment is, that it is a negative pregnant; while the second branch absolutely and unqualifiedly asserts that the Congress of the United States has no right to declare the construction of the constitution of a State. But have I sustained, in any speech which I have made, here or elsewhere, the views of the President of the United States in regard to this particular doctrine? My colleague cannot show it in my speech. It is true that I commended that special message, as it had been commended throughout the length and breadth of the country by the conservative and patriotic throughout the land. I approved of the general principles there set forth; but I did not approve, and I take occasion to say here that I do not now approve, the doctrine that the people can alter or amend their constitution without regard to the restrictions contained in the instrument itself.

But suppose the Green amendment had contained that doctrine: how can my colleague object to it? Does it lie in his mouth to get up here or elsewhere and condemn it? And here let me say that my colleague has brought another charge of injustice against me on account of the reference which I made to his position in the Legislature of North Carolina, in relation to a similar question. Now, what was the position of my colleague as a Senator of the State Legislature of North Carolina? It is well known by intelligent gentlemen here that the constitution of that State declares that no convention of the people of North Carolina shall be called to amend the constitution of that State, except by a two-thirds vote of both branches of the State Legislature; and yet my colleague, as a member of the North Carolina Senate, supported and voted for the proposition of Governor Graham, which was intended to provide that the question of a convention to amend the constitution should be submitted to the people of the State by a bare majority of both branches of the Legislature; and if a majority of the people voted for a convention, then the people should proceed to elect delegates to amend the constitution, although that instrument itself says that no convention shall be called unless it is by a vote of two thirds of both branches of the Legislature.

Mr. GILMER. Will my colleague allow me to correct him as to a matter of fact?

Mr. SHAW, of North Carolina. I owe the gentleman no courtesy, and will not allow him to interrupt me, especially as I am sure the Chair will have the liberality to award him the floor at the close of my remarks, when he will have an opportunity to say all that he may desire. I say, then, that my colleague, in voting to sustain the proposition of Governor Graham in the Legislature of North Carolina, has himself sanctioned and approved the doctrine which he now denounces, but which I say is not set forth in the Green amendment.

But if the special message of the President does contain this doctrine, which has now become so odious to my colleague; and if he has changed his course since he was in the Legislature, why have we not heard his thunder sooner? I have here an editorial article from the leading organ of the party to which the gentleman belongs—the Know Nothing party of North Carolina—in which, in speaking of the President's message and of this very doctrine which the gentleman so vehemently condemns, the following language is used. I quote from the Raleigh Register, of the 10th February, 1858:

"According to promise we lay before our readers to-day the President's message recommending to the favor of Congress the Lecompton constitution. We are not much given to paying compliments to Democrats, and rarely indeed do they deserve any at our hands. We hope, however, that we can do justice, and it is in a spirit of fair dealing that we say that Mr. Buchanan's message is a most excellent one."

"Besides all this, as the President very well contends, as soon as Kansas is admitted as a State, she can call another convention to make another constitution, and it can then be ascertained whether the friends or opponents of slavery are in the minority in the State. This seems to us exceedingly simple and plain, and the furious opposition to the President's views can only be accounted for by the fact that certain politicians in Congress desire to prolong this agitation for their own purposes, and with a view likewise of asserting, if possible, the principle that slavery shall not spread beyond its present limits. As a citizen of the United States, then, and a lover of law and order, and a most earnest desire to see Kansas admitted with an amendment to the constitution, and let her future struggles, if any shall ensue, be carried on upon her own soil as a sovereign State, and be settled by her own citizens. Then, and not before, will her matters cease to be so many fire-brands, threatening the destruction of the Union."

There, sir, is the same doctrine held by the leading organ, in North Carolina, of the gentleman's own party, and I have never yet heard any denunciation of that article by my colleague or any member of his party at home. But after the gentleman had concluded to oppose the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution, he finds that this is an odious doctrine, and one which ought not only to condemn the President, but the Democratic party also, and me too, who never adopted it!

Now, sir, as to my colleague's denial that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUITMAN] moved to strike out the Green amendment. That has become a matter of history; it is upon your record, and I ask you, and I ask the gentleman from Mississippi whether the effect of his motion was not to bring before the House the Senate bill without the Green amendment?

Mr. QUITMAN. Certainly.

Mr. SHAW, of North Carolina. I must say I was surprised, when I read the speech of my colleague, to see the charge brought against the gentleman from Mississippi, of being guilty of duplicity in bringing forward that amendment in the manner he did. If there is any one trait which stands out in bold relief in the character of the gentleman from Mississippi, it is his directness, his straightforwardness, and the moral courage and boldness with which he marches up to every question which it is his duty to meet: he is not the man who would lend himself to any such course as that charged by the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. QUITMAN. It was only yesterday that I read the remarks of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. GILMER,] and I have been thinking very calmly upon the question whether I should notice them or not. I will not, at any rate, take the time to do so now. Perhaps I may notice them, and I may think them unworthy of notice.

Mr. SHAW, of North Carolina. I was saying that the record will show that the gentleman from Mississippi moved to amend the bill then before the House, by submitting the Senate bill without the Green amendment, as an amendment to the Crittenden bill, offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. MONTGOMERY.] The effect of that would have been to have brought before this House the Senate bill with the Green amendment, and the Senate bill without the Green amendment. Now, sir, I voted for the proposition of the gentleman from Mississippi, and my colleague voted against it; and I repeat, that I have done him no injustice in placing him in the position that I did.

But my colleague says he voted against the motion of the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. QUITMAN,] not because he was in favor of the Green amendment, but because the success of that motion would have defeated the Crittenden bill, which he was in favor of; and that I was unjust towards him in not stating that fact. To show how much justice there is in this charge, I will be excused, I trust, for quoting a brief extract from my speech, which will be a sufficient answer to the gentleman's accusation:

"But the gentleman may say that he voted against the Green amendment in order to save, if possible, the House bill. I do not by any means admit that he can thereby find a sufficient justification of his vote; but I am willing, for the sake of the argument only, to give him the benefit of that position; and now let us see whether he is justifiable in taking the Crittenden amendment in preference to the Senate bill."

My colleague, in his speech, stated that I read from the Lecompton constitution, to prove that that instrument prescribed a proper qualification for voters; for the purpose, as he supposed, of having it go abroad that the Crittenden bill, for which he voted, contained no such safeguard. If the gentleman read my speech carefully, he must have known that I read from that constitution for no such purpose; and the same injustice which he has improperly, and without the least cause, charged against me, of perverting and misrepresenting his arguments, he has committed against me, in this, as well as in numerous other instances. I showed that by the Lecompton constitution, aliens were prohibited the right of suffrage. I went on then to show that by voting down that constitution, as the gentleman endeavored to vote it down, and by passing another bill, the Crittenden bill, by which the people of Kansas would have been authorized by my colleague to vote upon the Lecompton constitution, and if they saw fit to reject it; (and the whole tenor of his argument, from one end to the other, was to the effect that that constitution was not the voice of the people of Kansas, and that if submitted to them, they would vote it down;) they would then have power under the Crittenden bill to make another constitution, in which they might, and in all probability would, ingraft the doctrine of alien suffrage; yes, even free-negro suffrage—and I was warranted in saying that; for the Leavenworth constitution, then recently made and published, was said to contain, not only the principle of alien suffrage, but of suffrage to free negroes; and that constitution, thus authorized, would entitle Kansas to admission into the Union. That was the argument I made; and my colleague, unable to meet it, has only sought to pervert it.

But the gentleman says I accused him of taking the position that if the Lecompton constitution should be voted down, the people of Kansas would seize upon eighty millions of the public lands. Is there anything of that kind to be found in my speech? If so, I call upon the gentleman to bring it forward and present it to the House and the country. Did I say any such thing? I said nothing of the kind; and I think my colleague must know that that was not what I said. He knows, if he has carefully read my speech, which he has in his possession, I said that in the Lecompton constitution there was ample and sufficient guarantee to secure to the several States their interest in the public domain lying within the borders of Kansas; and that, if the people of Kansas came in under that constitution, the rights of all the States—North Carolina as well as the rest—would be amply secured. I said that if my colleague should succeed in voting down that constitution, if he should succeed in passing the bill he was advocating, he would place it in the power of the people of Kansas to seize upon and appropriate to their own use every single acre of the public domain within their borders. How did I prove it? By showing that if the people should vote down the Lecompton constitution, they would be authorized by the Crittenden bill to frame another constitution; and without any terms or conditions precedent in regard to the public domain, or anything else, they were to be inducted into the Union by the mere ipse dixit of the President of the United States, and there would be no remedy to us if they should assert their right to the public lands, even to every acre within their limits.

The gentleman, in his speech, quotes an extract from a letter of Senator DAVIS, of Mississippi, written on 14th May, 1858, to sustain his position. In doing so, however, he attributes to him language which is not to be found in the extract which my colleague quotes. Nor is it to be found in any other portion of that letter. He says that Colonel DAVIS lays down the principle that the "condition precedent" must be contained in the "act of admission." This is an unauthorized amendment to Colonel DAVIS's letter, made by my colleague for a purpose which must be obvious to every one—it was absolutely necessary to make out his case. Here, sir, is the extract which my colleague quotes and adopts:

"The consequence of admitting a State without a recognition precedent of the rights of the United States to the public domain, are, in my opinion, the transfer of the useful with the eminent domain, to the people of the State thus admitted, without reservation.

As you will see, Colonel DAVIS does not say that the "condition precedent" must be in the "act of admission." He says no such thing.

But my colleague demands, with an air of triumph, what safeguard there is in the Senate bill for the admission of Kansas, for the security of the public domain in that Territory, which the Crittenden bill does not also contain? and in this connection, and with a flourish of trumpets, he quotes a clause from the Crittenden bill, and with an air of complacency adds, "I shall append to my speech the Minnesota bill, which contains no such guarantee and no security whatever." Now, sir, if my colleague was able to meet the argument I made, why did he resort to the artful dodge of drawing his parallel between the Senate bill and the Crittenden bill, or the Minnesota bill, instead of meeting the point I distinctly made as to the power he proposed to confer upon the people of Kansas, to absorb and appropriate the public lands in case they should chose to vote down the Lecompton constitution, which was to be submitted to them for ratification or rejection by the Crittenden bill for which he voted? and the whole scope of his argument went to show that if submitted to them, they would vote down that constitution; his main objection to the admission of Kansas, under the Lecompton constitution, being that it was not the will and the voice of the people of that Territory.

Now, sir, strange as it may seem, my colleague in his desire to sustain his unfounded charge against me, that I had surrendered the rights of the United States to this public domain, by my vote for the Minnesota bill, which he voted against—adopts the very principle which I asserted in my speech of the 20th April, by which I showed, that by conferring upon the people of Kansas, as he proposed to do by his vote for the Crittenden bill, the right to frame a new constitution and be admitted into the Confederacy by the proclamation of the President, without any condition precedent to secure the right of the Government to the public lands in Kansas—my colleague has clinched the argument I made against him on that point. I repeat, I undertook to prove, and did prove, to my own satisfaction, at least, that the people of Kansas would have been enabled, had my colleague succeeded in his effort to defeat the Lecompton constitution and carry through the Crittenden bill, to seize upon every acre of the public lands in that Territory; and my logical and sagacious colleague has fully sustained my point by adopting the very principle upon which I based the whole argument.

Now, in reference to the charge that I voted for the bill to admit Minnesota, which, he says, does not contain one word by which the Government is secured in the public lands. Has my colleague put this case fairly? Has he sustained the grave charge he makes against me, of having abandoned the rights and surrendered the interests of North Carolina in the public lands in Minnesota? Sir, has he told the whole truth in the matter? In his schoolboy days, my colleague learned the Latin maxim, "suppressio veri;"—but, sir, I have said I will not bandy epithets with my colleague, and I will not finish the sentence. I will recall what I have said. My colleague may not have read the "enabling act," by which the last Congress authorized Minnesota to form a State constitution preparatory to her admission into the Union; he may have voted against her admission without having informed himself of the facts in the case. Now, sir, I shall quote the proviso contained in the fifth clause of the fifth section of the enabling act, by which ample security was made for the rights of the Government in the public domain. Here is the proviso:

"Provided, The foregoing propositions herein offered are on the condition that the said convention which shall form the constitution of said State, shall provide by a clause in said constitution, or an ordinance, irrevocable without the consent of the United States, that said State shall never interfere with the primary disposal of the soil within the same by the United States, or with any regulations Congress may find necessary for securing the title in said soil to bona fide purchasers thereof, and that no tax shall be imposed on lands belonging to the United States, and that in no case shall non resident proprietors be taxed higher than residents."

And here I am reminded by the chairman of the Committee on Territories [Mr. STEPHENS] that the constitution of Minnesota ratified and confirmed this land provision. I quote here the third section of the second article of that constitution:

"The propositions contained in the act of Congress entitled 'An act to authorize the people of the Territory of Minnesota to form a constitution and State government preparatory to their admission into the Union on an equal footing with the original States,' are hereby accepted, ratified, and confirmed, and shall remain irrevocable without the consent of the United States; and it is hereby ordained that this State shall never interfere with the primary disposal of the soil within the same, by the United States, or with any regulations Congress may find necessary for securing the title to said soil to bona fide purchasers thereof; and no tax shall be imposed on lands belonging to the United States, and in no case shall non-resident proprietors be taxed higher than residents."

Now, I submit to you and the committee, I submit to the people of North Carolina, whether there is the smallest degree of fairness or justice in the gentleman's charge against me as to this matter.

Another charge alleged against me by the gentleman from North Carolina is, that I had done him the injustice to place his opposition to the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution, upon the ground that she would thereby be admitted as a slave State. Is there any such charge in my speech? My colleague cannot show it. I made no such charge. I said:

"He bases his opposition to the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution, in other words, to her admission as a slave State, upon three points of objection: first, that the Green amendment affirms the right of a majority of the people to change the constitution at any time they please; and that, by the establishment of that principle, slavery may be excluded whenever a majority of the people choose; second, that the population of Kansas is not sufficient to entitle her to admission; and, third, that the constitution framed at Lecompton is not the will of the people of that Territory."

Now, sir, is that charging him with opposition to the admission of Kansas, because she would come in "as a slave State?" My charge against him was that while "Kansas was as much a slave State as Georgia or South Carolina, under the Lecompton constitution," by voting down that constitution, and enabling the people of Kansas to frame another, if the opinion he gave as to the will of the majority in that Territory was correct, slavery would be abolished, and she would become a free State. I shall not stop here to make an argument upon this point. Everybody knows that the seventh article of her constitution established slavery by every guarantee that could be thrown around that institution. It was opposed by the Black Republican party upon that ground. The President announced the fact in his special message, that Kansas was as much a slave State as Georgia or South Carolina, and my colleague labored throughout his whole speech to prove that the people of Kansas would vote down the Lecompton constitution if we submitted it to them, and would, as certainly, frame a free-State constitution in its stead.

But, sir, my colleague says he was unwilling to bring Kansas into the Union by unfair means; he would not countenance the "shuffling" by which an "unnatural emigration" was forced into Kansas; he would not force upon an unwilling people a constitution which they were opposed to. Yes, sir, my colleague had such an abhorrence for the "shuffling" which had been witnessed in Kansas; he was so much opposed to that sort of shuffling by which an unnatural emigration had been forced into that Territory; he was so honest, so fair, and so just, he felt constrained to vote against a constitution which made Kansas a slave State, and which had come to us sanctioned by all the forms and requirements of law; and, at the same time, to use every effort in his power to enable those "shufflers" and Free-Soilers, who had been brought into Kansas by an "unnatural emigration," to frame a new constitution, by which all the South had gained, in the long struggle in Kansas, would have been lost.

And why did he do that? Because the gentleman was too fair, too just, and too honest to force upon a reluctant people a constitution which was not their will and their choice. Because that constitution had not been submitted to the people of Kansas for their ratification or rejection. That was the chief ground of objection which justified my colleague (in his own estimation) in putting himself in opposition to the whole body of southern Democrats in the Senate and in the House, supported by a majority of northern Democratic members and Senators, and by one half the members of his own party from the South; because the people of Kansas had not had an opportunity of voting at the polls for the ratification or rejection of that constitution. When, let me ask my colleague, did this new light dawn upon him? When did he find out that justice and honesty and fair dealing to the people of Kansas required that the Lecompton constitution should be submitted to them for ratification or rejection? Sir, I say that he had not made that notable discovery when he received the votes of the people of North Carolina which secured to him the seat which he occupies upon this floor.

During his canvass he proclaimed everywhere to the people of the fifth congressional district of North Carolina, that President Buchanan was unworthy the confidence of the southern people, because (as he said) he had instructed Governor Walker to see that the constitution of Kansas was submitted to a vote of the people of that Territory. He declared that, if the Lecompton constitution was submitted to the people of Kansas for ratification or rejection, the last hope of the southern people for the admission of a slave State north of 36° 30' would be gone forever. I say, when did my colleague make this extraordinary discovery?

As late as the day when Judge DOUGLAS made his speech, in December last, my colleague had not received this new light! So far from it, he did not hesitate to say that he was in favor of the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution, without its being submitted to the people. It was not until a still later period that he made the discovery, and his conversion appears to me almost as strange, as extraordinary as that of St. Paul.

When did that light beam upon him? I have said it was not in December last; but, sir, when the struggle came on, when the two parties were arrayed against each other here—the South for Lecompton with slavery, on the one hand, and my colleague, with his five southern coadjutors, with the whole Black Republican party, on the other—then it was that this new light dawned upon him. Then it was that my colleague turned from us, in our hour of need, and went over to the enemy, and cast his vote against us. But, sir, after that vote had been cast, and the enemies of the South were rejoicing over the victory they had achieved, an effort was made to raise a conference committee, to see if some plan could be agreed upon by which Kansas might be brought into the Union under the Lecompton constitution, and peace thereby restored to the country. My colleague had admitted the urgent necessity of settling the question and relieving the country of the fearful excitement and the dangerous agitation which had so long prevailed. How did he vote then upon the motion to raise that committee? Did he come forward in a spirit of conciliation and compromise, and say to those with whom he had differed, "I have not been able to agree with you as to the Senate bill; but I see the necessity of getting rid of this vexed question, and I will vote for a conference committee, with the hope that some plan may be agreed upon to which I may be able to give my support?" No, sir; no such thing! When the two parties in this House were arrayed against each other, nearly the entire southern delegation on the one side, and the whole body of Black Republicans upon the other, while the question was in imminent doubt, my colleague came forward and said, by his vote, "I will permit no further effort to be made to settle this question; here the matter shall stop." And, sir, had it not been for the casting vote of the Speaker of this House, my colleague would have been successful; the Kansas question would still be open; still a source of trouble and danger. But, sir, we prevailed over my colleague and his coadjutors; the conference committee was raised; and a bill reported to this House which received the support of my colleague; and therefore stands a record evidence against him on account of his vote against the conference committee which framed it!

But my colleague says that I applied the phrase "unparalleled outrage" to the position which he occupied upon the Kansas question. What I said was that the gentleman's position was injurious to the rights of his own section; and I proved it by quoting against him authority which he could not question—the Raleigh Register—which had denounced the opposition to the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution as "an unparalleled outrage." Does my colleague deny that the phrase was so applied by that journal? I will here quote the article so that others may see whether I was warranted in the assertion:

"The President establishes by undoubted proof that the constitution of Lecompton was made according to the Constitution and the laws, and this being the case, what earthly pretext will Congress have for even hesitating about accepting it, and admitting Kansas as a State? What right has that body to look behind a full compliance with law, and say to the people of Kansas, you ought to have done this or that? The idea is patently and egregiously absurd, and known to be so by the unscrupulous men who urge it. What if a majority of the voters of Kansas did not take part in the formation of the constitution? Whose fault was that but their own? They had unlimited opportunities to vote, and if for factious and rebellious purposes they chose not to exercise their right of suffrage, are they to be allowed to take advantage of their own laches, of their own wrong?"

"Never was there a clearer case submitted to the judgment of intelligent men than this of Kansas; and if her constitution, as submitted, shall be rejected, it will be an unparalleled outrage, not on the South alone, but on the constitution, the laws, and common sense. It will establish a principle which may be carried out to the utter destruction of all popular government."

But the gentleman from North Carolina says that the conference committee bill is substantially the same as the Crittenden bill, and that I came upon his platform when I voted for the former. I shall not now step to discuss this question; the facts have gone to the people of the country, and they have all the information necessary to enable them to come to a correct conclusion; and I doubt not that they will render a just verdict. When the gentleman tells me that the conference bill is as great an outrage as the Crittenden bill, I will say to him that I am supported by almost the entire body of Representatives from the South, both in the Senate and in the House; I am supported by a majority of the conservative and patriotic Democrats of the North in this House and in the Senate. If I wanted other evidence to prove to my mind that, in voting for that conference bill, I was committing no outrage upon my own State and upon my own section, it would be enough, and more than enough, for me to know that I voted in direct opposition to every Black Republican in this Hall and in the other branch of Congress.

If the conference bill was substantially the same as that for which my colleague contended, why did not Governor Crittenden and Governor Bell have the sagacity to learn the same fact? Is the mental vision of my colleague so much more acute than that of the two gentlemen from Kentucky and the three gentlemen from Maryland, in this House, that they, too, could not see it? Yet, of all these gentlemen of his own party, who set out against us upon the ground that the bill which we voted for did not submit the Lecompton constitution to the people of Kansas, only one, and that my colleague, could so far look into the merits of the question as to see that the conference bill was precisely the thing he had been contending for.
